The widely reported and investigated abuse at Abu Ghraib included aggressive interrogation techniques that had been approved for use at the U.S. detention center in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, such as using military working dogs to intimidate prisoners and shackling prisoners in painful positions. The photographs of sexual abuse at Abu Ghraib led to more than a dozen investigations into U.S. interrogation and detention policies.

Shays's campaign manager, Michael Sohn, said Farrell and the Democrats "have been personally attacking Chris for over three years now" and added: "They want two different standards." Farrell and Shays also squared off in the 2004 congressional campaign.

Sohn said Shays's remarks on Kennedy only reflected the fact that the senator had come to Connecticut a few days earlier for a Farrell fundraiser after she had called for Hastert to step down -- before Hastert was shown to have made serious mistakes in the handling of the page scandal.

"Chris has a reputation his entire career of just speaking the truth -- no matter how blunt it might be," Sohn said.

In his comments to the Courant, Shays said, "I know the speaker didn't go over a bridge and leave a young person in the water, and then have a press conference the next day."

One political analyst said Shays's willingness to fight back fiercely -- something he has been reluctant to do -- is a necessary response given the fact that his career is on the line.

Fernando Botero's Chubby Figures Confront the Torture at Abu Ghraib

NEW YORK

Back in 1993, on Park Avenue, there was a public exhibition of Fernando Botero's big, curvy bronze sculptures, monumental human and animal figures that sat fat and happy on the green median of one of the world's priciest streets. Botero's trademark chubbies aren't exactly beloved by the high art crowd -- at least that part of it committed to conceptual and abstract work. But they are a golden brand everywhere else in the world -- lucrative, popular, collectible. Even the name Botero is shorthand for one of his paintings or one of his trademark pudgy figures, and if someone whispers "Botero-esque" as you waddle by, you can be sure that it's time to start losing a few.

Park Avenue was the perfect place for them, a canyon of concrete where they seemed to mock (or celebrate) the porcine habits of the upper class. After New York, the Boteros went on to Fort Lauderdale, Chicago, Beverly Hills and (in 1996) Washington. But American museums haven't exactly been clamoring for first rights to his current show, which opens at the commercial Marlborough Gallery in New York on Tuesday.

Shocked and angered by news of Abu Ghraib, Botero was inspired to put his familiar figures through the rigors and humiliations of the abuse that American soldiers perpetrated on Iraqi inmates at the notorious prison. The result was some 80 paintings, drawings and watercolors that show his rounded figures with hoods on, shackled, bound at the wrists, forced into human piles, bleeding, screaming and vomiting. They are fat, but they're not happy.

It is a remarkable show, and a disturbing one. Few artists in this country have focused so obsessively on the events at Abu Ghraib, and even fewer have done it in a figurative, representational style. And no artist with a style so recognizable as Botero's has dared to infuse his cash-cow calling card with such nakedly political sentiment. You will probably never see then-Spec. Lynndie England practicing her sick sadomasochism in a Thomas Kinkade cottage or one of William Wegman's dogs trussed up for some waterboarding.

Botero, 74, a trim man with thin silver hair, says that he first learned of Abu Ghraib from Seymour Hirsch's explosive 2004 article in the New Yorker. Then came newspaper and television reports, and a barrage of photographs. He spent four or five months stewing over the outrage, and then, on an airplane returning to his home in Paris, he started sketching. About 45 of his Abu Ghraib works, which he has tried without success to exhibit in a U.S. museum, will go on display for the first time in this country at the New York gallery, one of his primary American outlets. It is a gallery more given to such artists as Dale Chihuly, the glass sculptor. Chihuly's exhibition of utterly vapid glass color blobs is moving out just as the Boteros move in (the Botero show runs through Nov. 18).

"We've never done an exhibition quite like this," says Janice Gardner Cecil, one of the Marlborough's directors. In the back of the gallery, behind the public space where hoi polloi wander, are large sliding racks of paintings for sale, and there one finds more familiar Botero material. Here, paintings such as "After Goya" (2005), which shows a blank-faced, full-figured, somewhat squat woman in an elegant dress and elaborate hat, are saturated in color, often tropical hues inspired by the artist's native Colombia.

By contrast, the Abu Ghraib paintings stick to a restricted palette. Flesh tones are sunburned or sickly green, and the backgrounds are dark military greens, ochre tiles and a black void seen through prison bars. Many of the works were done in charcoal or pencil, with a splash of rust color soaking through, to indicate blood. The rare bright spots in the paintings come from the paraphernalia of sadism: a blue latex glove worn by an American captor, strangely festive blindfolds, or bright-red women's underwear, used to demean and embarrass the men.

Look back through Botero's career, and these rare touches of color connect the Abu Ghraib art to the folk-inspired figures he has focused on for decades. A painting of a transvestite, from 2000, shows a hint of the same red brassiere seen in the Abu Ghraib works, and the lips of his torture victims are, for some reason, glossed up in cherry just like those of his female impersonator. And there's the head-scratcher: Is Botero just playing Abu Ghraib dress-up with his Botero People?

And isn't there something opportunistic, or at least insensitive, in that? Throughout the trauma of public exposure that made Abu Ghraib synonymous with American hypocrisy around the world, the government (and often newspapers) argued that it is humiliating to the victims to spread these images. Is it a further humiliation to Botero-ize them?

It isn't clear whether Botero sees his Boteros quite like we do, as slightly ridiculous figures, a particular species with all the grotesquerie but little of the visual sting of caricatures such as the decadent old men and prostitutes of George Grosz. He seems to see the world through the medium of his tubbies, and they are essentially neutral objects, which can be fit to multiple purposes, including his efforts, in this show, to document his feelings about torture.

"I didn't invent anything," he says, explaining that he painted directly from, and with fidelity to, descriptions he read in official reports about the outrages. (Botero insists that he didn't work from photographs.) "If I did, then all the rest of the paintings would lose their significance."

So he thinks of himself as a chronicler, albeit in paint, on canvas, with a glossy art sheen. This isn't the first time that his career has undergone what he calls "a parenthesis," a dark chapter devoted to disturbing political or social events. In the late 1990s, he painted a series of works inspired by the bloody drug-cartel wars of Colombia, a country he can only visit under extremely elaborate security arrangements because his fame makes him a target. Those paintings also hewed to the Botero style, including a corpulent Pablo Escobar, seen above the rooftops, a la Chagall, going down in a hail of bullets. He donated his drug-war paintings to museums in Bogota and Medellin, and he will donate the Abu Ghraib paintings as well.

"It is immoral to try to make money out of the suffering of people," he says. He hopes that an American museum will take them for its permanent collection; a European museum will also do.

These paintings leave you with the sense that two worlds have collided with very odd results. The men at Abu Ghraib may not have been skeletal, but they weren't pleasantly plump, a condition that suggests (in artistic terms) bourgeois prosperity or complacency. Indeed, being fat, in our image-conscious society, is almost the same as being guilty, and yet the guilt, at Abu Ghraib, rests squarely with the Americans -- who are never explicitly represented as such; no identifying flags or insignia appear in any of these works. The perpetrators are often faceless or are represented only by a hand or a boot coming in from the margin of the painting.

And although Botero spares no effort to show degradation -- even sodomy is explicitly represented -- he never quite gets facial anguish right. The fat on a happy Botero works to neutralize expression into something round and blank, like a baby's idiotic goo-goo face; but screaming, shrieking, crying Boteros have awkward, cartoon mouths with widely separated teeth, such as a child might draw. The strongest images are ones in which the subject has passed through anguish into resignation, which strongly suggests the visual tradition of Christian martyrdom.

Authentic primitivism, with its raw edges and volatility, has largely been banished from Botero's big, happy work, which often looks as if it's minted in a factory. In the Abu Ghraib works, however, Botero is more closely in communion with folk-art traditions. He mentions Goya, the chronicler of French atrocities in Spain, and there's a resemblance. But his Abu Ghraib series feels more like a catalogue of dark memories, a compendium of outrages captured in a long-established people's vernacular, as a hedge against obfuscation and oblivion. These illustrations form a kind of history book, not one written by the victors but one sketched and colored by the meek of the earth, hidden away until the tables are turned and the truth can come out.

"Art is a permanent accusation," he says.

Abu Ghraib, an exhibition by Fernando Botero at New York's Marlborough Gallery, 40 West 57th St.,opens Tuesday and runs through Nov. 18. The gallery is open Monday-Saturday 10 a.m.-5:30 p.m.

Afghanistan: Suicide Bomb Kills Soldier And 7 Civilians (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

A suicide bomber drove his car at a NATO military convoy in the southern city of Kandahar, killing eight people and wounding nine others, officials said. One NATO soldier was among the dead and another was wounded. The governor of Kandahar, Asadullah Khaled, said the soldiers involved were Americans serving as part of the NATO force in the south. More than 200 people have been killed in Afghanistan in suicide attacks this year.

Winds Of War (NYT)

By Jacob Heilbrunn

In the fall of 2002, Dick Cheney assembled some of his favorite intellectuals, including George Will, Bernard Lewis and Victor Davis Hanson, at the vice-presidential residence in Northwest Washington to discuss the coming Iraq war. Cheney focused on Hanson's book "The Soul of Battle," which profiled George Patton, William Tecumseh Sherman and the Theban general Epaminondas to argue that they may have employed ruthless tactics that led their contemporaries to condemn them, but that each was later vindicated by history. As the evening wore on, it became apparent that Cheney viewed himself as one such leader.

In "Hubris," Michael Isikoff and David Corn chronicle the Bush administration's delusional march to war. Though there has been a deluge of works denouncing the follies of the military and the administration, Isikoff and Corn cover somewhat different terrain. They offer the most comprehensive account of the White House's political machinations, aimed at convincing Congress and the public that Iraq posed a dire threat. Isikoff is an investigative correspondent for Newsweek and the author of "Uncovering Clinton," and Corn is an editor at The Nation and the author of "The Lies of George W. Bush." The authors, who have interviewed key politicians and government officials, supply a lot of new information. They show that in many ways the administration became the dupe of its own propaganda. Though their narrative spins out of control by the end, much of the book makes for fascinating reading.

As Isikoff and Corn demonstrate, the administration's first mission was to snow Congress. At every step, Cheney took the lead, convincing the four top leaders of Congress — Dennis Hastert, Richard Gephardt, Trent Lott and Tom Daschle — that war was unavoidable. Together with George Tenet, the director of central intelligence, Cheney and the lawmakers gathered in the House Intelligence Committee briefing room, where they examined photos of what looked like new construction at what Cheney declared were Iraqi nuclear weapons sites. "When the Congressional leaders departed that briefing," Isikoff and Corn write, "they looked grim."

Cheney also tackled the job of persuading a skeptical House majority leader, Dick Armey. "Trust me on this, Dick," Cheney told him. "When I get done with this briefing, you're going to be with me." Armey was perplexed: "He didn't say, 'You're going to be with us.' He didn't say, 'You're going to be with the president.' He said, 'You're going to be with me." After Cheney showed him a bunch of pictures of putative W.M.D. sites in Iraq, Armey opted to give him the benefit of the doubt, even though he didn't find the briefing very persuasive.

To buttress the administration's case, Cheney not only visited the C.I.A. to pound away at agency analysts for failing to come up with links between Al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein, but also drew on a secret intelligence unit — if the term is not too grandiose — that was overseen by Douglas Feith, then under secretary of defense. Feith's researchers, David Wurmser and Michael Maloof, who were both protégés of the prominent neoconservative Richard Perle, spent months combing through raw intelligence reports to discover the truths that had somehow eluded the entire intelligence community. In a small windowless office at the Pentagon, they created "giant wall charts" detailing the intimate links between Iraq and Al Qaeda.

Paul Wolfowitz, the deputy defense secretary at the time, was bowled over: he "was especially taken with the spaghetti lines that Maloof had drawn between the Abu Nidal terrorist organization in Iraq and training camps in Lebanon." From Lebanon, the lines then went to Al Qaeda in Afghanistan. Isikoff and Corn report that these analyses, such as they were, made a big splash at the White House. If anyone complained that solid evidence was lacking, Feith's team was unmoved: "The Feith analysts were essentially claiming that because Al Qaeda and Iraq had joined together in a clandestine partnership to attack the United States, there would be little, if any, evidence to prove the conspiracy."

Where Isikoff and Corn themselves go astray is in their own obsessive focus on Judith Miller and The New York Times, as well as on the story of Joseph Wilson, Valerie Plame Wilson and Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby, who is under indictment for obstruction of justice and perjury. The attention they lavish on both the Miller and the Plame cases is out of all proportion to their true significance. These chapters reach a level of detail that is simply eye-glazing. To read Isikoff and Corn, one would think that Miller (whose conduct was bad enough) and The Times were almost uniquely responsible for abetting the administration's march to war.

Far more interesting is Isikoff and Corn's exploration of the mental world that the administration inhabits. They recount that in December 2001, Scooter Libby read aloud to a visiting journalist a famous passage from Winston Churchill's memoirs about being named prime minister: "I felt as if I were walking with destiny, and that all my past life had been but a preparation for this hour and for this trial." Libby declared that these words could be applied to Cheney after Sept. 11. Hubris? Megalomania may be more like it.

Pseudo-histories Of The Iraq War (WT)

By Victor Davis Hanson

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

Three recent books about the "fiasco" in Iraq -- "Cobra II" by Michael Gordon and Bernard Trainor, "State of Denial" by Bob Woodward and just plain "Fiasco" by Tom Ricks -- have attracted a lot of attention, and sales. All three well-written exposes repeat the now well-known argument that our government's incompetence and arrogance have nearly ensured U.S. failure in birthing democracy in Iraq.

It's worth noting, though, that many of the authors' critical portraits rely on private conversations and anonymous sources. The most damning informants in these books are never identified, and so can't be questioned.

The authors, as journalists, are well aware that after the New York Times' problems with Jayson Blair and other high-profile media scandals, the public no longer necessarily accepts as gospel what reporters write. That perhaps explains their and others' apparent adaptation of scholarly methods. Often these days journalists mimic the footnoting of historians -- giving the impression their reporting is history documented by verifiable primary and secondary sources also available to the reader.

Indeed, the verifiability of source material is what distinguishes history from hearsay -- and what distinguishes the genre from journalism or first-person recollections. Since the time of the historian Thucydides -- who not only recorded what speakers said, but, more controversially, made them voice what he thought they might or ought to have said -- historians have developed protocols to ensure credibility. Whether or not historians use footnotes or citations, they at least now agree to draw on information that can be checked by others, who will determine how skillfully, honestly or completely such sources were employed.

But by too often using only the veneer of the historical method, the authors of these three books give their work a patina of scholarly credibility that can confuse the reader. In "Cobra II," for example, some citations at the end of the book state that information came from a "former senior military officer," "former Centcom planner" or "U.S. State Department official."

In "Fiasco," often verbatim quotations are not cited with specific attribution, but only vaguely noted in the text as "said a Bush administration official" or "recalled one officer." Among the end notes in "State of Denial," we are apprised, "The information in this chapter comes primarily from background interviews with seven knowledgeable sources."

But who are these "seven knowledgeable sources"? Since Mr. Woodward so far won't name them, how do we really know they are "knowledgeable" or even "primarily" used? Is the answer they talked to Mr. Woodward (and not to others?), or were pre-selected because they happened to agree with his own views?

In "Cobra II," we wonder why one "former Centcom planner" would talk while others (more numerous?) choose not to. And in "Fiasco," is the talkative but unnamed "Bush administration official" getting even at his rivals by offering only his interpretation of shared past conversations?

There are a number of other things wrong with all this gossip.

First, note the disturbing pattern in this resorting to anonymity. Usually the unidentified source supports the author's critique -- and thus is almost always critical of the present policy in Iraq. Rarely do these journalists quote unnamed sources who dissent from their own views, although there are surely pro-U.S. Iraq policy candid voices among the thousands of retired generals.

Second, here is the cardinal rule for anonymous sources in this new genre of pseudo-history: Talk to reporters as soon as possible "off the record" in hopes they will be sympathetic. If you keep quiet, some of your loudmouth enemies might unload on you from the safety of anonymity, ensuring their narrative, not yours, will become authoritative.

Third, we are not reading accounts of golf or fashion but the most important event since the end of the Cold War as it unfolds. When one writes military history in the middle of a war, there is a responsibility to be extra careful. Real-time interpretations don't just offer lessons about the past but may change the very course of events as they happen.

These past couple of weeks, current and former officials have been protesting that they were unfairly characterized in Mr. Woodward's book -- and have argued conditions in Iraq are not as bad as claimed by anonymous sources. And while there have been on-the-record critics of all three books, none of the unnamed accusers cited in them has come forward.

These virtual histories all allege a "state of denial" and lack of accountability on the part of government officials. Perhaps -- but how odd then that the authors of "Cobra II," "Fiasco" and "State of Denial" have used the very secrecy and subterfuge they claim to deplore in their targets.

CRIMINAL LAW:

GOP's Ney Pleads Guilty (WT/AP)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

Rep. Bob Ney pleaded guilty yesterday in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling investigation, the first lawmaker to confess to crimes in an election-year scandal that has stained the Republican-controlled Congress.

Republican leaders said Ney will be expelled from the House if he doesn't quit by the time they return to Washington after the Nov. 7 elections.

Appearing before Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle on charges of conspiracy and making false statements, Ney acknowledged taking trips, tickets, meals and campaign donations from Abramoff in return for official actions on behalf of his clients.

Ney, Ohio Republican, faces up to 10 years in prison. The Justice Department recommended 27 months behind bars. Ney's lawyers plan to recommend him for a Bureau of Prisons alcohol-treatment program, which dramatically could cut the time he serves behind bars.

Judge Huvelle set sentencing for Jan. 19.

Although Ney's lawyer and the congressman promised he would resign in the next few weeks, it was not soon enough for House Republican leaders who are on the defensive because of fresh scandals in the final weeks before the midterm elections.

Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, called for Ney to resign, as did White House press secretary Tony Snow, who said Ney's criminal activity "is not a reflection of the Republican Party."

House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, said he will introduce a resolution to kick Ney out of the House as soon as Congress returns to Washington.

The House ethics committee is investigating Mr. Hastert and other Republican House leaders, along with their top aides, for their handling of former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually charged messages to teenagers who served as House pages.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, faulted Mr. Hastert and the Republican leadership for letting Ney remain on the public payroll since he signed papers in September agreeing to plead guilty. Mrs. Pelosi said House leaders "have a long pattern of protecting Republican members."

In Ney's home state, Ohio Republican Party Chairman Bob Bennett called Ney "a cancer in the Congress."

Political corruption has hurt Republicans more than Democrats, recent AP-Ipsos polling showed. Democrats have the advantage over Republicans on the question of who would do a better job of handling corruption, 40 percent to 25 percent.

Ney is the latest in a string of once-influential men convicted in a scandal that so far has caught several lobbyists and two members of the Bush administration.

•Abramoff, the Republican superlobbyist, admitted guilt in January. Two former aides to Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, the former House majority leader, have also pleaded guilty, as has Ney's former chief of staff.

•Former White House official David Safavian, who was the Bush administration's top procurement official, was convicted of covering up his dealings with Abramoff. He is scheduled for sentencing on Oct. 27.

•Roger Stillwell, a former Interior Department official, pleaded guilty in August to a misdemeanor charge for not reporting that Abramoff had given him tickets to football games and concerts.

Ney confessed his criminal acts during a half-hour session at a federal courthouse a few blocks from the Capitol, where until recently he wielded a gavel as chairman of the House Administration Committee.

Responding to each of Judge Huvelle's 25 questions, Ney agreed that he had conspired to deprive the government of his "honest services," a fraud-related charge often used in public corruption cases.

Ney also acknowledged making false statements on his financial disclosure forms by concealing that Abramoff and a foreign businessman were the true source of gifts Ney received.

The gifts ranged from a trip to Scotland bankrolled by Abramoff's clients to thousands of dollars in gambling chips Ney got on two overseas junkets from foreign businessman Fouad al-Zayat, a Syrian-born aviation company owner in Cyprus.

"I allowed myself to get too comfortable with the way things have been done in Washington, D.C., for too long," Ney said in a written statement after his court appearance.

Ney said, "I never acted to enrich myself or to get things I shouldn't." Details of conspiracy suggested otherwise.

The congressman admitted he gave $5,000 from one gambling trip to a staff member to carry across the border so Ney could report a lower dollar amount to customs officials.

Ney agreed to push legislation helpful to Abramoff clients including Indian tribes and a foreign beverage distiller. Ney agreed to help al-Zayat get a visa to enter the United States and a legislative exemption to laws barring the sale of U.S.-made airplanes and parts to a foreign country.

Regarding Abramoff, Ney acknowledged accepting all-expenses-paid and reduced-price trips to play golf in Scotland in August 2002, to gamble and vacation in New Orleans in May 2003 and to vacation in New York in August 2003. The total cost of all the trips -- in which others, including some aides, participated -- exceeded $170,000, prosecutors said. The congressman also admitted accepting meals and sports and concert tickets for himself and his staff.

Ohio Republican Pleads Guilty In Bribery Case (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

The Ohio congressman will be out of office by his January sentencing. He may get at least two years in jail for dealings with Jack Abramoff.

WASHINGTON — Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) pleaded guilty Friday to bribery charges stemming from the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling investigation, becoming the first sitting congressman to confess to taking bribes in the scandal that continues to reverberate through the Republican-controlled Congress.

"I accept responsibility for my actions, and I am prepared to face the consequences of what I have done," Ney said in a statement distributed to reporters outside a federal courthouse.

Before Judge Ellen S. Huvelle, Ney pleaded guilty to conspiracy and making false statements. A month ago, in a plea agreement with prosecutors, Ney admitted that he accepted tens of thousands of dollars in illegal gifts and other largesse that included nights of casino gambling in London and a lavish golf junket to Scotland.

In return, Ney acknowledged, he used his legislative clout to do favors for Abramoff and for a Syrian businessman nicknamed the "Fat Man."

Sentencing is set for Jan. 19, by which time Ney, who is not seeking reelection, would no longer be serving in Congress. Some on Capitol Hill speculated that Ney, who has mounting legal bills, might try to stay in office a few more weeks to maintain a salary. Members of Congress earn at least $165,000 a year.

Ney's lawyer told the judge that the congressman would resign his seat in the next few weeks.

But House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), already feeling political heat over the page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley of Florida, could be pressured to push Ney from his committee seats when Congress reconvenes for a special session after the Nov. 7 election.

And House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) announced that he would introduce a resolution expelling Ney from the House as soon as Congress returns.

"Bob Ney has brought shame to himself and disgraced the Congress by betraying the bond entrusted to him as a public official," Sensenbrenner said. "No one — Democrat or Republican — should remain a member of the people's House after being convicted of criminal conduct while in office."

At the White House on Friday, Press Secretary Tony Snow signaled the distance the GOP will try to put between themselves and Ney in the run-up to the midterm election, where several major polls indicate voters are leaning Democratic.

"He ought to resign," Snow said. "What Congressman Ney did is not a reflection of the Republican Party, it's a reflection of Congressman Ney."

The 52-year-old Ney — a six-term Republican — could face a maximum prison term of 10 years, but Huvelle said prosectors were recommending 27 months. She said federal guidelines suggest he should be fined $5,000 to $60,000.

Ney left the courtroom Friday without speaking to reporters. On reaching a plea agreement last month, he said that alcohol abuse had contributed to a downward spiral in his life, and that he had checked himself into a rehab facility for treatment.

"A dependence on alcohol has been a problem for me," he said then. "I am not making any excuses, and I take full responsibility for my actions."

Until the Abramoff scandal, Ney was best known nationally for renaming the French fries in the House cafeteria "freedom fries" after France refused to support the U.S.-led war in Iraq. "This action today is a small, but symbolic effort to show the strong displeasure of many on Capitol Hill with the actions of our so-called ally, France," he said in March 2003.

After Ney announced he would not seek reelection, Republicans in Ohio's 18th district held a special primary in September, nominating state Sen. Joy Padgett.

DOJ_NMG_0081061

She faces Democrat Zack Space in a district that was once represented by Wayne Hays, the chairman of the House Administration Committee who resigned in 1976 after a much-publicized sex scandal involving his secretary Elizabeth Ray, who admitted, "I can't type. I can't file. I can't even answer the phone."

Ney Falls Victim To Abramoff Scandal (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

The scandal over Jack Abramoff, the crooked superlobbyist, claimed its first congressional victim on Friday when Bob Ney, a six-term Ohio congressman, formally pleaded guilty to criminal corruption charges that could see him face a jail sentence of up to 10 years.

After listening to a nine-minute litany of charges against him, including accepting thousands of dollars' worth of gifts, such as a $160,000 Scottish golfing trip with two of his aides, from the lobbyist, Mr Ney admitted that he had become "too comfortable with the way things have been done in Washington DC for too long" but blamed Mr Abramoff for using his name "to advance his own secret schemes of fraud and theft in ways I could have never imagined".

At the trial Mr Ney, who sought a plea bargain with prosecutors to limit his sentence to 27 months, said he would step down before he sentencing on January 19. However, the Republican leadership, including Dennis Hastert, the House speaker, scarred by criticism of their mishandling of the Mark Foley sex scandal, threatened to expel him on Friday when they return to Washington, saying there was "no place for him in Congress".

That threat was in contrast to decisions made just three weeks ago when Mr Ney first pleaded guilty to the charges. At that time, the Republican leadership – again, including Mr Hastert – made no calls for their colleague's resignation.

John Boehner, the House majority leader, said Mr Ney had made "big mistakes" but that it was up to him to decide to resign.

The White House echoed the new statement. Amid charges from Democrats that the Republicans were imbued with a "culture of corruption", Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, sought to deflect blame from the party to individuals.

"What congressman Ney did is not a reflection of the Republican party. It's a reflection of congressman Ney. And he ought to step down. We saw that with Duke Cunningham [a former Republican congressman who resigned last year in his own bribery scandal]. He took money; he stepped down. He should have."

The fallout from Mr Abramoff's largesse has continued to haunt Washington. Last week Susan Ralston, a White House aide to Karl Rove, the president's political adviser, abruptly re-sig-ned amid reports of her accepting gifts from Mr Arbamoff. On Thursday, the Democratic staff of the Senate finance committee charged several conservative not-for-profit groups with abusing their tax-exempt status by "laundering payments and then disbursing funds at Mr Abramoff's direction".

Congressman Pleads Guilty But Won't Resign For Now (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

WASHINGTON, Oct. 13 — Representative Bob Ney, the first member of Congress to confess to crimes in dealings with the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, pleaded guilty to corruption charges Friday but said he would not immediately resign.

Mr. Ney, Republican of Ohio, announced last month that he intended to plead guilty, admitting that in return for official acts, he had accepted tens of thousands of dollars' worth of gifts from Mr. Abramoff that included lavish trips, meals and tickets to concerts and sporting events. He faces a prison term of more than two years.

But what had not been expected at Friday's court hearing was Mr. Ney's disclosure that he intended to remain in Congress for now. The announcement appeared to surprise and infuriate House Republican leaders, who are trying to tamp down other scandals that are threatening to damage the party in next month's Congressional elections.

After learning that Mr. Ney would not step down immediately and would continue to draw his $165,200-a-year salary, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and other Republican leaders said they would move to expel him as soon as Congress returns next month for a postelection session.

"Bob Ney must be punished for the criminal actions he has acknowledged," they said in a statement. "He betrayed his oath of office and violated the trust of those he represented in the House. There is no place for him in this Congress."

The White House joined in calling for Mr. Ney to resign immediately. "What Congressman Ney did is not a reflection of the Republican Party," said Tony Snow, the White House spokesman. "It's a reflection of Congressman Ney, and he ought to step down."

Mark H. Tuohey, a lawyer for Mr. Ney, said during the hearing, at the Federal District Court in Washington, that the congressman would resign "in the next few weeks" but wanted to remain for now "to make sure his staff is taken care of" and to deal with constituent issues.

Congressional rules do not require the immediate departure of a member convicted of a crime. So unless his House colleagues act to expel him, Mr. Ney, who announced in August that he would not seek re-election, could choose to serve until his term ends in early January.

Mr. Ney, 52, appeared contrite but calm in his court appearance. Asked by Judge Ellen S. Huvelle for his plea to charges of criminal conspiracy and making false statements, he replied, "I plead guilty, Your Honor."

He said in a statement issued after the hearing that "I accept responsibility for my actions and am prepared to face the consequences of what I have done."

In announcing last month that he had reached a plea bargain with prosecutors, Mr. Ney said he was an alcoholic and was seeking treatment at an outpatient medical center. Asked by Judge Huvelle on Friday whether he was currently under any medical treatment, he replied, "Right now, alcohol, last 30 days."

The congressman is to be sentenced on Jan. 19. Under the plea agreement he could face 10 years' imprisonment, but prosecutors have said they will ask Judge Huvelle to limit the sentence to 27 months, and she is expected to agree. His lawyers said Friday that they would ask that he be placed in a prison with an alcoholism treatment program.

Mr. Abramoff, a former Republican fund-raiser who pleaded guilty in January to charges of conspiring to corrupt public officials, including Mr. Ney, is to begin a prison sentence of nearly six years next month.

In two weeks, David H. Safavian, a former Bush administration official, is to go before a federal judge here to receive a prison sentence for his conviction on charges of lying about his relationship to Mr. Abramoff, including the circumstances of a 2002 golfing trip to Scotland that was arranged by Mr. Abramoff for Mr. Ney, Mr. Safavian and others.

Ney Pleads Guilty To Corruption Charges (WP)

Lawmaker's Conviction Is 8th in Abramoff Probe

Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) pleaded guilty yesterday to corruption charges arising from the influence-peddling investigation of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, becoming the first elected official to fall in a scandal that may damage his party's chances in next month's elections.

Ney, 52, emerged from a month of alcoholism treatment to appear in federal court in Washington, where he admitted performing official acts for lobbyists in exchange for campaign contributions, expensive meals, luxury travel and skybox sports tickets. Ney also admitted taking thousands of dollars in gambling chips from an international businessman who sought his help with the State Department.

House Republican leaders, still struggling to blunt the impact of a scandal involving House pages, immediately vowed to expel Ney in a post-election session if he has not resigned by then. Ney's attorney said in court that the congressman will resign his seat in the coming weeks but wants to first take care of pending constituent matters and see that his staff is settled.

Ney, a six-term House member from a conservative district in eastern Ohio, appeared before Judge Ellen S. Huvelle and calmly acknowledged his guilt as Huvelle read a long list of favors Ney and Abramoff had done for each other. "That's accurate, Your Honor," Ney repeated again and again.

Ney made no statement to the court, but afterward he issued a written statement saying he was "ashamed" that his long career in public service has ended this way.

"I never acted to enrich myself or get things I shouldn't, but over time, I allowed myself to get too comfortable with the way things have been done in Washington D.C. for too long," Ney said. "I accepted things I shouldn't have with the result that Jack Abramoff used my name to advance his own secret schemes of fraud and theft in way I could never have imagined."

Ney is the eighth person convicted in the continuing federal investigation into Abramoff's activities. A federal task force that includes a dozen Justice Department prosecutors is investigating Abramoff's dealings with other congressional offices, including those of Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.), according to lawyers and witnesses involved in the probe.

Last month, Ney agreed to plead guilty to one count each of conspiracy and making false statements. His formal plea was delayed while he was in rehab. Yesterday, Ney was accompanied by a young staffer and a friend, Ellen Rattner, who told reporters that he did not want to drag his wife and children into court. "He's very happy he is sober," added Rattner.

Huvelle set sentencing for Jan. 19. The government has recommended that Ney be given 27 months in prison.

But Republican and Democratic leaders said they are prepared to move against him in November when the House returns from its recess. "Bob Ney must be punished for the criminal actions he has acknowledged," said a joint statement by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and Republican Conference Chairman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio). "He betrayed his oath of office and violated the trust of those he represented in the House. There is no place for him in this Congress. If he chooses not to resign his office, we will move to expel him immediately as our first order of business when Congress resumes its legislative work in November."

Ney announced in August that he would not seek reelection and resigned as chairman of the House Administration Committee; the head of that panel is known as the mayor of Capitol Hill.

The Ohio Republican had been a target of the investigation for a year and came under increasing pressure -- first in January with Abramoff's guilty plea and agreement to cooperate in the investigation, then with the guilty plea in May of his former aide Neil G. Volz, who admitted conspiring to corruptly influence the congressman and others. Ney admitted encouraging Volz to violate the one-year ban on lobbying by former staffers.

Ney accepted a stream of valuable things from Abramoff and the lobbyists he hired from Capitol Hill, among them Volz. The gifts included luxury vacations that prosecutors valued at more than $170,000. Ney, for his part, sought to insert four amendments into a 2002 election overhaul bill to benefit Abramoff's clients. He also admitted helping another client win a multimillion-dollar contract to provide wireless communication services to the U.S. Capitol.

The congressman admitted that he twice inserted comments in the Congressional Record aimed at bolstering a bid by Abramoff to buy a casino cruise line in Florida in 2000.

Abramoff is scheduled to report to prison next month for his conviction on bank-fraud charges in the Florida case. His partner in that deal, Adam Kidan, is slated to report soon to a minimum-security prison camp at Fort Dix, N.J.

As of August, Ney had spent $296,000 in campaign funds to pay for legal expenses this year, according to newly filed campaign reports.

By age 62, Ney could be eligible for a pension worth about 20 percent of the $165,100 congressional salary, or about $33,000 a year.

Earlier this year, Ney's committee passed ethics legislation to strip convicted lawmakers of their pensions, but the bill died in the House. Ney championed the provision, saying it was designed to hold "members of Congress and those they work with to the highest standards in order to ensure that those who abuse the public trust will be dealt with accordingly."

No Early Foley Complaints, Head Of Pages Says (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 13 — Representative John Shimkus, who has been chairman of the Congressional page program since 2001, said Friday that he was unaware of previous complaints about Mark Foley.

Mr. Shimkus, Republican of Illinois, said that had he known of the complaints about Mr. Foley, he would have handled concerns about Mr. Foley's e-mail messages to a page from Louisiana differently.

"There is stuff that everybody would have done differently," Mr. Shimkus said after testifying under oath for more than three hours before the House ethics committee. "Having 20/20 hindsight, a lot of things would have been different."

Mr. Shimkus said that he learned of concerns about Mr. Foley last fall and that he and the clerk of the House confronted Mr. Foley at a meeting in Mr. Foley's office.

Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned last month after a separate series of sexually explicit messages became known.

The ethics committee, which held a closed session, is investigating whether Republican leaders, particularly those inside Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office, had warnings before last year that Mr. Foley had a history of being overly friendly to pages.

A longtime adviser to Mr. Foley has testified that he asked Mr. Hastert's office to intervene at least three years ago, an account that the speaker's aides have denied.

As Mr. Shimkus left the hearing room in the Capitol basement on Friday afternoon, he declined to give details of his testimony, which was given to a bipartisan panel of four representatives and a team of investigators.

But speaking to reporters, Mr. Shimkus said, "The first time I had any indication that I needed to address Congressman Foley" was after being alerted to the e-mail exchange with the former page from Louisiana.

When asked whether Republican leaders had told him to exclude other members of the page board — a Republican, a Democrat and the House sergeant-at-arms — when ultimately confronting Mr. Foley last year, Mr. Shimkus replied, "I made the decision."

He did not elaborate.

It is the meeting in Mr. Foley's office late last fall, which Mr. Shimkus said ran no more than 45 minutes, that is of particular interest to the ethics committee. Mr. Shimkus said after the hearing on Friday that he and the clerk of the House, Jeff Trandhal, showed excerpts of the e-mail messages to Mr. Foley, who in Mr. Shimkus's account recoiled and promised to stop contact with the Louisiana teenager.

After the meeting, Mr. Shimkus said, he thought that Mr. Foley did keep his distance.

"I had no reason to believe there wasn't changed behavior," Mr. Shimkus said. "We would always do an end-of-the-year 'bye-bye' to the pages on the House floor, but Congressman Foley did not show this year. Historically, he always did.

"But this year, he wasn't there. So we thought the intervention may have been successful."

It was sexually explicit messages from years earlier, however, that led Mr. Foley to resign after ABC News acquired them. Those exchanges were a maddening disclosure, Mr. Shimkus said, and they have piqued his curiosity about whether anyone was familiar with previous reports of Mr. Foley's behavior.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

An Illinois lawmaker who as an overseer of House pages acted to stop former Rep. Mark Foley from e-mailing a Louisiana page in late 2005 testified for more than three hours yesterday before House investigators.

Rep. John Shimkus, who testified in private, told reporters later that in retrospect, he wished he had handled the episode last year differently.

"Having 20/20 hindsight, a lot of things would have been done differently," Mr. Shimkus said.

Mr. Shimkus has said he kept the two other House members overseeing the pages in the dark as he confronted Mr. Foley last fall. Mr. Shimkus, chairman of the House Page Board, has said he was following the wishes of the boy's parents by not telling the other two lawmakers of overly friendly e-mails sent by Mr. Foley to a former page.

A four-member ethics investigating panel, operating in closed session, is hearing key witnesses with knowledge of how Republicans handled several alarms raised about Mr. Foley's conduct over the past five years. The Florida Republican resigned Sept. 29 after he was confronted with sexually explicit instant messages sent to other former male pages -- not the episode that Mr. Shimkus testified about.

Mr. Shimkus said he testified to assist the investigators in finding out "who knew what, when and where."

Meanwhile in Arizona, a law-enforcement official said federal prosecutors have opened a preliminary investigation into a camping trip that an Arizona lawmaker took with two former pages and others in 1996.

Rep. Jim Kolbe, Arizona Republican, took the former pages as well as staff members and National Park Service officials on a Fourth of July rafting trip in the Grand Canyon in 1996, his spokeswoman, Korenna Cline, said yesterday.

An accusation related to the trip was given to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Phoenix, but it was not immediately clear whether it was related to any contention of improper activity by Mr. Kolbe.

The official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, described the inquiry as preliminary. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department declined comment.

Miss Cline said the rafting party included five current staffers, two former pages and Mr. Kolbe's sister. Nothing inappropriate happened on the trip, she said. She did not know who the pages were or what year they worked for Mr. Kolbe, but she said they paid their own way.

At the time of the trip, Mr. Kolbe, the only openly homosexual Republican in Congress, served on a subcommittee that oversaw the national park system. He visited the park to look at National Park Service operations and fire reconnaissance.

Mr. Kolbe, 64, was pulled into the unfolding scandal involving Mr. Foley when he said this week that a former page had complained in 2001 or 2002 about e-mails the page had received from Mr. Foley that made him feel uncomfortable. Mr. Kolbe said he referred the matter to the House clerk and that someone from Mr. Kolbe's office confronted Mr. Foley.

Police Find No Report Of A Foley Dorm Incident (WP)

By Charles Babington And Mary Beth Sheridan, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Witness in Scandal Alleged Then-Congressman Was Detained Outside Pages' Capitol Hill Residence

U.S. Capitol Police said yesterday that they have no record of an alleged incident in which then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) supposedly tried to enter a Capitol Hill dormitory for teenage pages.

The purported nighttime incident has been cited by lawmakers and a key witness in the scandal that involves Foley's interactions with congressional pages and the House's handling of the matter. Unlike sexually graphic electronic messages that Foley sent to teenage boys, evidence of the alleged dorm incident has proved elusive.

Yesterday, acting Capitol Police Chief Christopher M. McGaffin said his staff conducted electronic and hand searches of files covering several years but found no record of the alleged incident in which a drunken Foley supposedly was detained outside the pages' dorm in 2003 or earlier.

"I can't find anything that was written, in the way of a report, that would establish that that did occur," McGaffin said in a telephone interview. "Having said that, I don't know, maybe it occurred and there wasn't a report generated."

McGaffin said the search was complicated by the fact that he has received no details on when the alleged incident occurred and exactly what happened. "If, obviously, a crime was committed, a report would have been generated," he said.

In a separate interview this week, Terrance W. Gainer -- who was Capitol Police chief from June 2002 to April of this year -- said he recalled no mention of such an incident during his tenure.

The absence of a police report adds uncertainty to investigations by the FBI and the House ethics committee into furtive behavior that led to Foley's abrupt resignation two weeks ago. A central question for the bipartisan ethics committee is whether House GOP leaders and others had early warnings of Foley's objectionable behavior that should have prompted inquiries among current and former pages. House leaders might cite the lack of a police report as an indication that the dorm incident never happened or that it was kept so quiet that they had no way of knowing about it.

Meanwhile yesterday, the chairman of the small group that oversees the House page program testified for more than three hours before the four-member ethics subcommittee conducting the inquiry. Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), head of the Page Board, later told reporters that he "answered their questions honestly and forthrightly."

In hindsight, he said, "a lot of things would have been done different." But by dealing with Foley quietly in late 2005, Shimkus said, he honored the wishes of the parents of a Louisiana boy whose e-mail exchanges with Foley triggered the eventual exposure of far more sexually explicit messages with other youths.

Shimkus, a longtime ally of Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), said it was his decision to have only one other member of the Page Board -- then-Clerk Jeff Trandahl -- join him in confronting Foley last November about the Louisiana e-mails. Two other board members -- Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.) and Rep. Dale E. Kildee (D-Mich.) -- have said they should have been alerted and allowed to help decide how to deal with Foley.

Shimkus has said that Foley deceived him and Trandahl by assuring them that his actions were innocent. They ended the November meeting by instructing Foley to cease contact with the Louisiana boy, which he apparently did. Critics say Republicans' eagerness to keep the Foley allegations quiet prevented them from launching inquiries that might have uncovered the lawmaker's more sexually explicit communications with former pages in other states.

In his e-mails to the Louisiana boy, Foley had asked for a photograph and asked what the boy wanted for his birthday. The youth and his parents found the requests troubling, but Shimkus has said he lacked enough information to take strong action against Foley. Trandahl has not spoken with reporters or the ethics committee.

Word of the Louisiana e-mails, Shimkus told reporters yesterday, "was the first time that I had any indication that I needed to address Congressman Foley."

Sources familiar with the investigation say that former Foley chief of staff Kirk Fordham, who met with the House ethics panel Thursday, told members that he believes the alleged page dormitory incident took place, and that it was a sign that Foley was showing unseemly interest in teenage pages. Fordham has said he asked Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, to intervene with Foley, and that Palmer reported he did so. Palmer has denied Fordham's account.

In an Oct. 3 letter to House Clerk Karen L. Haas, Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) said a fellow GOP lawmaker had cited "rumors that there was an incident within the last several years when then-Congressman Foley in an intoxicated state was stopped by the Capitol Police from entering the Page Residence Hall."

Hastert says he knew of no concerns about Foley's behavior toward pages until the day the lawmaker resigned, Sept. 29. Hastert's office has acknowledged that three of the speaker's aides knew of the Louisiana e-mails but that they dealt with the matter by consulting with Trandahl and without telling Hastert or Palmer.

Hastert has said his staff handled the matter appropriately.

Kolbe Camping Trip Being Investigated (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Talhelm

AP, October 14, 2006

Federal prosecutors in Arizona have opened a preliminary investigation into a camping trip that an Arizona lawmaker took with two former pages and others in 1996, according to a law enforcement official.

Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., took the former pages as well as staff members and National Park Service officials on a Fourth of July rafting trip in the Grand Canyon in 1996, his spokeswoman Korenna Cline said Friday.

An allegation related to the trip was given to the U.S. attorney's office in Phoenix, but it was not immediately clear whether it concerned any contention of improper activity by Kolbe.

The official described the inquiry as preliminary and far narrower in scope than the federal investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., who resigned two weeks ago amid reports about sexually explicit e-mails he sent to pages.

A second law enforcement official said the 1996 trip may be too old to investigate as a criminal action. Both officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. A Justice Department spokeswoman declined comment.

Cline said the rafting party included five current staffers, two former pages and Kolbe's sister. Nothing inappropriate happened on the trip, she said. She did not know who the pages were or what year they worked for Kolbe, but she said they paid their own way.

Beth Kolbe, the congressman's younger sister who was on the three-night trip, said nothing inappropriate happened and that she had not heard of any concerns from anyone until the story of the camping trip appeared in the media.

"It's preposterous," she said of any allegations that taking the pages along was inappropriate.

She said the group included the then-deputy park superintendent and two rangers, who served as guides and interpreters. She said it was too hot to sleep in tents, so everyone slept out in the open by the water.

At the time of the trip, Rep. Kolbe served on a subcommittee that oversaw the national park system. He visited the park to look at National Park Service operations and fire reconnaissance.

Kolbe, 64, is the only openly gay Republican in Congress.

He was pulled into the unfolding Foley scandal when he said this week that a former page had complained in 2001 or 2002 about e-mails the page had received from Foley that made him feel uncomfortable. Kolbe said he referred the matter to the House clerk and that someone from Kolbe's office confronted Foley himself.

Kolbe, who is retiring this year after 22 years in the House, was a page from 1958 to 1960 for Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater.

He served on the board that oversees the page program between 1995 and February 2001. He frequently offers his home to former pages, interns, constituents and colleagues visiting Washington.

He is traveling in Europe and has declined interviews. Cline said he had not hired a lawyer in the matter.

Ex-Pages' Trip With Rep. Kolbe Examined (WP)

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

The U.S. attorney's office in Phoenix has opened a preliminary investigation of a 1996 camping trip that included Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) and two 17-year-old boys who had participated in the congressional page program, law enforcement officials said yesterday.

One official cautioned that the inquiry was based on allegations from one unidentified source that has not been substantiated. The allegations involve Kolbe's behavior toward one of the ex-pages, the official said.

The three-day trip down the Grand Canyon also included several Kolbe staffers and National Park Service employees, according to NBC News, which first reported the investigation. Kolbe's office said in a statement to NBC that "there is absolutely no basis and no truth" to any allegations of inappropriate behavior, and that the trip included five Kolbe aides, two former pages and Kolbe's sister.

Kolbe is one of several lawmakers who have become enmeshed in the scandal over former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

Kolbe said this week that a former page alerted his office several years ago about e-mails from Foley "that made him uncomfortable," and that the complaint was taken to Foley's office and the House clerk. Kolbe, a former member of the House Page Board, said he did not see the messages but was told they were sexually explicit.

Kolbe is the only openly gay Republican member of Congress. He is not seeking reelection next month.

FBI Investigates Rep. Curt Weldon (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Justice Department is investigating whether Republican Rep. Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania traded his political influence for lucrative lobbying and consulting contracts for his daughter, according to sources with direct knowledge of the inquiry.

The FBI, which opened an investigation in recent months, has formally referred the matter to the department's Public Integrity Section for additional scrutiny. At issue are Weldon's efforts between 2002 and 2004 to aid two Russian companies and two Serbian brothers with ties to strongman Slobodan Milosevic, a federal law enforcement official said.

The Russian companies and a Serbian foundation run by the brothers' family each hired a firm co-owned by Weldon's daughter, Karen, for fees totaling nearly $1 million a year, public records show.

Karen Weldon was 28 and lacked consulting experience when she and Charles Sexton, a Weldon ally and longtime Republican leader in Delaware County, Pa., created the firm of Solutions North America Inc. in 2002. Both are registered with the Justice Department as representatives of foreign clients.

Word of the inquiry, which has been closely held within the Justice Department and the FBI, comes from two individuals with specific knowledge of the existence of the investigation. They both declined to be identified because of the confidentiality of criminal investigations.

Spokesmen for the FBI and the Justice Department declined to confirm or deny that an inquiry is under way.

William Canfield, a lawyer who represented Weldon when a Los Angeles Times report prompted the House ethics committee to briefly explore the issue two years ago, said the congressman is unaware of a Justice Department investigation and is confident that none exists.

"Is there is an inquiry going on in the Justice Department?" Canfield asked. "The answer is no. . . . Curt knows nothing about this, his chief of staff knows nothing about it and I know nothing about it. I think we would have heard about it."

Canfield said Weldon, a 10-term House member who's vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and active in U.S. foreign affairs, dismissed the report as "crazy" while campaigning for reelection in a tight contest in Philadelphia's southwestern suburbs.

But McClatchy Newspapers' sources said the FBI only over the last few months obtained evidence suggesting that the congressman may have broken the law. One of the sources, a federal law enforcement official, said that Weldon had not yet been told about the inquiry.

The official said that the FBI recently sought the assistance of federal prosecutors in pressuring an unidentified person to provide evidence about the 59-year-old congressman. The attempt to "squeeze" this individual appeared to be an early step, the two sources said.

It is uncertain whether the current investigation will blossom into a full-blown inquiry that will result in criminal charges being filed. It is possible at this stage of the investigation that nothing will come of it. But the FBI typically does not seek the involvement of the Justice Department unless it finds substance to the evidence it has gathered.

Weldon, his daughter and Sexton all declined to respond to requests for an interview.

Joseph Fioravanti, a Media, Pa., lawyer representing Karen Weldon, sent a letter to McClatchy Newspapers declaring that "there is no investigation" and charging that a reporter was "harassing" and "baiting" her by leaving phone messages requesting comment.

Disclosure of the inquiry three weeks before the congressional elections presents a new headache for Republicans, who are already reeling from a series of scandals as they fight to retain House and Senate majorities.

In late September, Republican Congressman Mark Foley of Florida resigned after emails disclosed inappropriate messages to young male congressional pages. On Friday, Ohio Republican Rep. Robert Ney pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges relating to a corruption probe. Last month, Ney announced he wouldn't seek reelection. Two other Republicans, Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California and Tom DeLay of Texas, also have quit amid scandal.

In the Pennsylvania race, a recent poll showed that Weldon, who is vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and chairman of its Tactical Air and Land Forces Subcommittee, is locked in a statistical dead heat with his Democratic challenger, retired Vice Adm. Joe Sestak.

On Oct. 4, First Lady Laura Bush tried to give Weldon a boost, praising him at a fundraiser in Springfield, Pa., for supporting President Bush's tax cuts, backing legislation to conserve natural resources and being "a champion" of U.S. troops.

Weldon, the ninth child in a blue-collar family, worked as a firefighter and schoolteacher before turning to politics and becoming active in foreign policy issues. He has made more than 30 trips to Russia to push for closer relations with the United States.

Weldon is founder and chairman of the congressional U.S.-Former Soviet Union Energy Caucus and founder and co-chairman of an inter-parliamentary exchange with Russia, pressing for a partnership that will contribute to "peace and stability in the world." He also has met with senior officials in Libya and even in North Korea.

In 2004, The Los Angeles Times published a lengthy report that described the meteoric rise of Solutions North America, the consulting firm set up by Karen Weldon and Sexton.

The Times tracked Weldon's parallel efforts on behalf of the firm's three foreign clients, quoting Weldon and his top aide as denying any impropriety.

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a Democratic-leaning watchdog group, responded to the report by calling on the House ethics committee and Attorney General John Ashcroft to open investigations.

When the ethics panel did not act, Weldon insisted that the committee look into the allegations to clear his name. Canfield said he wound up sending a thick stack of documents to support Weldon's arguments that he did not discuss his daughter's clients with her and that his assistance to the three foreign interests was unrelated to Solutions' contracts.

Canfield said the panel conducted an informal inquiry and apparently dismissed the matter because he's heard nothing in more than two years. A spokesman for the committee, which rarely talks about its inquiries, did not respond to a request for comment.

What caused Karen Weldon to set up a lobbying firm is unclear. The Times reported that Philadelphia lawyer John Gallagher, who has worked with Representative Weldon on building relations with Russia, took credit for delivering Sexton and Weldon their first client: the Moscow-based Itera energy group.

According to the Times, Justice Department filings, congressional records and interviews by McClatchy Newspapers:

Rep. Weldon and a bipartisan congressional delegation had visited Itera in May 2002 during an official trip to Russia. Itera was drawing scrutiny at the time because of allegations that it had bought assets from a state-run energy giant for hundreds of millions of dollars below their true value.

Two months before Weldon's visit, the U.S. Trade and Development Agency scrapped plans to award an $868,000 grant to Itera to study gas deposits in Russia because the firm refused to identify all of its owners.

But Weldon, at a news conference after returning from Russia, called on the Bush administration to release the grant. The Philadelphia Inquirer reported in 2004 that Weldon also complained to presidential adviser Karl Rove and to then-energy secretary Spencer Abraham about the company's treatment by the U.S. government. The grant was never approved.

On Sept. 30, 2002, Itera signed a $500,000, one-year contract with Solutions North America, a deal that included a $170,000 payment up front. It also gave Solutions a 10 percent "finder's fee" for any sales it generated, an arrangement barred by federal contracting regulations.

On Sept. 24, 2002, six days before Solutions got the contract, Weldon introduced a House resolution encouraging "improved cooperation with the Russian Federation on energy development issues." That night, assisted by his daughter's firm, he hosted a dinner at the Library of Congress honoring Itera's chairman - an event attended by nearly 30 members of Congress and 18 members of the Russian Duma, that country's parliament.

On Jan. 10, 2003, Solutions landed a second client: a one-year, $20,000-a-month contract to represent a Russian firm that had designed a "flying saucer" drone to deliver supplies to war zones. Payments, however, would start only if Solutions landed some business for the firm, Saratov Aviation Plant. Another 10 percent finder's fee was included.

The congressman visited Saratov in Russia later that month, reportedly accompanied by his daughter. Weldon was impressed with the potential of the unmanned aircraft and contacted the Naval Air Systems Command, headquartered at the Patuxent River Naval Air Station in Maryland.

A Navair spokesman, Rob Koon, said Karen Weldon met with John Fischer, Navair's director of research and engineering sciences, in May 2003 to pursue the matter without Fischer knowing she was representing Saratov.

That September, at a meeting in Russia, Navair's Fischer and a Saratov executive signed a three-page letter of intent to work together on the new aircraft. But Navair spokesman Koon said the talks ended on Oct. 30, 2003.

Solutions got its third foreign client, the Serbian Karic Foundation, after Weldon took on the unpopular job of seeking a U.S. visa for Dragomir Karic and reportedly, one for his brother, Bogoljub.

DOJ_NMG_0081070

In the early 1990s, the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control had listed the Karic brothers among parties whose U.S. assets were frozen because of their close ties to Milosevic, who died in his cell last spring while facing war crimes charges stemming from the genocides in Bosnia. Recently, the Serbian Ministry of Internal Affairs issued an international warrant for the arrest of Bogoljub Karic as part of a tax evasion investigation.

The Karic Foundation agreed to pay Solutions $20,000 per month, to assist with its humanitarian work, including setting up a U.S. branch.

Solutions later paid more than $2,300 for Mike Conallen, who was Weldon's chief of staff at the time, to travel to Belgrade, Yugoslavia - a trip approved by Weldon, records show. Conallen later reimbursed the firm because members of Congress and their aides are barred from accepting money from foreign agents.

The Times quoted Conallen as saying he phoned the State Department so many times pushing for visas for the Karic brothers that he didn't have to say why he was calling. Conallen said he was surprised to learn of the current Justice Department inquiry, but declined further comment.

In late 2003, Sexton and Karen Weldon set up a new firm, Solutions Worldwide Inc., but ended their representation of Saratov even before the news stories broke.

Rep. Weldon Probed Over Contracts For His Daughter (WP/MCT)

The Justice Department is investigating whether Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) traded his political influence for lucrative lobbying and consulting contracts for his daughter, according to sources with direct knowledge of the inquiry.

The FBI has formally referred the matter to the department's Public Integrity Section for additional scrutiny. At issue are Weldon's efforts between 2002 and 2004 to aid two Russian companies and two Serbian brothers with ties to former Yugoslavian president Slobodan Milosevic, a federal law enforcement official said.

The Russian companies and a Serbian foundation run by the brothers' family each hired a firm co-owned by Weldon's daughter, Karen, for fees totaling nearly $1 million a year, public records show.

Karen Weldon was 28 and lacked consulting experience when she and Charles Sexton, a Weldon ally and longtime Republican leader in Delaware County, Pa., created the firm Solutions North America Inc. in 2002. Both are registered with the Justice Department as representatives of foreign clients.

Word of the inquiry, which has been closely held within the Justice Department and the FBI, came from two people with specific knowledge of the existence of the investigation. They both spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the confidentiality of criminal investigations.

Spokesmen for the FBI and the Justice Department declined to confirm or deny that an inquiry is underway.

Two years ago, the Los Angeles Times examined Curt Weldon's parallel efforts in Congress on behalf of the Russian and Serbian clients of his daughter, prompting the House ethics committee to briefly explore the issue.

Weldon, his daughter and Sexton all declined to respond to requests for an interview.

FBI Is Said To Be Probing Weldon Over His Influence (PHI)

By Todd Mason And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 14, 2006

The FBI is investigating whether U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon (R., Pa.) used his influence to help his daughter win consulting contracts, sources say, a development that could influence his close race for reelection.

Weldon's campaign denied that an investigation was underway. "Our attorney tells us it is preposterous," said Michael V. Puppio Jr., his campaign manager.

"The allegation in a tight race like this does the damage," Puppio said last night. "You owe a duty to dig a little deeper."

Weldon, who has served 10 terms in Congress, is running neck and neck with retired Navy admiral Joe Sestak.

The investigation, based in Washington, has progressed beyond the preliminary stages, people familiar with the case told The Inquirer yesterday. McClatchy Newspapers broke the story.

FBI spokeswoman Deborah Weierman in Washington declined comment. Weldon's lawyer in Washington, William B. Canfield III, could not be reached at work, at home or by e-mail last night.

Charles Sexton, a political ally of the congressman and a business partner of his daughter, said the timing of the leaks is "awful strange."

"No one has contacted me," he said. "People can look at us all day long. There is no wrongdoing."

Sexton and Karen Weldon, 32, formed a public relations firm, Solutions North America, in 2002, and won $1 million in contracts from two Russian energy firms and a Serbian family with ties to Slobodan Milosevic.

That business dealing was first reported in 2004 by the Los Angeles Times. Sources said the FBI and Justice Department investigation was based on the Times story.

The Inquirer reported in 2004 that Weldon had lobbied federal officials on behalf of one of those firms, Itera, a huge and controversial Russian natural gas company. Weldon also complained to Karl Rove, President Bush's top political adviser, about Itera's treatment by the federal U.S. Trade and Development Agency.

Itera paid $500,000 to Karen Weldon and Sexton's firm. The contract was signed in Sept. 30, 2002, six days after the congressman helped arrange a dinner at the Library of Congress to honor Itera and Igor Makarov, the firm's chief executive officer.

Itera had a controversial past; Western investors in the former Soviet Union contended that the firm's rapid growth was a result of improper business deals.

Weldon was a student of the Soviet Union, and has frequently traveled to Eastern Europe.

The business dealings of Weldon's family and friends are already an issue in the hotly contested Seventh Congressional District race. A recent poll showed Weldon locked in a statistical dead heat with Sestak. The Seventh District covers most of Delaware County and parts of Chester and Montgomery Counties.

Sestak declined to comment yesterday.

However, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, in a direct mailing this week, accused Karen Weldon of getting help from "Daddy."

"In Washington, politics is a family affair, and Curt Weldon sure knew how to steer our tax dollars into his own family's pockets," the flyer said.

Karen Weldon "has not lobbied me or any other congressman," Weldon told The Inquirer's editorial board Thursday. "My kids are allowed to seek employment," he said.

Weldon said he presented the question to the House ethics committee, which declined to pursue it.

The question dogs his campaign. At a recent fund-raising breakfast featuring Laura Bush at Springfield County Club in Delaware County, an enthusiastic Republican crowd greeted Weldon's references to his children with polite silence.

Yesterday, Sestak adviser David Landau said the investigation "raises in a very dramatic fashion that accountability and ethics issues are taking center stage."

"There is a pattern here," Landau said. "You have this whole K Street mentality," he said of a key Washington address for lobbyist firms.

At the editorial board meeting, Weldon defended his party's handling of ethics issues. "Congressmen have gone to jail," he said.

The scandals surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff and Reps. Duke Cunningham, Robert Ney and Mark Foley have hampered Republican candidates in this election.

Every investigation is different, but it is not uncommon for agents probing alleged corruption, drugs and organized crime to spend months, even years, working covertly on a case before the suspects learn that they are under scrutiny.

Sexton, a longtime Delaware County GOP leader, once operated a private security firm that provided security to the Kuwaiti Embassy in Washington.

Ex-governor to be jailed during appeal

Former Gov. George Ryan must surrender to prison early next year after a federal judge on Friday refused to let him remain free on bond while his appeal winds through court.

In a 32-page ruling issued Friday evening, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer rejected claims by the defense that Ryan's conviction was likely to be reversed on appeal.

The judge also refused to let Ryan's co-defendant, Lawrence Warner, put off prison pending his appeal.

Both Ryan and Warner learned of the adverse ruling in calls from Tribune reporters. Ryan declined comment, while Warner said he was disappointed but not surprised.

Warner's lawyer, Edward Genson, said he would seek to have the U.S. Court of Appeals review Pallmeyer's ruling. Attorneys for Ryan were unavailable for comment.

If the judge had ruled in their favor, Ryan and Warner could have remained free on bond for two years or more before their appeal was decided.

Ryan 72, who was sentenced to 6 1/2 years in prison, is scheduled to surrender to prison on Jan. 4. Warner, 67, is to begin his nearly 3 1/2-year prison term on Jan. 16.

The federal Bureau of Prisons has yet to announce where the two will serve their sentences.

Ryan has requested that he do his time in a federal prison camp in Oxford, Wis., while Warner sought a prison camp in Yankton, S.D., in order to attend an alcohol-treatment program there.

A federal jury convicted Ryan in April of steering millions of dollars in state business to Warner and other friends in return for vacations, gifts and other benefits to Ryan and his family.

Defendants in Chicago's federal court rarely remain free on bond pending appeal, but Ryan's lawyers argued that the controversial finish to the trial raised significant legal questions that warranted their release on appeal.

Eight days into deliberations, Pallmeyer excused two jurors who had concealed their arrest records during jury selection months earlier, added alternates in their place and ordered the jury to start deliberations anew.

The fact that she had publicly agonized over the decision, calling it a "close call," didn't qualify Ryan for bond, the judge ruled. "Countless decisions made by a district court in the course of a trial ... are `close calls' when made," she wrote.

Prosecutors opposed Ryan's remaining free, saying it would erode public confidence in the justice system. Furthermore, the defense is unlikely to win on appeal, the government argued.

Judge To Ryan: Go To Prison Jan. 4 (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, October 14, 2006

Former Gov. George Ryan has to report to prison Jan. 4, a federal judge ruled Friday, rejecting his request to remain free as he appeals a public corruption conviction.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer ruled Ryan must begin serving his 6½-year sentence even though defense lawyers argued they have a strong case for appeal.

"We're very pleased with the court's decision," U.S. attorney spokesman Randall Samborn said.

Ryan's lawyers did not immediately return a call for comment. Ryan also could not be reached for comment. Ryan's lawyer, Dan Webb, previously said that the prison term was like a death sentence for his client because he would be nearly 73 by the time he begins serving.

Defense lawyers had argued that Ryan shouldn't have to go to prison right away because they believe serious questions remain over Ryan's verdict. Deliberations were interrupted after eight days when two jurors were removed for failing to disclose criminal backgrounds.

'Investigated each allegation'Two new jurors were swapped in, and the newly formed jury convicted Ryan and businessman Lawrence Warner on 22 counts. Pallmeyer later threw out two of the counts but upheld the conviction. Ryan's trial lasted nearly six months.

But Ryan's lawyers argued there was further juror misconduct, including other jurors who gave misleading answers on their questionnaires and weren't tossed.

Pallmeyer rejected defense contentions, including that material brought in to the deliberation room was inappropriate enough to taint proceedings, that the foreperson had outside discussions about deliberations, then lied about it, and that the newly formed jury could not truly start over on its deliberations.

"The court investigated each allegation at the time ... and concluded either that the incident did not constitute misconduct at all, or that the conduct did not prejudice the defendants," Pallmeyer wrote.

Pallmeyer previously said she believes the defense "significantly overstated the degree of juror misconduct in this case."

Judge Denies Appeal Bond, Tells Ryan He Must Go To Prison (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, October 14, 2006

CHICAGO - A federal judge dashed George Ryan's hopes of avoiding prison while his corruption case is on appeal and ordered the former governor Friday to start serving his sentence in January as scheduled.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer rejected Ryan's claim that misconduct by members of the jury at the close of the six-month trial made it likely a higher court would throw out the verdict and therefore the 72-year-old former governor should stay out of prison in the meantime.

"The court now concludes that these issues of juror misconduct do not support defendants' motions for release pending appeal," she said.

The highly detailed 32-page order effectively told Ryan, who was convicted in April along with co-defendant Larry Warner at the close of a six-month trial, to start serving his 6 1/2 -year sentence Jan. 4 as scheduled.

Pallmeyer also denied an appeal bond for Warner.

One of Ryan's defense attorneys, Timothy J. Rooney, said the defense team would have no comment on the judge's decision Friday night.

Messages seeking comment were left Friday evening at Ryan's home and cell phone numbers.

It was not known whether Ryan's lawyers would be able to go to the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in an effort to get an appeal bond.

Prosecutors had opposed any appeal bond for Ryan. Such bonds are very unusual. Judges are supposed to grant appeal bonds only if there is substantial likelihood that a higher court will throw out the verdict.

"We are pleased with the court's decision," said a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, Randall Samborn. He had no further comment.

Ryan was convicted of racketeering conspiracy, fraud, tax offenses and lying to FBI agents. Prosecutors say that as secretary of state he steered millions of dollars in state contracts to Warner and other insiders.

In return, he received rewards ranging from vacations in Jamaica, Mexico and California to a free golf bag, prosecutors argued.

Witnesses testified that state employees and taxpayer dollars were used to run Ryan's campaigns while investigations were killed to cover up the exchange of bribes and campaign donations for truck drivers licenses.

The trial's biggest fireworks came after deliberations began.

Two jurors were dismissed and replaced with alternates after it was discovered that they had not disclosed their police records on pre-trial questionnaires. The decision came eight days into jury deliberations.

But Pallmeyer said it wasn't any guarantee of a reversal on appeal.

"The court's decision to seat alternate jurors was admittedly a challenging one when made, but it does not rise to the level of the kind of 'toss up' or 'close call'" that would warrant appeal bond, she said.

It later was discovered that some of the other jurors had had brushes with the law but they were not dismissed. Pallmeyer concluded their omissions were less serious.

Ryan attorneys are planning to focus the appeal in part on another juror's action in bringing unauthorized legal papers into the jury room.

But Pallmeyer concluded the papers "had no prejudicial effect on the verdict" and therefore "does not present a substantial question warranting release pending appeal." She also brushed aside an alleged conversation about the case that another juror had with an outsider.

5 Years For Dixon (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, October 14, 2006

Former state senator draws judge's criticism for lack of remorse in Tennessee Waltz sting

Former state senator Roscoe Dixon was sentenced to five years and three months in prison Friday by a judge who viewed him as unrepentant for his Tennessee Waltz bribery conviction.

U.S. Dist. Court Judge Jon McCalla handed down the sentence, the stiffest yet for a defendant in the FBI's undercover sting.

Advertisement

It came after a three-hour hearing in a packed courtroom during which the judge found Dixon had shown no acceptance of responsibility.

"The court has been listening for words it has not heard -- 'What I did was wrong,'" McCalla told the veteran legislator. "I'm still listening for those words."

Dixon, 57, testified that he was sorry he had gotten involved in the investigation, but offered no apologies and continued to maintain he was entrapped, a defense the jury rejected this summer.

"I want to hold all my options to have the right to appeal," said Dixon, whose character witnesses included ministers, civic leaders and neighborhood activists. "I do want to say I'm sorry I caused my friends who are so proud of me to to have doubts about Roscoe Dixon. I too am human, but God is not through with me yet."

The former Democratic legislator will remain free on his own recognizance until he is notified when and where to report by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons, probably in several months.

The three-year-old Tennessee Waltz investigation, which prosecutors have said is ongoing, has resulted in the indictment of 12 elected officials and aides.

He is the third defendant to be sentenced to prison. Four others are awaiting sentencing and five others are set for trial.

Dixon was convicted June 8 on each of five counts of accepting payoffs from former associates and undercover FBI agents posing as crooked businessmen willing to pay for legislation favorable to their fictitious company, E-Cycle Management.

Many of the conversations and three money transactions totaling $9,500 were secretly recorded on audio and video that was shown to jurors during his seven-day trial. To show jurors he was predisposed to such conduct, prosecutors presented evidence that Dixon previously had accepted a $6,000 bribe which was not part of the indictment.

His catch phrase for agreeing to accept payoffs, as shown on the tapes, was "Keep Barry happy," a reference to aide and confessed bagman Barry Myers.

Dixon testified that he was set up and that he felt he was simply accepting financial support or campaign contributions with no favors expected in return.

Federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza acknowledged that Dixon had made valuable contributions to the community over the years as an elected official, but he said the ex-senator had betrayed the public trust and had shown in court "almost a defiance of the rule of law."

As defense attorney Coleman Garrett began expounding on the entrapment defense, that "that government manufactured this crime," McCalla quickly stopped him and delivered a sharp but carefully worded rebuke.

"This case occurred because a public official took money," the judge said. "The great disservice in this case is when public officials or legislators attack this sacred system. When a public official tells people to distrust the system, one that's worked well for hundreds of years, the corrosive effect on the community is great. That's wrong. Somebody has to say it."

McCalla then called the lawyers into his chambers for a private discussion that lasted about 15 minutes.

After the hearing, Garrett declined to say what was said behind closed doors but maintained that Dixon is still entitled to argue his defense of entrapment.

"What we're not giving proper deference to is the entrapment defense," Garrett told reporters. "The government is not sacrosanct. There's nothing wrong with challenging it."

McCalla sentenced Dixon to the low end of the federal guideline range of 63 to 78 months.

He ruled that the sentence was appropriate because Dixon had obstructed justice by testifying falsely, that he accepted multiple bribes totaling more than $10,000 and that he was a public official.

Ex-senator Dixon Sentenced To Five Years For Bribery (KNOXNS/AP)

By Woody Baird, Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), October 14, 2006

MEMPHIS - Former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon, the first lawmaker to go to trial in the bribery scandal called Tennessee Waltz, drew a sentence Friday of five years and three months in federal prison.

Dixon, 57, is the first lawmaker to go to trial in the public corruption investigation but the second to be sentenced.

Former state Rep. Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, pleaded guilty to bribery last year and was sentenced to one year in prison. Three other current or former state lawmakers are awaiting trial.

Judge Jon McCalla told Dixon and a courtroom full of supporters that statements of remorse can go a long way toward reducing a lawbreaker's punishment.

"I'm still waiting for those words," the judge said.

Dixon, a longtime Democratic lawmaker and community activist, told McCalla he hoped to get "consideration ... for my entire life."

"I'm sorry that I, too, am human, but God is not through with me yet," Dixon said.

After sentencing, Dixon continued to argue that he was tricked into taking money from FBI agents posing as crooked businessmen wanting a change in state law.

He said he declined admitting guilt because "I wanted to hold all my options open because I'm going to appeal."

Dixon, who is black, has argued that he was targeted by federal investigators because of his race.

McCalla said he saw "not one shred of evidence" of government wrongdoing and admonished Dixon for comments that could undermine the public's faith in the judicial system.

"That's wrong Sen. Dixon. That's wrong," McCalla said.

Undercover agents made bribes available to many lawmakers and other public officials, the judge said, and "some accepted and some did not. That's what happened."

After sentencing, Dixon was released without bond to await notice from federal officials on where he should report to prison. He has no chance of parole and will be on probation for two years after his release.

Dixon was convicted in June on five bribery and extortion charges carrying a statutory maximum punishment of 90 years in prison. But federal guidelines for a first-time offender called for a sentencing range of five years and three months to six years and six months.

McCalla refused defense requests to alter the mathematical formula on which the guidelines were based or to hand down a sentence below the lower range. He agreed with prosecutors on increasing the sentencing formula, saying Dixon lied in court and took numerous payoffs.

Dixon's indictment listed bribes adding up to $9,500, but McCalla agreed with prosecutors that the total was $15,500, including payoffs that preceded the Tennessee Waltz investigation.

Prosecutors said Dixon split those bribes with former associate Barry Myers, who pleaded guilty and testified against him.

"Public officials should recognize ... that they must be held accountable if they break the law," U.S. Attorney David Kustoff said. "Today's sentencing of Mr. Dixon demonstrates this very principle."

The Tennessee Waltz scandal rocked the state Legislature when indictments were made public last year and led to a special session on ethics reforms.

The investigation focused on an FBI front company, E-Cycle Management, which sought government help in setting up business in Tennessee. The investigation has led to charges against 11 defendants, including several local officials in Memphis and Chattanooga.

Overall, four defendants have pleaded guilty and two, including Dixon, have been convicted at trial. Among those awaiting trial are Sen. Ward Crutchfield, D-Chattanooga, and former Memphis Sens. Kathryn Bowers and John Ford, also Democrats.

Ex-Detective Is Given 7-Year Prison Term (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

In a Brooklyn courtroom packed with his family, friends and neighbors, a retired police detective who had admitted to stealing roughly $800,000 from drug dealers delivered a tormented apology yesterday, moments before a judge sentenced him to seven years in federal prison.

Sobbing as he described how a voracious gambling addiction drove his thefts and led to a separation from his wife, the detective, Thomas Rachko, 48, also spoke of his two sons, 11 and 13 years old, who were not in court.

He said the boys had read many times of his successes during his 20-year police career, only "to be forced because of my hideous actions to read about my disgusting behavior."

"I just can't believe I did what I did to them," Mr. Rachko told Judge Carol B. Amon of United States District Court in Brooklyn.

A big man with close-cropped silver hair, he rubbed his hand over his face as his voice quavered.

"I am so sorry, but by the same token, your honor, I am here today to be punished," he said. "I deserve to be punished. What I did was horrendous. I can't believe I did it, but it is deserving of punishment."

Mr. Rachko, who retired from the Police Department in 2002, had faced life in prison on narcotics conspiracy charges arising from his significant role in the department's biggest scandal in a decade. His sentencing brought the criminal investigation to a close.

He was arrested on Nov. 26, 2003, just hours after he and his old partner, Julio C. Vasquez, were captured on videotape stealing $169,000 from a drug money courier. He began cooperating with the authorities almost immediately, and the theft unraveled a web of corruption — thefts of drug money and drugs that Mr. Vasquez helped sell for cash. As many as 10 current or retired police detectives and supervisors were implicated.

Mr. Rachko, who before he retired was assigned to the Northern Manhattan Initiative, a narcotics unit that focused on drug dealers in Harlem and Washington Heights, spent his drug plunder betting on horses. He sometimes collected his illicit take right outside Off-Track Betting parlors so he could go back in and gamble some more.

But he stressed to the judge that he was not seeking to lessen the gravity of his crimes by citing his addiction.

"I do not use gambling as an excuse for what I did, your honor," he said. "I knew when I did what I did I was doing wrong, and I was breaking the law. I just did not have the courage or the proper mind-set to stop. I knew because of the fact that for most of my years I was a good detective, I knew that I was going to get caught. But I just could not control myself."

He told the judge that his gambling addiction placed a tremendous burden on his family. He also apologized to his community, a Bronx neighborhood, whose residents turned out with his family to support him, filling every seat on the courtroom's polished wooden benches. He said he never bought anything for himself, adding that the dark gray suit in which he was sentenced was given to him as a gift 10 years ago.

"Yes, I was greedy for that money," he said. "Almost like a — a junkie would be for a bag of heroin. I just wanted that money to gamble."

His lawyer, Jeffrey Lichtman, had pleaded with the judge to look at some of the positive things Mr. Rachko had done, citing his work as a detective before he began committing crimes, and his extensive volunteer work in the Bronx.

The prosecutor, Adam Abensohn, an assistant United States attorney, said some of his colleagues had known Mr. Rachko before his arrest, and "liked him, trusted him and believed him."

Before pronouncing sentence, Judge Amon called his crimes a "horrible breach of the public trust." But she noted that he was remorseful and had cooperated, as detailed in a prosecution letter that enabled her to mete out a lighter sentence than the statutory minimum of 10 years and the maximum life term advised by sentencing guidelines.

The proceeding yesterday brought to an end the three-year investigation by the El Dorado Task Force, the anti-money-laundering unit of Immigration and Customs Enforcement of the Department of Homeland Security that videotaped the $169,000 theft, and by F.B.I. agents and the police Internal Affairs Bureau investigators.

Mr. Vasquez was sentenced to six years in prison. John Maguire, a retired lieutenant, was sentenced to 14 months, and Carlos Rodriguez, a former detective, was sentenced to two years. Another detective was fired after a police administrative hearing, and the department is seeking to fire two more.

After the sentencing, an F.B.I. agent who worked on the case shook Mr. Rachko's hand. Then, the retired detective, who will keep his police pension and pay a $10,000 fine after serving his prison term and five years of supervised release, walked into the courtroom gallery and held his wife in a long embrace as both wept. He then hugged several supporters who had filled the benches.

Ex-cop Gets 7 Years In Scheme (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 14, 2006

A tearful ex-cop begged for mercy Friday and got it when a federal judge in Brooklyn sentenced him to 7 years in prison, much less than the possible life term he faced for ripping off hundreds of thousands of dollars from drug dealers.

Thomas Rachko, 46, of the Bronx, told Judge Carol B. Amon that his compulsive gambling helped push him to steal the drug money over a five-year period in a scandal that implicated a number of other officers.

"Every time I got money, I gambled it away right away," Rachko told Amon. "And I now realize it wasn't so much to try to have that big win. I just wanted to gamble. I wanted the action."

Rachko, who retired from the NYPD in 2002, pleaded guilty in 2004 to charges that he was involved in a scheme in which he and others ripped off the dealers and hoarded the cash.

He was arrested in late November 2003 with then-Det. Julio Vasquez after they were both spotted by members of a drug enforcement task force taking cash from a drug trafficker in Queens.

Friday, defense attorney Jeffrey Lichtman reminded Amon that it had been Rachko who made the quick decision after his arrest to cooperate with investigators and led them to $68,000 stashed in a trash container in the Bronx.

Investigators said Rachko told them he pulled in about $800,000 from the scheme.

Because Rachko was perceived by prosecutors to have obstructed justice, he could have faced life in prison under federal sentencing guidelines. But Lichtman argued that, in the end. his client didn't obstruct justice and did nothing worse than Vasquez. Vasquez was sentenced earlier this month to 6 years in prison.

"This isn't a greedy man," added Lichtman.

Rachko, who often dabbed tears from his face with a handkerchief as Lichtman spoke, struggled to maintain his composure when he addressed Amon.

"My crimes, as terrible as they are, and my gambling addiction, in early 2003, caused me to be separated from my wife, Sandy, an unwanted separation by myself," said Rachko through sobs.

"I am here today to be punished. I deserve to be punished," said Rachko to Amon. "I humbly ask for your mercy today not only for myself, but for my continued recovery and for my children."

Amon said Rachko's crimes were "extraordinarily grave" and that he had a leadership role in the scheme. But she acknowledged that he was contrite and showed remorse.

In addition to the prison sentence, Amon fined Rachko $10,000. She allowed him to surrender to federal prison officials early next year. Rachko remains free on bail until then.

COP'S CRYING SHAME (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, October 14, 2006

October 14, 2006 -- A disgraced NYPD detective sobbed uncontrollably as he told a Brooklyn judge he robbed drug dealers not out of greed - but to feed his high-stakes gambling habit.

"I do not use gambling as an excuse for what I did," said Thomas Rachko, who gambled away roughly $800,000 in drug money he plundered over a five-year period until being busted for stealing $169,000 from a drug courier in Queens in November 2003.

"I knew when I did what I did I was doing wrong and I was breaking the law - but I just could not control myself," the retired 20-year veteran told Brooklyn federal court Judge Carol Amon, who sentenced him to seven years in prison yesterday.

He told the judge he was always looking for action, "almost like a junkie would be for a bag of heroin. I just wanted that money to gamble."

The hulking Rachko, 48, choked up as he explained how his "hideous actions" dishonored the NYPD and the people who live around him in the Riverdale section of The Bronx who showed up in droves and packed the courtroom to support him.

But he burst into tears when he apologized to his wife and two sons - who were not in the courtroom - for having "to read about my disgusting behavior."

Jeffrey Lichtman, Rachko's lawyer, pointed to many good things Rachko did as a cop and noted that he was the first to come forward and spill the beans about other crooked cops after he and former partner Julio Vasquez - who was sentenced last week to six years - were arrested.

"He deserves punishment, there's no question," said Lichtman. "But he also deserves compassion."

The judge apparently agreed, stating that, "I believe Mr. Rachko is remorseful and his statements are genuine."

She could have meted out a life sentence, but felt seven years was appropriate, since he pleaded guilty in June 2004 and will have to pay a $10,000 fine when he finishes five years' probation.

Rachko's court days may not be over, however.

Two convicted drug dealers freed following the arrests of Rachko and Vasquez have filed federal civil-rights lawsuits against the two rogue cops and the city.

Bertrand Canty and Nelson Belliard are seeking $56 million for false arrest, negligence, battery and other claims.

New York Daily News, October 14, 2006

A disgraced former NYPD detective told a federal judge yesterday his compulsive gambling led him to steal more than $800,000 from drug dealers.

Thomas Rachko, 48, was sentenced to seven years in prison after telling Brooklyn Federal Judge Carol Amon how gambling cost him his career and marriage.

"I just lost complete control of my mind and continued to gamble," Rachko said, sobbing. "Every time I got money I gambled it right away. And now I realize it wasn't so much to try to have that big win. I just wanted to gamble. I wanted the action."

Rachko was the ringleader of a group of corrupt narcs that robbed dealers of cash and drugs with impunity for years in upper Manhattan.

"I knew I was doing wrong and I was breaking the law; I just did not have the courage or the proper mind-set to stop," he said.

After his marriage fell apart, he gambled even more. "I was greedy for that money, almost like a junkie would be for a bag of heroin," he said.

Rachko was facing life in prison for his leadership role. But prosecutor Adam Abensohn said he deserved a break because he cooperated with authorities after he and his ex-partner, Detective Julio Vasquez, were caught in 2003 robbing a drug courier in Queens.

Long Island Newsday, October 14, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) _ A retired police detective who stole nearly $800,000 in drug money sobbed and apologized for his crime before a judge sentenced him to seven years in prison.

Thomas Rachko, 48, said he stole because he needed money to fuel a gambling addiction.

"I deserve to be punished," he told U.S. District Judge Carol Amon, before she rendered the sentence in a Brooklyn court. "What I did was horrendous. I can't believe I did it, but it is deserving of punishment."

Rachko, 48, could have gotten up to life in prison on the narcotics conspiracy charges.

The case was part of a damaging corruption scandal at the police department. Rachko and his one-time police partner, Julio Vasquez, were caught on tape stealing $169,000 from a drug courier.

Confronted with the evidence, Rachko, who retired from the police department in 2002, began cooperating with investigators and helped provide evidence that led to charges against several other police detectives.

Amon called Rachko's crime a "horrible breach of the public trust," but gave him credit for helping with the investigation, and ultimately less time than the 10 year minimum he would have faced if he had refused to cooperate.

Vasquez also cooperated and was sentenced to six years in jail earlier this month for stealing and reselling cocaine. He resigned after his arrest in 2003.

Vermont Student's Body Is Found (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

A University of Vermont student who had been missing since last weekend was found dead yesterday near a gorge about 15 miles from campus, and the police identified as a suspect a man she had borrowed a cellphone from in downtown Burlington, Vt.

Chief Thomas Tremblay of the Burlington police said the body of Michelle Gardner-Quinn, a 21-year-old senior from Arlington, Va., was found off the side of a road in Richmond, Vt., near a popular swimming site called Huntington Gorge.

Chief Tremblay said Ms. Gardner-Quinn's death was a homicide, and he identified Brian Rooney, 36, of Richmond as a "very likely suspect."

Chief Tremblay said Mr. Rooney had been arrested yesterday afternoon on charges unrelated to Ms. Gardner-Quinn's death. He said those charges, of sexual assault and lewd and lascivious conduct with a child, involved incidents in Caledonia County, about 75 miles from Burlington, before Ms. Gardner-Quinn's disappearance.

The disappearance of Ms. Gardner-Quinn prompted an exhaustive search by the police, the F.B.I. and legions of volunteers from the university community, many of them students shocked at the prospect that a kidnapping might have occurred in a city normally considered safe.

She was last seen about 2:30 a.m. last Saturday while walking on Main Street in Burlington with Mr. Rooney, whom she had not met before. The police said she had been at bars celebrating a friend's birthday and was walking back to campus when her cellphone battery died and she stopped Mr. Rooney to ask to use his.

A surveillance camera at Perrywinkles Fine Jewelry store captured images of Ms. Gardner-Quinn and Mr. Rooney on Main Street.

Man Questioned in Death Of Senior From Arlington

The body of a missing college senior from Arlington was found yesterday off a rural road near the University of Vermont. Police said that the man with whom she was last seen six days ago was arrested on unrelated sex assault charges and was being questioned about her death.

Burlington Police Chief Thomas Tremblay said the body was tentatively identified as that of Michelle Gardner-Quinn, 21. The body was discovered about 15 miles southeast of downtown Burlington, near a swimming hole popular among college students and residents, Tremblay said.

He said it was not yet known how Gardner-Quinn was killed or when her body might have been left at the spot. Police said they are investigating her death as an apparent kidnapping and homicide.

"We are not done yet," Tremblay said in an afternoon news conference at Burlington's City Hall. "There is still more work to be done."

Gardner-Quinn -- whose disappearance last Saturday was the focus of an intense investigation that fanned across several nearby communities -- was last seen walking from Burlington's downtown area toward campus, about five blocks away.

A surveillance camera captured her walking with Brian Rooney, 36, a construction worker who lent her his cellphone so she could call friends after the battery in her phone died, police said.

Rooney, of nearby Richmond, Vt., has not been charged in Gardner-Quinn's slaying, Tremblay said, although he was being interviewed by detectives last night. Tremblay said Rooney was charged yesterday with sexual assault and lewd and lascivious conduct with a child in Caledonia County, about 80 miles east of Burlington. He declined to elaborate on the charges.

Rooney is to be arraigned Monday on those charges, Tremblay said.

The disappearance and death of Gardner-Quinn was at least the third such incident in the past year involving a female college student. The body of University of Virginia student Elizabeth M. Hafter, 22, was found Oct. 1 along the Blue Ridge Parkway with a single gunshot wound to the head after she had been missing a few days. And in September 2005, Virginia Commonwealth University freshman Taylor Behl was found slain in rural Mathews County. Behl, 17, of Vienna, was found one month after she was reported missing from the Richmond campus.

Yesterday, Tremblay urged anyone with information about Gardner-Quinn's case to call authorities. He said an autopsy was scheduled for this weekend.

After several days with few leads, the investigation quickened midafternoon yesterday. While Vermont State Police canvassed the swimming hole, authorities cordoned off a half-block in a residential neighborhood in Burlington not far from where Gardner-Quinn was last seen.

Using various tools, they dug out an area in the back yard of a house where concrete had been poured this week, according to the Associated Press and Burlington television stations. The house was somehow connected to Rooney, they reported.

Gardner-Quinn, a senior majoring in Latin American studies and environmental science, was reported missing after she failed to show up for a planned dinner with her parents last Saturday. They had traveled to Burlington for parents' weekend at the college.

Gardner-Quinn was a 2003 graduate of H-B Woodlawn Secondary Program, an academically rigorous magnet school at which students have a large say in the curriculum.

Tommy Lang, 21, a University of Vermont senior who grew up with Gardner-Quinn, told the Associated Press yesterday that nothing seemed amiss when she called him from Rooney's cellphone just before her disappearance.

"She sounded completely fine and normal and exactly the way she did when she left us," said Lang, who had been hanging out with Gardner-Quinn and others for a friend's 21st birthday celebration. "There wasn't anything that made me worry or made me suspicious that anything was going on."

Yesterday, after posting numerous optimistic messages online praying for Gardner-Quinn's safe return, friends began leaving messages of mourning.

"Michelle you were one-in-a-million," wrote her friend Elizabeth Oliphant on Facebook.com, a social networking site popular among college students. "I am heartbroken for your family -- they will stay in my thoughts and prayers for a long time. You will be missed dearly."

Gail Fendley, a longtime family friend, said in a telephone interview yesterday that she considered Gardner-Quinn a part of her family. Her son, Ian Willson, 22, had grown up with Gardner-Quinn, and the two had dated in recent years. Yesterday, Fendley sat sobbing inside her vehicle, parked on a street in Richmond, Va., where her son attends college.

"It's not that every life doesn't matter, but this is one who would've made the world a better place," Fendley said. "I just can't imagine how someone could hurt our Michelle."

Worst Fears Come True In Vt. Search (BOS)

Student's body is discovered; area man held

BURLINGTON, Vt. -- Hikers near a rural gorge yesterday found the body of a University of Vermont student who disappeared a week ago while walking back to her dormitory on a downtown Burlington street, police said.

Police said 21-year-old Michelle Gardner-Quinn had apparently been slain, and identified Brian L. Rooney, 36, of nearby Richmond, as the suspect in a crime that has deeply unnerved this bucolic college town. Rooney, who police say is the last person seen with Gardner-Quinn, was arrested yesterday on unrelated sexual assault charges.

As ashen-faced Burlington Police Chief Thomas Tremblay announced ``with a heavy heart'' that the six-day search for Gardner-Quinn had ended, the outgoing student's friends sobbed, their worst fears realized.

``I don't even know what I'd say,'' said Adam Briere, 19, a close friend.

University of Vermont president Daniel Mark Fogel said he was devastated. ``All of us are filled with intense anguish and sorrow at the terrible news and the loss of one of our students,'' he said in an interview.

While awaiting autopsy results to confirm the identity of the body and cause of death , police would not describe how Gardner-Quinn had been killed, say whether she had been sexually assaulted, or say how long she had been dead. More crime scene processing is needed before Rooney could be linked to Gardner-Quinn's death, Tremblay said.

The student was reported missing last Saturday after she failed to show up for an outing with her parents, who had been visiting Burlington from Arlington, Va. Gardner-Quinn, who majored in Latin American history and environmental studies, had transferred in September from a college in Baltimore.

As her parents kept vigil in Burlington, Vermont police, FBI agents, and National Guard troops, augmented by eager students and other volunteers from the university, scoured Burlington and the surrounding area.

But yesterday's discovery came about through a phone call from a group of hikers alerting authorities to a body in an area that had not been searched, the bank of Huntington Gorge, a popular swimming hole in Richmond, about 15 miles from Burlington. On Tuesday, police searched a house near where the body was found that they said was related to Rooney.

Rooney had been the focus of the investigation for days, though until yesterday police had refused to identify him or call him a suspect. Police had interviewed him and knew his whereabouts for most of the week before his arrest yesterday.

Gardner-Quinn made a call from Rooney's cellphone, and a jewelry store surveillance camera captured the two walking on Main Street in downtown Burlington at roughly the same time, police said. Yesterday, police asked for the public's help in tracking the whereabouts of a red Jeep Cherokee belonging to Rooney. Police said they have searched the vehicle, but urged anyone who might have seen the Jeep between last Saturday morning and Monday morning to call investigators.

Rooney's former father-in-law described him as an erratic and abusive man unable to hang on to jobs and chronically behind on child support payments.

``He's the scum of the earth,'' Roger Martin of Craftsbury, Vt., said in an interview this week. ``He'd make my daughter do things she didn't want to do. . . . If she didn't do it, he'd say he'd hurt himself.''

Rooney was $13,000 behind in child support to Martin's daughter, with whom he has an 8-year-old girl, Martin said. He also said that Rooney often sniffed gasoline and aerosol cans to get high.

Rooney, most recently employed as a construction worker, has been accused of violence toward women in the past, court documents show.

A 23-year-old former girlfriend sought a restraining order in November 2005, alleging that Rooney ``has been sexually and emotionally abusive."

``I don't feel safe going anywhere by myself, because he shows up everywhere I go," wrote the woman, with whom Rooney had another child. ``Brian is always driving by my house, following me, calling."

Rooney will be arraigned Monday on charges of sexual assault and lewd and lascivious conduct with a child, police said. The alleged crimes happened in Caledonia County and Essex County, about 80 miles from Burlington, before Gardner-Quinn's disappearance, but police said they only discovered them while investigating Rooney this week.

The child sex charge stemmed from an action in 1998, according to Essex County State's Attorney Vincent Illuzzi.

Gardner-Quinn's disappearance prompted a sense of vulnerability in Burlington, where three colleges dominate daily life. Confirmation of her death, which quickly rippled across the city yesterday afternoon, appeared to deepen those concerns.

Women around campus said they would be more cautious, particularly at night.

``I'm definitely not going to walk anywhere alone," said Kerrie Keller, an 18-year-old freshman from Maine. ``My parents called me and asked me please not to walk anywhere alone."

At J.P.'s Pub, where Gardner-Quinn was celebrating a friend's birthday in the hours before she vanished, bartender Amy Delorme pulled the missing person fliers off the walls after news of the body's discovery.

``I saw it on the TV, so I just took them down," she said, shaking her head. ``People are just so sad."

Autopsy Performed On Vt. College Senior (WP/AP)

By John Curran, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

BURLINGTON, Vt. -- A man authorities are investigating in the case of a University of Vermont senior who was found dead along a ravine was being held without bail on unrelated charges Saturday while an autopsy was performed on the victim.

Brian L. Rooney, a construction worker from Richmond with a record of several arrests, was taken into custody Friday, the same day hikers happened upon the body of Michelle Gardner-Quinn near Huntington Gorge, a popular swimming hole.

Gardner-Quinn had disappeared nearly a week earlier while walking to her dormitory.

The cause of her death had not been released. The autopsy was ongoing Saturday but results would not be released this weekend, said police Lt. Kathleen Stubbing. She said it would likely be at least a week before any charges can be brought in the case.

Meanwhile, a memorial service for Gardner-Quinn was scheduled for Sunday night at the University of Vermont in Burlington.

Rooney, 36, was arrested Friday on unrelated charges of sex abuse elsewhere in Vermont. He was jailed without bail on those charges Saturday, pending a Monday arraignment. He had not been charged in Gardner-Quinn's case, but is considered the prime suspect in her disappearance and death, Police Chief Thomas Tremblay said.

Gardner-Quinn, 21, of Arlington, Va., was last seen alive in the early morning of Oct. 7 as she walked up Main Street after celebrating a friend's birthday at downtown bars.

Authorities said that in a chance encounter she asked Rooney to borrow his cell phone to make a call because the battery in hers had gone dead. She made the call and was seen, on surveillance video from a jewelry store camera, walking alongside Rooney.

Gardner-Quinn was reported missing later that day when she failed to make a dinner date with her parents.

Because of the surveillance video, Rooney had been the focus of the investigation.

Days later, Rooney was seen with cuts on his hands when he stopped at Walt's Game Room, a candy store and pool parlor in Winooski, where he was a regular customer, owner John Barton said Saturday. It was either Monday or Wednesday, Barton said.

"He looked very down and depressed," said Barton, who asked Rooney about police activity at the house where he was staying.

"I asked him what the deal was with the FBI and police and everything going around. He said he was the guy who had lent the missing girl his cell phone," Barton said. "He basically said `I was walking up the street with her and when I got halfway up she went one way and I went the other and I don't remember anything after that.'"

Barton said he noticed two or three cuts on Rooney's right hand but thought they may have been suffered on the job because they were scabbed over.

A woman who lives upstairs from the Winooski apartment where Rooney was staying said Saturday he came home drunk late Wednesday and told her he did something wrong with "the girl from the college."

"He came up and he was drunk, crazy," said Amy Stewart, 25.

"He said he did something wrong with that girl. That's all I know. I say `Tell me more, tell me what's going on,' and he said he not going to tell me anymore," she said.

Rooney was charged with sexual assault in Caledonia County, 80 miles north of Burlington, and with lewd and lascivious conduct with a child in neighboring Essex county, where he previously lived, authorities said.

His stepfather said Saturday he doesn't believe Rooney was involved in Gardner-Quinn's disappearance.

"We've got all the faith in the world in him," said Ronald Skinner, whose Richmond home was searched Tuesday as part of the investigation.

According to court records and interviews, Rooney has had minor scrapes with the law. He had been arrested several times for driving without a license and once for disorderly conduct. He has also had arrests for leaving the scene of an accident and burglary, according to Caledonia County State's Attorney Bob Butterfield, who did not know the ultimate disposition of those charges Saturday.

159-Year Sentence Upheld But Called Absurd (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

In the case of a mentally disturbed robber, a justice says courts are hamstrung by Congress.

A federal appeals court in San Francisco on Friday upheld a 159-year prison term for a mentally disturbed woman with no criminal history after one judge angrily concluded the nation's rigid sentencing laws left the panel with no options but to affirm the "irrational, inhumane and absurd" sentence.

The 3-0 ruling by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals came one year after Marion Hungerford, 52, of Billings, Mont., received the sentence for a string of robberies at Montana casinos and bars from April to July 2002.

The robberies, according to the 18-page opinion written by Judge Susan P. Garber, began when Hungerford and her male roommate, Dana Canfield, were both unemployed and decided to rob a convenience store to pay the rent.

"Marion said she was going to have to go on a crime spree," Canfield testified at the trial. "And since she has problems walking and stuff, I decided that I would do it."

A jury found Hungerford not guilty of that first robbery and one other, but authorities alleged they were only the start of a string of crimes.

She was convicted on one count of conspiracy, seven counts of robbery and seven counts of using a firearm because her accomplice was armed with a .22-caliber revolver.

In rejecting her appeal of four of the robbery and firearms convictions, the court found sufficient evidence that she knowingly took part in the holdups. "There is no evidence that [Hungerford] took any affirmative action to withdraw from the ongoing conspiracy," the court said. "To the contrary, she continued to accept and spend the proceeds of all the robberies and worked purposefully to conceal the crimes."

Though affirming Hungerford's conviction, Judge Stephen Reinhardt decried the sentence handed down in the case as a "predictable byproduct of the cruel and unjust mandatory minimum sentence scheme adopted by Congress."

Although she never touched a gun, Reinhardt noted, Hungerford was sentenced to five years on the first count of using a firearm and 25 years on each of the three other counts because the law gave the trial judge "no choice or discretion, except to impose the statutory mandatory sentences."

"What the judge was not permitted to take into account when sentencing Hungerford should shock the conscience of anyone who believes that reasonable proportionality between a crime and the sentence is a necessary condition of fair sentencing," Reinhardt wrote.

The judge, he said, was not allowed to consider numerous mitigating factors, including Hungerford's "severe form of borderline personality disorder, which can alter one's perception of reality in a manner similar to schizophrenia" and had led to numerous suicide attempts.

Nor, Reinhardt said, was the judge permitted to consider a psychiatrist's testimony that Hungerford suffered from other mental problems, that she was financially desperate after her husband of 26 years left her, or that no one was injured in the robberies, which netted less than $10,000.

Most important, Reinhardt wrote, Hungerford's "extremely limited role" in the crimes proved ultimately irrelevant to her sentence.

Indeed, he noted, it was her accomplice who brandished the gun and committed the robberies and yet he was sentenced to 32 years after pleading guilty.

"Not only is the sentence [for Hungerford] cruel, it is absurd," he wrote. "The case at hand is precisely the type of case that should make Congress question what worthy ends are served by a cruel and inflexible sentencing scheme."

Hungerford's attorney could not be reached Friday. A Justice Department official had no comment on the ruling but said the department "is committed to the prevention of gun crime and the vigorous enforcement of our nation's gun laws."

Law Enforcement Gathering To Bring Thousands To Hub (BOS)

By April Simpson, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, October 14, 2006

More than 14,000 law enforcement professionals will gather in Boston starting this weekend for a conference that will feature some of the nation's highest-ranking officials as speakers .

The International Association of Chiefs of Police, the world's largest nonprofit organization of police executives, will kick off its annual conference and exposition today at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center. Although this will be the association's 113th conference, it will be the first in New England, said John Boyle, a Boston Police Department spokesman.

Speakers include Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III, and Marine General Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. More than 750 exhibitors will showcase police products, such as vehicles, mobile command centers, and helicopters, Boyle said.

There will be international delegates from Europe, Asia, and the Caribbean, said Wendy Balazik, an association spokeswoman. ``We all have the same goals of protecting our communities, and coming together to exchange ideas is beneficial for a law enforcement officer, no matter where he or she is from."

From today until Wednesday, participants may attend workshops on topics such as career physical fitness and responding to speeding complaints.

Tomorrow, 1,000 runners will participate in the 25th annual 5K Police Chase, with proceeds to benefit the Boston Police Department's Kids at Risk Program. The race begins in Copley Square, takes runners through Fenway Park, and ends at the Boston Marathon finish line.

The convention is expected to result in more than $16 million in direct spending, with an additional $10 million in indirect spending. Attendees are expected to fill more than 6,000 rooms in about 30 hotels, Boyle said.

Compared with previous events at the center, this conference ranks 11th in size for attendance, and second in hotel room nights booked, said Bridget Perry, a convention center spokeswoman.

CIVIL LAW:

Activist Pursues Claim That L.A. Port Illegally Funded Maersk Facility (LAT)

By Dan Weikel, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

He says officials spent $1.2 billion on a terminal for the giant shipper when the money was earmarked for other use.

A harbor area activist filed an appeal Friday in an attempt to revive a federal lawsuit alleging that the Port of Los Angeles misappropriated $1.2 billion in government funds to build a giant cargo terminal for the world's largest shipping line.

Stanley D. Mosler of Rancho Palos Verdes is challenging decisions by U.S. District Judge S. James Otero, who dismissed the false-claims case in August, saying that Mosler no longer had an attorney and that he was unqualified as a layperson to handle a lawsuit on behalf of the United States.

A few weeks after the decision, Mosler hired a lawyer, Alan Gutman, but Otero refused to reinstate the case, saying it was too late.

Otero noted in his ruling that Mosler had been warned earlier that he should obtain counsel.

Mosler was represented for three years by attorney Milford Dahl, who bowed out in February 2005, saying the case would be too costly for him to pursue. Mosler then proceeded on his own, hoping to get the case to trial.

"The elusive quality in Judge Otero's order is justice," Mosler said. "The dismissal was not on the merits but because I could not afford to match the port's spending in legal fees. I trust that the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals will rule that having money is not a necessary element to access our federal courts."

Filed in March 2002, Mosler's case alleged that port officials had engaged in a "bait-and-switch" maneuver when they shifted long-standing plans to relocate crude oil and other hazardous shipments to a man-made island that would be built away from populated areas to improve harbor safety.

Mosler said in his suit that port officials decided to turn the island into a massive container facility for Maersk Inc., leaving only 15 acres — instead of hundreds of acres — for petroleum and chemical terminals.

At issue was whether the port violated federal agreements to build the so-called energy island project and misappropriated $108.6 million in federal grants and nearly $1.1 billion in harbor revenue to construct what is now known as Pier 400, which was completed in 2004.

In their defense, port officials said the plans for an energy island changed because there was no market for oil and petroleum terminals. Tenants resisted the idea as too costly while crude oil and other hazardous shipments were declining.

Port officials also said that 15 of the more than 500 acres of the man-made island are still available for hazardous shipments. They also argued that the Army Corps of Engineers, which participated in the project, was told of the changes and signed modifications to the original plans.

A former corps commander in Los Angeles at the time has said, however, that he was unaware of the changes in the energy island project. A corps official also said the agency has not been able to find written records that show the port officially notified the corps of the shift in uses or that the corps OKd such changes.

After Otero dismissed the case, U.S. Department of Justice attorneys notified the court in late August that they were concerned that the lawsuit was not decided on the merits.

They stated in court papers that Mosler's failure to obtain counsel did not extinguish the federal government's right to intervene in the case in the future.

Because federal funds were allocated to the terminal project, the U.S. government has a right to recover damages should they be awarded in Mosler's case. The Justice Department has yet to intervene.

Bankruptcy Filings Drop After Changes In Law (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The ranks of people seeking to erase their debts have thinned in the year since the biggest changes in U.S. bankruptcy laws in a quarter-century took effect.

At a public session at the U.S. trustee's office in Alexandria, Va., on a recent morning, only about half the 50 or so chairs were occupied in a room that used to be jammed with anxious people and their attorneys.

Most were there seeking to file under Chapter 7 of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code, which wipes the debt slate clean after certain assets are forfeited.

After an eight-year campaign by banks, retailers and credit card companies, Congress changed the law to require for the first time an income-based test for measuring a debtor's ability to repay obligations. The new law took effect Oct. 17, 2005.

Those deemed to have insufficient assets or income can still file a Chapter 7 bankruptcy. But those with income above their state's median who can pay at least $6,000 over five years are forced into Chapter 13, in which a debt repayment plan is ordered.

In Virginia, where the median annual income is $43,000, more cases are ending up in the latter category.

"It's designed to make life miserable for anybody who owes money," said Lawrence Brooke, an attorney in Alexandria. "It's a help-the-banks, squish-the-little-guy law."

Brooke is one of several lawyers in northern Virginia who have abandoned consumer bankruptcy work since the new law took effect.

"I won't have anything to do with it," he said.

Brooke said the paperwork hurdles for debtors to qualify for Chapter 7 have become insurmountable for many, and the workload and aggravation for attorneys have increased.

The income test for Chapter 7 means more forms for people to give their lawyers — tax returns and pay stubs — and more questions from a bankruptcy trustee in the mandatory public sessions that already had probed into details of a person's mortgage, bills, life insurance, child support obligations and car payments.

"It's a whole different game now," said Gordon Peyton, one of the trustees in Alexandria. "It's much harder to file bankruptcy now."

There were 263,660 personal bankruptcies filed nationwide in the first half of this year, down from 851,683 in the first six months of 2005 and 809,867 in the same period in 2004, according to the American Bankruptcy Institute, an organization of bankruptcy judges and lawyers.

Chapter 7 filings accounted for 58.8% of this year's first-half total, down from 75.8% in the first half of 2005. Filings under Chapter 13 debt reorganization jumped to 41.1% from 24.1% a year earlier.

Peyton, who used to preside over three or four of the so-called Section 341 sessions on the Thursdays it was his turn, says he now holds only two. His one-on-one interviews of the people filing, who sit across from him at a table after raising their right hand and being sworn in, can take 12 minutes or more — compared with an average of 35 seconds or so before the law took effect, he said.

"It's gotten so tricky. There are a lot of pitfalls," said Peyton, a private attorney appointed as a bankruptcy trustee.

Bankruptcy lawyers say the required changes have meant more work for them, and they are charging clients more. Fees in some cases in northern Virginia have jumped from $750 or $1,000 to $1,500 or more.

In addition, under the new law people seeking bankruptcy protection are required to take credit counseling courses, for which they must pay. "It really does price a lot of people out of the market," said Nora Raum, a lawyer in Arlington, Va.

The American Bankers Assn. disputes that, noting that the bankruptcy law allows courts to waive filing and credit counseling fees for low-income debtors.

Proponents of the law say it has created a more balanced system that eliminates abuse and provides debt relief at the level at which people truly need it. They argue that bankruptcy frequently has been the last refuge of gamblers, impulsive shoppers, divorced or separated fathers avoiding child support, and even multimillionaires.

But some experts predict that bankruptcy filings will eventually rebound. There was a huge rush of filings by financially strained consumers between the enactment of the legislation in April last year and the Oct. 17 deadline for the new means test and other requirements. Personal bankruptcies soared 30% to a record high last year, surpassing 2 million for the first time at 2,039,214.

Then came the precipitous drop.

Filings "will come back," said John Hartgen, spokesman for the American Bankruptcy Institute. After the shakeout period, with the underlying causes of indebtedness, such as job layoffs, still prevailing, equilibrium should return, he said.

Air America, Home Of Liberal Talk, Files For Bankruptcy Protection (NYT)

By Jeff Leeds

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 13 — Air America Radio, the liberal talk network started two years ago in a bid to counter the influence of conservative radio personalities like Rush Limbaugh, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection on Friday.

The network and its corporate parent, Piquant LLC, filed after an owner of stations that carried Air America programming took legal action to freeze its bank accounts as part of a dispute over unpaid bills. Last month the network's backers said they would no longer provide cash to subsidize its operating losses, according to an affidavit filed by Air America in connection with the bankruptcy.

United States Bankruptcy Court Judge Robert Drain approved motions on Friday that will let the company continue to pay salaries and remain on the air. The judge also approved a loan of $900,000 from Democracy Allies, an entity formed by current investors in the network, including Rob Glaser, chief executive of the media and entertainment company RealNetworks. Its full proposed loan of $2.6 million is to be considered at a later hearing, said Tracy Klestadt, a lawyer representing Air America.

Mr. Glaser, who has been perhaps the network's biggest champion, had no comment on the filing, a spokesman said. He is also the company's largest secured creditor and is owed $9.8 million, according to bankruptcy court filings.

Air America, whose broadcast talent includes the comedian Al Franken, has struggled financially since it went on the air in the spring of 2004. According to court papers, the company lost $8.6 million in 2004 and $19.6 million last year, and has lost $13.1 million so far in 2006.

Scott Elberg, who became the network's chief executive on Monday, said in a statement, "Nobody likes filing for bankruptcy; however, this move will enable us to concentrate on informing and entertaining our audience during the coming months."

The longtime music industry executive Danny Goldberg stepped down as chief executive in April, after serving for about a year.

The executive shuffle, which has also included the departure of the company's president and its chief operating officer in recent months, is but one sign of the turbulence that has kept Air America off balance almost from the start.

Rumors of a bankruptcy filing had surfaced last month, though the company dismissed them at the time. Friday's filing, people with knowledge of Air America's business affairs said, was prompted when a radio station owner that carried Air America programming, Multicultural Radio, restricted its accounts last month after the network failed to pay $550,000 due under a previous settlement agreement. In 2004, a few weeks after Air America went on the air, Multicultural pulled the network's programming off stations in Los Angeles and Chicago, in a battle over payments for airtime, and the two sides have butted heads repeatedly since.

While the network's future appeared uncertain, industry executives were quick to deny any suggestion that the filing reflected lack of listener interest in the so-called progressive talk format. Air America says its programming is carried on 92 stations nationwide and reaches 2.4 million listeners a week.

"Whatever happens with Air America, the format is here to stay," said Amy Bolton, vice president and general manager of talk programming for Jones Radio, which syndicates programs by left-leaning hosts like Ed Schultz and Stephanie Miller. Ms. Bolton noted that Mr. Schultz's program had achieved big ratings increases on stations in San Diego, Albuquerque and Miami.

Jones, working with the radio giant Clear Channel Communications and an advocacy organization led by the former Clinton administration official John Podesta, this week started a national competition to identify new radio talent for the format.

While certain progressive stations have achieved ratings success, Ms. Bolton noted, the format as a whole still lacks the roster of popular hosts that lead the conservative presence on radio.

The biggest of them, Mr. Limbaugh, said on the air yesterday that Air America's money woes did not surprise him.

"It was doomed to fail," Mr. Limbaugh said, according to news wire reports. "They were not a broadcasting concern to begin with. ... They went into business to affect elections."

Air America's Parent Files For Chapter 11 (WSJ)

By Sarah Mcbride

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

The parent company of Air America Radio, the liberal radio network founded two years ago and home to personalities such as Al Franken, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection.

Piquant LLC ran into its latest setback when onetime partner Multicultural Radio Broadcasting Inc., which is owed about $550,000, had Piquant's bank account frozen at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., exacerbating an already difficult financial position.

"Nobody likes filing for bankruptcy; however, this move will enable us to concentrate on informing and entertaining our audience during the coming months," said Scott Elberg, Piquant's chief executive, in a statement.

The filing will give the company financial breathing room, helping it to reorganize and negotiate better terms with creditors.

The company said it had assets of $7.8 million, and short-term liabilities of $19.8 million. A number of individuals have invested in the company, including RealNetworks Inc. CEO Rob Glaser, who is the company's largest secured creditor with $9.8 million in claims. Other claimants include Citigroup Inc.'s Citibank, with $2.5 million in unsecured claims, and Clear Channel Communications Inc., with $558,333 in unsecured claims.

Air America's programming remains on the air at about 90 affiliates around the country. A distribution agreement with Clear Channel Communications accounts for 24 of those affiliates through its "Progressive Talk" network of stations.

Launched as a counterpart to conservative talk shows, Air America hasn't taken off in a big way, in part because of difficulty finding strong host stations in many cities.

Air America Files For Bankruptcy, Will Stay On The Air (WT/AP)

By Seth Sutel, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

NEW YORK -- Air America Radio, the liberal talk and news radio network that features comedian Al Franken, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection yesterday but will stay on air as it reorganizes with funding from its investor group.

The network had denied rumors a month ago that it would file for bankruptcy protection.

Air America spokeswoman Jaime Horn told the Associated Press that the filing became necessary only recently, after negotiations with a creditor from the privately held company's early days broke down.

The filing and a shuffle of the network's executives marked the latest turbulence at Air America, which has struggled financially since going on air two years ago. In April, Danny Goldberg stepped down as chief executive officer and was replaced by an interim chief executive from a management consulting firm.

"Nobody likes filing for bankruptcy," said Scott Elberg, who yesterday was appointed CEO of the network. "However, this move will enable us to concentrate on informing and entertaining our audience during the coming months."

Air America has struggled financially since its inception. Documents filed with the bankruptcy court show that the company lost $9.1 million in 2004, $19.6 million in 2005 and $13.1 million so far in 2006.

Air America owes Mr. Franken $360,750, according to the court documents. Mr. Franken was traveling and unavailable to comment but would do so Monday, Miss Horn said.

The network also features shows from liberal talk-show host Randi Rhodes and syndicated shows from Jerry Springer and Portland, Ore.-based talk-show host Thom Hartmann.

Miss Horn declined to name the creditor that negotiations broke down with, but the company had tussled earlier with a business partner, MultiCultural Radio Broadcasting Inc., which is also a creditor to Air America's parent company, Piquant LLC.

The network will operate in the interim with funding from Democracy Alliance LLC, its investor group, which includes RealNetworks Inc. CEO Robert Glaser.

Mr. Glaser had formerly served as chairman of Air America and owns 36.7 percent of the company. He is also owed $9.8 million, according to documents filed yesterday with U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York.

Mr. Glaser resigned as a director of Piquant effective yesterday morning, said Tracy Klestadt of Klestadt & Winters LLP, which represents Piquant.

The new CEO, Mr. Elberg, who had worked at WKTU and also was a former general manager of the radio station WLIB in New York, has been with the network since May 2005.

Justice Department Sues Philadelphia Over Voting Rights (AP)

AP, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — The U.S. Department of Justice announced Friday that it had filed a lawsuit against the city of Philadelphia alleging violations of the rights of Hispanic and Spanish-speaking voters.

The complaint filed in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania alleges that the city failed to provide Spanish-language assistance at the polls to most Spanish-speaking voters in recent elections, the department said.

Federal authorities also said the city prevented Spanish-speaking voters from receiving assistance from people of their choice, even in cases where bilingual assistance was otherwise unavailable.

Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division, said in a statement that federal officials hope to reach agreement with city officials quickly "to begin essential remedial measures in time for the 2006 federal elections."

City representatives did not immediately return a message left at an after-hours number on Friday.

Justice Department To Help Troubled Clarksville Police Department (AP)

CLARKSVILLE, Tenn.- With 12 discrimination lawsuits filed against the Clarksville Police Department, the mayor has asked a federal official for some help.

Walter Atkinson, who works for U.S. Department of Justice's Community Relations Service, will lead a group of citizens and officials to survey the police department and come up with suggestions to help solve its problems. The group will not investigate the specific lawsuits against the city.

"This is going to be as much a PR push" as an information-gathering process, said group member David Shelton, of the Clarksville Human Relations Commission.

Mayor Don Trotter said it should take several months before recommendations for the department are finalized.

The meetings, which will include interviews with police officers, are closed to the public, but the recommendations will be "very, very public," Shelton said.

The group began meeting Sept. 22. Its most recent meeting was on Wednesday.

Discrimination lawsuits have cost the city more than $300,000 in legal expenses thus far. A majority of the suits allege racial discrimination, but at least one female officer has sued claiming gender and age discrimination.

Two cases have been settled out of court for $265,000, three cases were lost in federal court on appeal, one case was dismissed, and six cases still are pending.

The city negotiated a retirement package for Police Chief Mark Smith earlier this year after nine of the lawsuits had been filed.

Feds, Centier Settle Redlining Allegations (NINT)

By BRIAN WILLIAMS And MARK FITTON, Times Staff Writers

Northwest (IN) Times, October 14, 2006

LAKE COUNTY: Bank will invest $4.3 million in minority lending efforts

The federal government and Whiting-based Centier Bank have reached a $4.3 million agreement to settle allegations the bank engaged in redlining, or discriminating on the basis of race or national origin.

The Justice Department alleged Centier violated the Fair Housing Act and Equal Credit Opportunity Act by unlawfully failing to equally market and provide products and services to predominantly black and Hispanic neighborhoods in Gary, East Chicago and Hammond.

Although it acknowledged its settlement with the government, the locally owned bank "strongly denies any suggestion that it has previously excluded minority communities from its banking efforts," Centier said in a news release.

However, the release said, Centier management feels "equally strongly about its desire to provide significantly enhanced services to residents and businesses in minority neighborhoods."

Centier President and CEO Michael Schrage told The Times the bank was surprised by the Justice Department's action and still does not agree with the allegations, but decided to enter into the agreement to avoid the delays and costs of litigation.

Characterizing the negotiations with the Justice Department as "amiable," Schrage said the Justice Department action had made Centier "more diligent in reaching out to underserved areas."

The agreement would accelerate the bank's plans for expansion into the area in a three-year period rather than five, he said.

The consent decree filed in federal court in Hammond will prohibit Centier from discriminating on the basis of race, color or national origin in any aspect of residential real estate or credit transaction, according to the Justice Department. Once approved by the court, the agreement will resolve the allegations.

Under the settlement, the government said, Centier will:

-- Open new offices and expand existing operations in previously excluded areas.

-- Invest $3.5 million in a special financing program.

-- Spend at least $875,000 for consumer financial education, outreach and promotion in previously excluded areas.

Schrage said the bank will expand the size of its East Chicago branch office and will add two new branches in Gary in the next two years under the terms of the agreement.

In addition to physical expansion, the East Chicago branch will have a full-time loan officer and a full-time Hispanic lender within six to nine months, Schrage said. The Indianapolis Boulevard location will add a conference room, which will be available to community aid organizations, and a second office.

In Gary, a second, full-service branch is expected to open within nine months. Schrage anticipates it being on Broadway, but said a location hasn't been finalized. A third Gary branch is planned for opening in 2008, he said.

No new locations were on the drawing board for Hammond, he said.

The Justice Department said the bank fully cooperated with its investigation into lending practices and agreed to settle the matter without litigation. Wan J. Kim, an assistant attorney general in the civil rights division, commended Centier for its cooperation.

Centier also cited statements of appreciation and support from Habitat for Humanity of Lake County, Neighborhoods Inc. and the Urban League of Northwest Indiana.

The allegation

The government claimed Centier unlawfully failed to equally market and provide products and services to predominantly black and Hispanic neighborhoods in Gary, East Chicago and Hammond.

The response

Centier President and CEO Michael Schrage said Centier does not agree with the allegations, but came to terms with the government and will accelerate its efforts to invest in and reach out to minority communities.

The terms

Centier will open new offices and expand existing operations in previously excluded areas; invest $3.5 million in a special financing program; spend at least $875,000 for consumer financial education, outreach and promotion in previously excluded areas.

Attorney General Looked To For Help (BRAH)

By Melanie Marquez

The Bradenton Herald, October 14, 2006

BRADENTON - A beating months ago that led to the death of a 72-year-old man has the Bradenton police chief looking to the attorney general of the United States for help, calling the chief law officer in the country the "last hope" for justice.

After review of the case, the state attorney's office for the 12th Judicial Circuit declined to prosecute Jamaal Lambert, 25, in the death of James Ervin Barfield, saying Lambert was acting in self-defense when he beat Barfield during an argument on May 10 near a downtown apartment building Barfield owned.

Barfield was taken to Manatee Memorial Hospital where he died two weeks later.

Police Chief Michael Radzilowski wants Lambert prosecuted for the death, which was ruled a homicide by the medical examiner's office, and he's calling the state attorney's decision not to prosecute an error.

In a letter Radzilowski sent to the U.S. Department of Justice on Monday, he asks Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to review the case for "possible prosecution of any criminal or civil right violation."

As of Friday afternoon, there was "nothing open in the civil rights division," said Cynthia Magnuson, spokeswoman for the Justice Department.

The fight between Barfield and Lambert happened in the 1300 block of Third Avenue West, where Lambert's girlfriend rented a unit from Barfield. Lambert was staying there while his girlfriend was in jail, according to his arrest report.

Barfield was visiting a tenant, a 35-year-old woman he was romantically involved with, according to the review by the state attorney's office.

Barfield was intoxicated and started yelling obscenities and racial slurs at Lambert before threatening to get a gun, according to the report. He drove away from the scene after Lambert had smacked him several times to the ground. Barfield drove to the Bradenton Police Department to report the incident and officers used the Baker Act to admit Barfield to the hospital.

The medical examiner's office ruled Barfield's death a homicide, caused by a beating, according to police officials.

In its decline statement, the state attorney's office said Barfield had the onset of cirrhosis of the liver and later developing pneumonia, which they referred to as "the direct cause of death."

Police contend Lambert was the aggressor and should have been charged with manslaughter.

Judge Orders Jail Explanation (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, October 14, 2006

GULFPORT - A federal judge has ordered the Harrison County jail to explain what it is doing to hire more corrections officers.

The order, filed Thursday by U.S. District Judge Walter J. Gex III, addresses a lingering issue of staffing problems at the Harrison County Adult Detention Center. The last time the judge questioned the jail's staffing level via court order was in 2003, when the officer-to-inmate ratio was 1-to-10. The U.S. Justice Department, which has oversight to monitor improvements at the jail, recommends a ratio of 1-to-5.

The ratio is about the same today as it was in 2003. The jail needs to hire about 65 additional corrections officers. It has about 100 jailers to oversee 950 to 1,000 inmates.

Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. on Friday said his new warden has "a good plan of action" for hiring and he believes it will meet with approval. Payne said he has beefed up advertising to include television commercials featuring Don Cabana, appointed warden two months ago.

"We're having the same problem with hiring that many South Mississippi employers have faced since Hurricane Katrina," Payne said.

The court order gives the jail until Oct. 26 to provide a supplementary report to answer questions on staffing issues. The report is in addition to the quarterly report the jail is required to submit to the Justice Department.

Payne said staffing levels were up until the hurricane struck.

However, issues surrounding the fatal beating of inmate Jessie Lee Williams Jr. in February also have affected manpower and morale, Cabana said after his appointment two months ago. Two former jailers face criminal prosecution in the Williams case and a related civil lawsuit is pending.

Payne said he hired Cabana to bring about positive changes and he believes he is seeing results.

Seven corrections officers have been hired in the past couple of weeks, according to the latest personnel report approved by county supervisors.

Starting pay for entry-level corrections officers is about $10.40 per hour.

Pay is a potential drawback, said Cy Faneca, the sheriff's attorney.

"It's a dangerous job for not a lot of money," Faneca said.

Gex's order asks for details on plans to fill vacant jailer positions and the number of applications received, applicants interviewed and those hired.

Gex is the judge who signed the 1995 court order requiring the jail make improvements in inmate rights, jail conditions, medical care, security, training, staffing and other issues. The consent agreement came after U.S. Attorney Janet Reno in 1993 filed a complaint condemning how the Harrison County jail treated inmates and various related issues.

Students Arrested In Third Day Of Protest At College For The Deaf (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

WASHINGTON, Oct. 13 — The authorities at Gallaudet University, the nation's only liberal arts university for the deaf, moved on Friday to end a three-day siege by protesters by arresting the students opposing the board's choice of the next president.

The campus police went into an area where about 100 protesters sat with arms interlocked, arresting them one by one and handing them over to Washington police officers who had blocked off the street along a side entrance to the university where the student protesters had gathered. As organizers had rehearsed in days leading up to the confrontation on Friday night, students went limp when arrested. They were then carried away by three or more officers.

Mark Goldstone, a lawyer for the protesters, said the police arrested about 60 students in two hours, and arrests continued late into the night.

"This is our school, not yours," one protester shouted from the back at the arresting officers while others demanded, in sign language, that the departing president of the university, I. King Jordan, appear before protesters.

"Go get the drug dealers," the protesters shouted at the police, "leave the students alone."

As night fell in the hours before the arrests began, students vowed to continue their protests.

"We're going to be here every day, over and over again, until she resigns," said Christopher Corrigan, a 19-year-old junior from Frederick Md., who was the first to be arrested.

The protesters are demanding the immediate resignation of Jane K. Fernandes, the former provost who was named last spring to succeed Dr. Jordan as president. Students have complained that the selection process was skewed and that Dr. Fernandes lacks leadership qualities. Dr. Fernandes met Friday with four protesters and Mr. Goldstone for more than an hour, but they found no resolution to the standoff that has paralyzed this university for a week.

Dr. Fernandes has said repeatedly that she will not resign, saying it would set a bad precedent, and the current president and the board have stood firmly behind her.

Mr. Goldstone said the protesters were adamant in their demand that Dr. Fernandes step down, and she was equally resolute in refusing to do so.

But students were also determined, even welcoming the prospect of arrest Friday, which one protester, Leala Holcomb, 19, from Freemont, Calif., said would demonstrate their commitment to the world beyond the campus. “We want to get arrested to show we are firm in our conviction,” Ms. Holcomb said, adding, “It is a pretty loud statement.”

Gallaudet Rally Broken Up (WT)

By Matthew Cella, Gary Emerling And Katie Nichols, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

Police last night arrested dozens of student demonstrators who had blocked the gates of Gallaudet University's Northeast campus for three days in protest of the administration's choice for university president.

The students were uncooperative but peaceful -- forming human chains and forcing campus police and Metropolitan Police officers to separate them, lift them and drag them to a waiting fleet of vans.

The crowd jeered and howled as each student was carried off. By late last night, police had arrested about 90 protesters.

Police first said the students would be transferred to the department's training academy in Southeast and charged with unlawful assembly, which carries a maximum penalty of 90 days in jail and a $250 fine.

Later, officials said the charge would be incommoding -- a lesser infraction for which students could pay a $50 fine and be released or schedule a court appearance.

The arrests were made at a side entrance to the campus on Sixth Street Northeast and began at about 8:50 p.m., almost two hours after police and university officials issued a final warning to the demonstrators to disperse.

"I deeply regret being forced to take this action," said outgoing school President I. King Jordan. "I realize it may lead to arrests, but the protesters have left me no choice. Gallaudet University has exhausted all means of communication in negotiating with those who have disrupted the university's educational processes and held the campus hostage to their demands."

Mr. Jordan issued the final warning at about 7 p.m., after an hour of negotiations between student leaders and incoming President Jane K. Fernandes. Mrs. Fernandes briefly went out among the protesters in front of the main gate of the campus on Florida Avenue Northeast at about 2 p.m. She invited student leaders to meet and discuss their issues, while asking them to reconsider their protest. Neither side budged.

Students opposed to Mrs. Fernandes' appointment as president first took over Hall Memorial Building last week to demand that she resign. Early Wednesday, the protesters barricaded the six entrances of the campus, which includes a nursery, and elementary, middle and high schools.

Mrs. Fernandes, who was named president in May, will officially replace Mr. Jordan in January.

Shortly before officials issued the warning, police took position around the Sixth Street campus gate. Students had agreed to lift a barricade of the side entrance late Thursday, then reneged. The protests will be allowed to continue at the school's other gates.

Welders removed one of the gates as police and students watched.

Meloyde Batten-Mickens, executive director of facilities and chief of the school's department of public safety, asked protesters not to block access to the school's gates and said the requests were "non-negotiable." She said those who interfered would be subject to arrests, criminal prosecution and expulsion.

Assistant Chief Gerald Wilson of the Metropolitan Police Department also addressed the students.

"The Metropolitan Police Department has gone to great lengths not to take sides in this issue," he said, advising the students on what they should expect.

Police issued several formal warnings before making the arrests and told protesters that those who did not resist would not be handcuffed. Handcuffing deaf people has been criticized because doing so takes away their only method of communicating.

Many of the 200 students who had formed the core of the protest group made their way from the front gate of the university to the side gate when it became apparent that the arrests would take place there.

Some shouted "arrest me" as police awaited the arrival of a light truck deployed to illuminate the area and ensure that the students would be able to understand the warnings given by sign-language interpreters.

Some students were defiant.

DOJ_NMG_0081094

"I just want to see the best for Gallaudet," said Justin Jackerson, 19, through a sign-language interpreter. "I want to do this for Gallaudet. I know that I will not be alone."

Administrators canceled classes for the three days of the protest rather than call in police. Earlier yesterday, university officials said that arrests would be a last resort.

"We have to understand that inside the deaf community and the Gallaudet community [arrests] would be the saddest thing that could happen, and it would take a really, really long time to recover from that," university spokeswoman Mercy Coogan said.

Earlier yesterday, some students said they were anxious for classes to resume.

"I'm frustrated with the protests," said Jessica Loughran, 20, an international student in her third semester. "I know it's good for people to support, but I want my education."

After the Board of Trustees at Gallaudet, the country's largest school for the deaf, selected Mrs. Fernandes as its next president in May, protests followed until summer break, including objections from 67 percent of the faculty.

The protesters said there was a lack of diversity among the finalists in the selection process. Mrs. Fernandes, who is deaf, said some people think she is not deaf enough.

Gallaudet students engaged in similar arguments and protests in 1988, until a president-elect resigned and the board hired Mr. Jordan, who became the first deaf president at the 142-year-old university.

Gay Marriage Losing Punch As Ballot Issue (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

DENVER, Oct. 13 — The debate over same-sex marriage was a black-or-white proposition two years ago when voters in 11 states barred gay couples from marrying.

But this year shades of gray are everywhere, as eight more states consider similar ballot measures. Some of the proposed bans are struggling in the polls, and the issue of same-sex marriage itself has largely failed to rouse conservative voters.

In some cases, other issues, like the war in Iraq and ethics in Washington, have seized voters' attention. But the biggest change, people on both sides of the issue say, is that supporters of same-sex marriage this year are likely to be as mobilized as the opponents.

The social conservatives, who focused on marriage in 2004 and helped President Bush gain re-election in some hard-fought states in the Midwest, have been offset by equally committed and organized opposition. Slick advertising, paid staff and get-out-the-vote drives have become a two-way street.

"The opponents of these measures have had a lot more time to organize and fund their efforts; that has made for a bit of a different complexion," said Julaine K. Appling, the executive director of the Family Research Institute of Wisconsin, which supports a constitutional amendment in that state defining marriage as between a man and a woman.

Proposals like Wisconsin's are also on the ballot in Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee and Virginia. And while most of the measures are expected to pass, their emotional force in drawing committed, conservative voters to the polls, many political experts say, has been muted or spent.

Recent polls in Arizona, Colorado, Virginia and Wisconsin, for example, have suggested only narrow majorities in support, in contrast to the 60 to 70 percent or more majorities in most states that voted on the issue in 2004. Two recent polls in South Dakota suggested that the same-sex marriage amendment might actually lose, while a third said it seemed likely to pass.

"As it stands right now, conservative turnout is not going to be as strong as it has traditionally been," said Jon Paul, the executive director of Coloradans for Marriage, which is supporting a ballot measure that would ban same-sex marriage.

Some pollsters say people might just be burned out on the subject of marriage and its boundaries.

"It doesn't seem to be salient to what most Tennesseans are concerned about right now," said Robert Wyatt, the associate director of the Middle Tennessee State University poll. The ballot proposal there will almost certainly pass, Dr. Wyatt said, but few people think it will drive turnout or swing the tight race for the Senate between Bob Corker, a Republican, and Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat. Both candidates support a ban on same-sex marriage.

Dr. Wyatt said efforts to stir enthusiasm among conservatives have mostly fallen flat.

"It's one of those things that's like preaching to the choir," he said.

The momentum against same-sex marriage at the ballot box has also been hurt by court cases that have upheld bans on same-sex marriage — notably rulings by the highest courts in New York and Washington this summer — by removing some of the urgency for constitutional amendments.

Here in Colorado, the debate has been complicated by the presence of two ballot measures on the subject that in essence work in opposite directions. One measure would add a ban on same-sex marriage to the Constitution, and the other would create a framework of legal rights for same-sex couples in civil unions.

Scholars who track gender-law issues say that gay rights groups and their allies have worked hard since the last election to create a middle-ground position on the question of partnership rights that could appeal to voters who might not vote for same-sex marriage.

The position, which has been repeated like a mantra across Colorado this year by advocates for the civil union proposal, holds that civil unions are not marriage and that if voters want to hold marriage apart as a separate institution for heterosexuals, that would be fine. But it is only fair and just, they say, that couples in other types of relationships have legal protections, too.

Opponents of the civil union bill say that the moderation line is a smokescreen and that same-sex marriage in Colorado will become a reality in fact, if not in name, if the civil union proposition is approved.

"It is nothing short of Orwellian doublespeak to say it is not marriage," State Representative Kevin Lundberg, a Republican from eastern Colorado, said at a recent forum in Denver on the ballot proposals.

Political analysts suggest that just like patrons perusing an old-fashioned Chinese restaurant menu, voters in Colorado considering the two measures might take one from Column A and one from Column B. Some people say they plan to do just that.

Joel Sidell and Dona Maloy — longtime unmarried partners who live in the Denver area — show how the lines have fractured. Mr. Sidell, 62, a retired police officer and a Republican, said he would probably vote for the ban on same-sex marriage and against civil unions.

"To me, it still does not seem right for a woman to be able to marry a woman and a male to marry a male," Mr. Sidell said. "I don't think it's the sanctity of the term. It just doesn't seem proper."

Ms. Maloy, 61, is a Democrat who said she planned to vote the opposite of her partner — no on the marriage amendment and yes to benefits for same-sex partners.

"I think that marriage is a personal thing; at least it is for me," she said. "Legally, I don't see why people can't all have the same rights."

The two major party candidates for governor in Colorado have also taken opposite sides on the marriage-civil union debate. The Democrat, Bill Ritter, has said he will vote for civil unions and against the constitutional amendment, while the Republican, Representative Bob Beauprez, has said he plans to vote against civil unions and for the same-sex marriage ban. Pollsters say those positions do not appear to be swaying the race, which Mr. Ritter has led by 10 to 15 percentage points in recent polls.

Tangled legal questions over parental rights, health care decisions and employer benefits have emerged in some states where efforts to ban same-sex marriage and civil unions were successful in the past, complicating calculations about how the bans play out in real life. The case of Lisa Miller and Janet Jenkins is one example.

Ms. Miller and Ms. Jenkins were joined in a civil ceremony in 2000 in Vermont, which allows same-sex contracts. Ms. Miller had a baby in 2002 through artificial insemination, and they raised the child together. Now they have separated, and both Vermont and Virginia, which does not recognize the validity of Vermont's civil union system, have claimed jurisdiction over the question of child custody.

Legal experts say the case is probably headed for the Supreme Court. In the meantime, Virginia's same-sex marriage ballot proposal would define marriage as between a man and a woman and also put into the Constitution the legal language at the heart of the custody battle: that civil unions formed in other states are invalid in Virginia.

That prohibition on civil unions is even too far-reaching for some opponents of same-sex marriage, said Larry J. Sabato, director of the University of Virginia Center for Politics.

"It's so sweeping, it's giving some people pause," Mr. Sabato said.

Meanwhile, gay men and lesbians continue to come out in ever greater numbers, especially in some of the states that will be voting on the marriage issue next month.

From 2000 to 2005, the number of people identifying themselves in Census surveys as being in a same-sex couple grew by 30 percent, to about 770,000, according to a study released this week by the Williams Institute at the University of California, Los Angeles, which tracks and researches gay legal issues.

Of the eight states with ballot measures, the study found that six had growth rates higher than the national average, led by Wisconsin, up 81 percent; Colorado, up 58 percent; Virginia, up 43 percent; and South Carolina, up 39 percent.

Conservatives like Mr. Paul of the Colorado marriage group say the low-key tenor of the same-sex marriage debate could change in a thunderclap if a court decision that appears to undermine traditional marriage boundaries is handed down before the election. The New Jersey Supreme Court has a case pending and could issue a decision before Election Day.

Ban's Foes To Run Ad Across Va. (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

An organization that opposes a ballot measure that would constitutionally ban same-sex marriage in Virginia is buying a TV commercial to run statewide, marking an intensifying effort to defeat the amendment.

The 30-second ad, which will begin appearing throughout the state today on CNN, shows an image of Virginia's 230-year-old Bill of Rights slowly being engulfed in flames. A narrator warns gravely that the amendment would "destroy" the spirit of the state's Bill of Rights, which served as the model for the U.S. Bill of Rights. A second ad will appear next week, officials said.

Sponsored by the Commonwealth Coalition, a group organized to defeat the amendment, the ad goes on to frame the organization's central argument against the amendment: Because of the wording, the measure will erode the rights of all unwed couples, including heterosexuals.

"Read all of Ballot Question One closely," the male narrator says. "Every unmarried couple could lose their rights. Like guardianship rights. And inheritance rights. . . . It goes way too far."

Proponents disagree, saying the ballot measure would ban only same-sex marriage and civil unions in Virginia. They have pointed out that there have not been cases of unwed couples losing such rights in any state that has passed similarly worded measures.

"We would have hoped that their TV ads would have answered the real question Virginians are being asked -- how should marriage be defined," said Victoria Cobb, executive director of the Family Foundation, a group that has helped organize support for the measure. "This is just another misleading campaign ad, and I don't believe Virginians will fall for it."

The ad's release three weeks before Election Day, Nov. 7, illustrates an expected scramble by both campaigns to sway voters on the issue. Cobb said the Family Foundation plans to run statewide radio commercials beginning two weeks before Election Day.

Dyana Mason, field director for the Commonwealth Coalition, said that it was unclear how long the opposition ad, which will cost the group $10,000 a day to broadcast, would air.

AT&T-BellSouth Vote Is Delayed (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press

AP, October 14, 2006

FCC allows time to study concessions

WASHINGTON – The Federal Communications Commission has delayed a vote on the proposed buyout of BellSouth by AT&T until Nov. 3 at the latest after two Democrats asked for time to study last-minute concessions offered by the companies.

The commission was scheduled to vote on the $80.8 billion deal in a special meeting yesterday that never convened.

Commissioners Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein circulated a letter among reporters that said in the previous 48 hours, new proposals had been made regarding the buyout that raised "a number of significant questions and complex technical issues for us to consider."

They asked that the proposals, which were offered by the companies through Chairman Kevin Martin's office, be made available to the public.

Martin responded in a letter, agreeing to make the proposals available for public comment for 10 days, and set a commission meeting for Nov. 3, though the vote may come sooner and may not require a public meeting. Martin is traveling to China today.

The proposed deal already was under fire by consumer advocates and some lawmakers, who said it would go a long way toward re-establishing a communications monopoly that the government broke up more than two decades ago.

AT&T released a statement yesterday saying the company would discuss adding conditions to the deal "so long as they do not affect our ability to deliver merger benefits to customers and shareowners, given the intensely competitive environment in which we operate."

The Justice Department approved the sale without requiring any divestment or other conditions on Wednesday. Despite the scale of the purchase, the Justice Department found no potentially adverse effects on competition.

Adelstein called the decision "a reckless abandonment of DoJ's responsibility to protect competition and consumers."

Since the Justice Department's announcement, Martin and his staff had been working with AT&T to craft a compromise that would satisfy the two Democrats. AT&T's proposed concessions were made available for public inspection last night.

For the first 30 months following the merger, the company is offering a number of consumer-friendly items, including free digital subscriber line, or DSL, modems to customers who want to upgrade from dial-up service, and $10-per-month DSL service.

AT&T also offered to donate $1 million to foundations that promote public safety and put forth a number of guarantees promising to limit charges for companies that use other parts of its network.

The FCC's approval would have removed the final major regulatory hurdle in AT&T's bid to extend its dominance as the nation's largest provider of phone, wireless and broadband Internet services.

When the deal was announced in March, it was worth about $67 billion. But the rising price of AT&T's stock pushed the value to $80.8 billion.

FCC Delays Its Vote On BellSouth AT&T Discusses Protections Wanted By Consumer Groups (AJC)

By Marilyn Geewax, Cox Washington Bureau

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 14, 2006

Washington — AT&T Inc.'s proposed purchase of BellSouth Corp. was delayed Friday when federal regulators postponed a vote amid calls to attach consumer protections to the deal.

Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin ordered his staff to open another 10-day period for gathering public comments, and set a new meeting for Nov. 3.

Analysts said they still believed the deal would be approved. The debate, they said, is over what conditions the FCC will require.

Late in the day, AT&T disclosed a broad array of possible concessions it had discussed with the FCC, including the sale of stand-alone, high-speed Internet service for a limited period of time and the return of certain jobs that had been moved overseas.

Consumer groups have been pushing the FCC to require the new AT&T to:

> Let consumers subscribe to high-speed Internet service even if they don't have phone service with the company.

> Lease more lines to local phone and data service providers.

> Accept some restrictions against charging higher rates to online content providers who are not affiliated with them — also known as net neutrality protections.

"There is no need to rush this deal through," said Consumers Union spokeswoman Jeannine Kenney. She said the postponement will give the FCC time to have "a more open and transparent process" as they evaluate creation of what would be the nation's largest telecommunications company, with operations in 22 states.

'Reasonable conditions'

AT&T spokesman Michael Balmoris said in a statement that a delay "is not uncommon in these matters" and that the company believes the FCC soon will "complete its review, approve the merger and allow us to begin delivering the numerous benefits of the merger to consumers."

Balmoris said AT&T is willing to accept "reasonable conditions on the merger in order to obtain unanimous approval, so long as they do not affect our ability to deliver merger benefits to customers and share owners, given the intensely competitive environment in which we operate."

In a six-page letter to FCC Chairman Martin dated Friday, AT&T's senior vice president of federal regulatory affairs, Robert W. Quinn, listed a number of potential conditions that company officials had discussed in phone conversations with FCC officials on Thursday.

One would respond to a key demand of consumer groups: Let consumers in BellSouth's nine-state territory subscribe to high-speed Internet service without having to buy local phone service. The service would start within a year after the closing date of the merger and last for 2 1/2 years after the start date, the letter said.

Quinn's letter said net neutrality conditions had been discussed, as had the return to BellSouth territory of jobs that had been relocated to other countries. The number of jobs was not given, but BellSouth spokesman Jeff Battcher said the reference involved a "significant number" of customer service or technical support jobs now in India and elsewhere.

Martin, a Republican, has indicated he wants the acquisition to proceed with no strings attached.

But the two Democrats on the five-member commission, Jonathan Adelstein and Michael Copps, have been pushing hard to get consumer protections.

Shortly after noon Friday, more than an hour after the FCC meeting was to have begun, reporters were handed copies of a letter that Adelstein and Copps had written to Martin.

Long delay feared

The Democrats said the decision should be delayed because AT&T has made proposals in recent days that "raise a number of significant questions and complex technical issues for us to consider." They urged that the FCC "open this process to public comment."

Around 2 p.m., reporters were given a copy of Martin's reply. The chairman said he was willing to extend the comment period, but added that he hoped the Democrats would "avoid any further delay in our consideration of this transaction."

The two top members of Congress with jurisdiction over telecommunications matters, House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas) and Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) echoed Martin's concerns.

More than six months have passed since the merger application was filed in March, Barton and Stevens said in a joint statement, and the FCC "has conducted a thorough review."

"The commission has a responsibility to act expeditiously," they said.

The Democrats, although a minority on the five-member FCC, have an unusual amount of leverage in this case.

Martin is supported by a fellow Republican commissioner, Deborah Tate. Analysts believe the fifth commissioner, Robert McDowell, would also support his fellow Republicans.

But he has not been participating in the negotiations because of a potential conflict of interest. He previously worked as a lobbyist for Comptel, an association representing AT&T's competitors.

Competitors react

Comptel has urged the FCC to "protect consumers from the re-monopolization of the communications industry."

Also, NuVox Communications and XO Communications, two local phone companies that compete with AT&T, have filed an emergency motion with the FCC, urging disclosure of AT&T negotiations over conditions.

"The public has been denied the opportunity to counter AT&T's back-room advocacy," the companies said in a statement.

San Antonio-based AT&T needs only FCC approval to complete its $80.1 billion purchase of Atlanta-based BellSouth to create the nation's biggest telecommunications company. AT&T would also gain full ownership of Cingular Wireless LLC, the largest U.S. mobile-phone carrier, which it now owns jointly with BellSouth.

On Wednesday, the U.S. Justice Department signed off on the merger without conditions after concluding the deal would not hurt consumers. The deal has also won approval from each of the U.S. states with jurisdiction.

F.C.C. Delays Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Deal A Second Time (NYT)

By Ken Belson

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

The Federal Communications Commission delayed voting yesterday on AT&T's $80 billion takeover of BellSouth for the second time this week, because two commissioners declined to make a decision until public hearings were held.

AT&T and BellSouth have already won approval from their shareholders, state regulators and the Justice Department. The F.C.C. is the organization remaining that must endorse the deal.

On Wednesday, the Justice Department signed off on the purchase without imposing any conditions on the companies. That angered Michael J. Copps and Jonathan S. Adelstein — the two Democratic commissioners at the F.C.C. — who said more time was needed to assess how consumers and companies would be affected.

With their objections in mind, the commission rescheduled its vote on the merger to yesterday, from Thursday, to give the commissioners more time to negotiate. When they were unable to decide whether and what conditions to impose on the companies, yesterday's meeting was canceled and rescheduled for Nov. 3.

"Given the limited analysis from our leading antitrust authorities, it is all the more imperative that we now employ an open process to fully involve all affected parties, including the applicants, in order to get the public and expert review that is otherwise lacking," the Democratic commissioners wrote in a letter to the F.C.C. chairman, Kevin J. Martin.

The negotiations are complicated further because one Republican commissioner, Robert M. McDowell, is expected to refrain from voting because of a potential conflict of interest. If he were allowed to vote, the Republicans would presumably be able to approve the merger faster because they would outnumber the Democrats, 3 to 2.

Industry analysts do not expect the commissioners to reject the merged company, which would be the primary local phone provider in 22 states. The company would also be the largest seller of telecommunications services to businesses and the owner of Cingular Wireless, the country's biggest cellphone provider.

The commissioners could suggest that the merged company sell broadband to customers as an individual product, not bundled with phone service, a commitment Verizon accepted when it bought MCI this year.

The F.C.C. could also require AT&T and BellSouth to sell some of their wireless spectrum and local phone and data lines to ease concerns that they have too big a share in certain markets. The F.C.C. could also impose conditions that would ban the companies from charging companies extra fees to gain priority access to their networks.

Michael Coe, an AT&T spokesman, said in a statement: "We are open to discussing with the Democratic F.C.C. commissioners reasonable conditions on the merger in order to obtain unanimous approval, so long as they do not affect our ability to deliver merger benefits to customers and shareowners, given the intensely competitive environment in which we operate."

The F.C.C.'s decision to put off voting on the deal initially sent both companies' stocks lower in trading yesterday. AT&T's shares finished unchanged at $33.60 while BellSouth's stock dipped 15 cents, to $44.13.

AT&T Makes Concessions On Merger (SAEN)

By L.A. Lorek, Express-News Business Writer

San Antonio Express-News, October 14, 2006

AT&T has agreed to make concessions to get unanimous Federal Communications Commission approval for its $80 billion merger with BellSouth.

DOJ_NMG_0081100

Late Friday, the San Antonio-based company filed a six-page letter with the FCC saying it "would not object to the imposition of certain merger conditions" requested by the Democratic commissioners "in order to obtain expeditious unanimous approval of the merger."

The FCC delayed its meeting Friday on the proposed merger of AT&T and Atlanta-based BellSouth until Nov. 3 after the two Democratic commissioners, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, sent a letter to Chairman Kevin Martin saying they wanted more time to evaluate the deal.

"In the last 48 hours, new proposals were made for addressing the concerns raised in this proceeding," Copps and Adelstein told Martin. "These proposals raise a number of significant questions and complex issues for us to consider."

They recommended AT&T and BellSouth's new proposal be put up for public review. They also blasted the Justice Department for its "limited analysis" of the merger.

In response, Martin wrote a letter saying the FCC would give the commissioners 10 days to seek public comment on the proposed changes.

In its latest filing, AT&T agreed to provide $10 broadband service, called Digital Subscriber Line, or DSL, to new customers in its territory.

The company also pledged to provide 100 percent broadband access to its entire service area and to give free broadband modems to customers. It also offered a $1 million public safety grant to public entities in its coverage area.

In addition, AT&T discussed returning jobs from overseas to the BellSouth territory.

The company also mentioned network neutrality, or requiring AT&T to carry Internet traffic without charging customers more for different services or applications, according to the letter. AT&T didn't provide specifics on these issues in its letter.

AT&T, which has been working with Martin's office for the past few days to hammer out an agreement, ran out of time to gain final approval for the merger, which is not uncommon, said Mike Balmoris, company spokesman.

"We look forward to the Nov. 3 FCC meeting, when we expect the FCC to complete its review, approve the merger and allow us to begin delivering the numerous benefits of the merger to consumers," Balmoris said.

The Justice Department approved the merger without restrictions Wednesday.

Usually, the Justice Department is responsible for determining the competitiveness or anti-competitiveness of a merger, said Le Keough, an analyst with Frost Bank in Austin.

"It made it though the (Justice Department) with flying colors, but there seems to be some political hang-ups at the FCC," Keough said.

But Ben Silverman, telecom analyst with FindProfit.com in Princeton, N.J., said the deal isn't in danger.

"This is typical last-minute wrangling," Silverman said.

Members of Congress and consumer groups have urged the FCC to wait until a federal court reviews two previous telecommunications mergers — the deal between AT&T and SBC Communications Corp. and the combination of Verizon Communications and MCI.

The merger of AT&T and BellSouth would create the nation's largest telecom company and consolidate Cingular Wireless, one of the nation's largest wireless providers.

The combined company would rejoin four of the Ma Bell companies created in 1984 when a court broke up AT&T over monopolistic concerns.

AT&T and BellSouth together would have more than 300,000 employees and revenue of $117 billion. The merger would also increase AT&T's service territory from 13 to 22 states — 18 of which have approved the merger.

AT&T's shares closed unchanged Friday at $33.60 and BellSouth's stock closed down 15 cents at $44.13.

FCC Puts Off Vote On Deal By AT&T (CHIT)

By Jon Van, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, October 14, 2006

Democrats get delay of BellSouth buyout

AT&T Inc.'s drive to win regulatory approval for its takeover of BellSouth Corp. stalled Friday as the Federal Communications Commission put off a decision on the matter until next month.

Acting earlier this week, the Justice Department approved the deal without condition, drawing harsh criticism from consumer advocates, some members of Congress and two FCC commissioners.

Those commissioners, Democrats Jonathan Adelstein and Michael Copps, sought a delay in FCC action on the case, arguing that AT&T's negotiations designed to win commission approval should be made public before a decision is made.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, who had advocated approving the merger without condition, accepted the Democrats' suggested delay and scheduled a meeting for Nov. 3 to consider the matter. Conditions on the deal needed to win the Democrats' support will be open for public discussion.

The stock transaction between AT&T and BellSouth is estimated to be worth about $80 billion and would give control of the nation's largest phone company and its largest wireless company to San Antonio-based AT&T, which was formerly SBC Communications Inc. before it took over AT&T last year.

A federal court review of two giant telecom mergers from last year—the SBC/AT&T deal and the takeover of MCI by Verizon Communications Inc.—is still pending. Judge Emmet Sullivan is considering evidence as to whether federal regulators gave those deals sufficient scrutiny to protect the public interest.

Senate and House leaders from both parties had asked the FCC and the Justice Department to delay their decisions on the AT&T/BellSouth deal until judicial review of last year's mergers was concluded. The antitrust division of the Justice Department ignored those requests, and the FCC appeared poised to do the same.

The FCC is controlled by three Republican commissioners, but its two Democrats have unusual influence on the AT&T matter because one Republican commissioner, Robert McDowell, is not participating in the decision. Before he was named to the FCC by President Bush, McDowell worked as a lobbyist for AT&T competitors who actively fought merger approval.

Democratic commissioners have asked for conditions to assure that AT&T will not use its increased market power in ways that harm consumers or competitors.

AT&T, which had pushed hard to get its merger approved this week, said it now expects approval next month. "We ran short of time to gain final approval," said Dave Pacholczyk, an AT&T spokesman, "which isn't uncommon in these matters. We look forward to the Nov. 3 FCC meeting."

Pacholczyk said his company believes the merger should be approved without conditions, but is open to discuss reasonable conditions that will win unanimous approval of the deal from regulators.

Analysts said they doubt that the FCC delay will prove a major obstacle to AT&T's deal, but that it was unexpected.

"This delay is a big surprise," said Jeff Kagan, an Atlanta-based telecom industry analyst. Kagan said he expects the deal will win approval, but with some conditions imposed.

"I think ultimately, it's not much more than a speed bump for AT&T," said David McCourt, chief executive of Granahan McCourt Capital LLC, a private investment firm specializing in telecom and media. "But I think that the Justice Department, acting so quickly, has injected more partisan politics into the matter than was necessary."

Microsoft To Tweak Vista For EU Agency (AP)

Associated Press

AP, October 14, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Microsoft Corp. is making several key changes to its coming Windows Vista operating system in an bid to soothe European antitrust worries, while keeping its worldwide distribution plans on schedule.

Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, said Friday that the company agreed to change how people can set their preferred search service if they upgrade to Microsoft's new Internet Explorer browser. The Redmond, Wash., company also has tweaked Vista's security system to address concerns it was favoring Microsoft's products over competing security offerings.

In addition, the company plans to have an international standards organization review a controversial new file format that will be included in Windows and the company's Office business suite. He said that was a step toward making the format available for other companies to license.

Even with the changes, which will be included in all versions the company ships worldwide, Microsoft said it plans deliver the long-delayed Vista to large businesses in November and consumers and small businesses in January.

The announcement follows many testy exchanges between Microsoft and European regulators, who remain embroiled in a long-running antitrust dispute over the current version of Windows.

But Smith told The Associated Press the changes announced Friday were the result of conversation, rather than litigation, between the two parties. EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes and Steve Ballmer, Microsoft's chief executive, spoke by phone Thursday.

The EU antitrust office, which this spring voiced concerns about the new Windows software, refused to back Microsoft's optimism that Europe's concerns had been met.

"The jury is out," a spokesman said.

Microsoft Makes Vista Changes (SEATIMES)

By Benjamin J. Romano, Seattle Times technology reporter

The Seattle Times, October 14, 2006

Microsoft is confident that changes it's making to Windows Vista will assuage competition concerns raised by European and Korean antitrust officials, and it plans to launch the new operating system on schedule around the world.

Last month, the company had raised the specter of a delayed launch in Europe, pending negotiations with the European Commission (EC) over features in Vista.

Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith struck a diplomatic tone Friday, saying the company received "clear guidance" during months of "constructive dialogue" with regulators at the commission, the administrative arm of the European Union. In response, it is making significant changes to three areas of the software: security, search and a new file format.

"Having made each of these changes, the company and [CEO] Steve Ballmer felt comfortable moving forward and felt confident that we are in compliance with our EU competition law obligations," Smith said during a conference call with reporters.

He said Ballmer spoke with European Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes on Thursday to inform her of the company's plans.

Wall Street viewed the news favorably, bidding Microsoft shares up 15 cents Friday to close at $28.37, a level it has not seen in nearly two years.

The company's comments strengthened investor confidence in the release schedule for Vista, due out for large business customers in November and for broad release in January. However, Vista is coming out more than two years later than originally planned.

"There's a timing issue," said Joe Wilcox, an analyst with Jupiter Research. "Microsoft wants to ship this operating system on time and it wants to ship it everywhere. And that puts Microsoft in a position to be more conciliatory."

Both Smith and the EC pointed out that there is no "green light" from the regulatory body, which does not approve products in advance.

Microsoft "must shoulder its own responsibilities to ensure that Vista is fully compliant" with competition rules and a 2004 anti-trust ruling against the company regarding the predecessor to Vista, the EC said in a brief statement Friday.

Fines and penalties stemming from that ruling have ballooned to nearly $1 billion. Microsoft is appealing.

The changes to Vista Microsoft announced Friday offer no guarantee that additional antitrust issues won't arise in the future.

"The commission will closely monitor the effects of Vista in the market and, in particular, examine any complaints concerning Vista on their own merits," the statement concluded.

Computer-security firms, among the most vocal complainants to the EC about Vista recently, withheld judgment on Microsoft's changes.

DOJ_NMG_0081103

"It's encouraging that they've said this," said Chris Paden, a Symantec spokesman. "It's a step in the right direction, but at the same time, security vendors are going to be wondering when" Microsoft will make technical details of the changes available for them to use.

McAfee, another security firm, did not return calls for comment.

Smith outlined the changes, which will apply to versions of the program sold in all markets, not just Europe.

Access granted

Microsoft is providing access to the kernel, or central part, of its code for 64-bit versions of Windows Vista, Smith said. A security feature called PatchGuard keeps the kernel inaccessible and unchanged. Previously, vendors had used access to the kernel for features of their own products.

Instead of removing PatchGuard, Microsoft built kernel-level application programming interfaces (APIs) so that security software vendors can still get access to parts of Vista they need, Smith said.

Microsoft also changed its Windows Security Center, a feature that sends alerts to users when, say, a firewall has been turned off or anti-virus software needs updating. Now, when a competitor's security product is installed, Windows Security Center will not duplicate alerts the competitive product may send.

Upgrade-process changed

In search, Microsoft changed the upgrade process to Vista and its Internet Explorer 7 browser to ensure that all search engines, such as Google, Yahoo! and its own Live Search, are on a level playing field.

Microsoft also agreed to submit its new file format — XML Paper Specification, or XPS, a competitor to Adobe's PDF — to a standards organization. Smith said it will also loosen the licensing terms under which the XPS format is available to other software providers for use in their own products.

He noted that the changes made at the EC's behest are one part of the global regulatory thicket Microsoft has navigated in building Vista.

"Windows Vista is probably one of the most heavily scrutinized products in the history of technology," he said, adding that Microsoft has worked with more than 20 government agencies on three continents.

Smith said that Microsoft has also been in discussions with the Korean Fair Trade Commission and plans to release a unique version of Vista to comply with its rules, on the same schedule.

Microsoft Makes Changes In Windows Vista To Suit Foreign Regulators (NYT)

By Paul Meller

BRUSSELS, Oct. 13 — Microsoft announced Friday that Windows Vista, the next version of its computer operating system, had been altered to satisfy regulatory concerns and would be introduced simultaneously worldwide. Less than a month ago, it had warned that antitrust problems could delay the introduction in Europe and South Korea.

A delay in one country or region would have serious consequences for software developers, computer manufacturers and retailers there. It would also create complications for Microsoft, which has always rolled out previous versions of Windows simultaneously around the world.

Steven A. Ballmer, Microsoft's chief executive, confirmed the global introduction of Vista in a phone conversation with the European competition commissioner, Neelie Kroes, late Thursday.

The new operating system will go on sale to large computer manufacturers next month and to the public in January.

In the statement issued Friday, Microsoft said it had altered Vista to address the concerns the commission has expressed about the new operating system over the last eight months.

Similarly, the concerns of South Korea's Fair Trade Commission have also been addressed, Microsoft said.

"We are excited to bring the security enhancements and innovative new features of Windows Vista to our customers and partners around the world, and we are committed to adhering to local law in every region of the world," Mr. Ballmer said in the statement.

Until now, Microsoft has resisted pressure to change Vista. Last month it accused the European Commission of not giving it clear enough guidance on whether Vista would pass muster under European antitrust law.

It also highlighted research that showed that hundreds of thousands of jobs in the European technology industry were at stake if Vista's introduction were delayed. Also last month, members of the European Parliament wrote to Ms. Kroes warning her of the harm she would be causing to European companies if she forced a delay.

The commission stood its ground, insisting that it was not up to regulators to approve Vista before its introduction. It repeated this message Friday. "The commission has not given a green light to Microsoft to deliver Vista," it said in a statement. "Microsoft must shoulder its own responsibilities to ensure that Vista is fully compliant with competition rules and in particular with the principles laid down in the March 2004 commission antitrust decision concerning Microsoft."

In 2004, the commission found that Microsoft had violated antitrust rules by bundling its music and video player, Media Player, into Windows XP and ordered the company to release a second version of Windows with Media Player stripped out.

"We understand that the European commission doesn't give a green light to a product before it is launched, and that it is a company's obligation to be in compliance with antitrust law," Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, said in a conference call with journalists on Friday.

"Having made the changes we were advised to make, we are confident Vista is in compliance," he added.

Many of the problems with Vista identified by the commission echo the issues that resulted in the 2004 antitrust ruling. It alerted Microsoft to five potential antitrust problems in March, which were addressed in changes incorporated into the new operating system over the summer.

Last month, the commission pointed to three remaining problems, concerning Microsoft's plan to bundle into Vista an Internet search engine, security software and a fixed document format similar to the one sold by the software company Adobe.

Symantec, a leader in antivirus software, embarked on a huge public relations offensive, contending that Microsoft was effectively shutting it and other security software specialists out of Vista.

Two weeks ago, Microsoft addressed the main concerns of Symantec by agreeing to allow access to the heart, or kernel, of the Windows operating system to security products made by competitors. In the area of search, Microsoft changed Vista to allow users to choose their own search engine and make it the default Internet search tool on their computers.

In the area of fixed document formats, Microsoft agreed to the commission's demands that its new fixed-layout document format, called the XML Paper Specification, be scrutinized by an independent standards-setting organization. It also agreed to change the licensing terms to make its format more available to other software developers.

The commission said in a statement that it would "closely monitor the effects of Vista in the market" and would examine any complaints the new operating system might provoke "on their own merits."

Microsoft To Ship Vista On Schedule (MERCN)

By Dean Takahashi

The San Jose Mercury News, October 14, 2006

Microsoft said Friday that it would ship its Windows Vista operating system on schedule worldwide even as it addresses the concerns of European and Korean antitrust regulators as well as computer security firms.

The software giant will ship corporate versions of Vista in November and consumer versions in January, said Mary Snapp, vice president and deputy general counsel at Microsoft.

When the European Union raised concerns in March, Microsoft had warned it might have trouble making Vista available in Europe at the same time as other places.

``We are excited to bring the security enhancements and innovative new features of Windows Vista to our customers and partners around the world, and we are committed to adhering to local law in every region of the world," said Steve Ballmer, chief executive of Redmond, Wash.-based Microsoft.

Microsoft altered the operating system in several areas to respond to concerns of European and Korean regulators about ensuring fair competition, Snapp said. The company's changes address features related to security, search and document formats recognized by Vista.

The company also answered complaints from Silicon Valley-based security firms Symantec and McAfee.

The companies had accused the software programming giant of abusing its monopoly by controlling which security products can run on its new operating system. They say Microsoft blocked their ability to review the operating system's kernel, or core, and that Microsoft planned to confuse customers by offering its own security dashboard.

But Friday, Snapp said the company will allow security vendors to view the operating system's core by making available a key technology dubbed ``application programming interfaces."

In addition, the setup process for establishing security on the operating system will include options for choosing non-Microsoft security programs, Snapp said. When users click on the security center setup, they can choose Microsoft's solution as the default or choose options from other vendors.

Symantec representative Cris Paden said his company was aware of the concessions, but had yet to see the final detailed information needed to address their concerns.

``On one hand, it's encouraging that they're publicly committed to this, but we're being guardedly optimistic," Paden said. ``They haven't committed to a timeline and . . . it would be nice if they talked to us."

Microsoft will also make it possible for users to pick alternative search engines such as Google or Yahoo as their default. Changes such as these are important to third-party software companies because they fear that Microsoft's tight coupling of the operating system with its own software applications will give it an unfair advantage.

Google officials are awaiting Microsoft's impending release of the Internet Explorer 7.0 browser, which will hit the market ahead of the consumer version of Vista. That browser has a built-in search function, and Google wants to make sure users have a choice.

``We understand that Microsoft may make changes to the search default in IE7," said Ricardo Reyes, a Google official. ``But we haven't seen how it will be implemented yet."

In the past, conflicts on software bundling with Netscape and Real Networks led to years of litigation.

Finally, Microsoft said it would work with standard-setting groups to make the document formats recognized by Windows Vista available to other companies.

Bush Signs Bill For Great Lakes Habitats (AP-Y)

AP, October 14, 2006

President Bush has signed a bill to reauthorize up to $16 million a year for grants programs to restore habitats in the Great Lakes region.

The legislation signed into law Thursday would authorize $80 million over five years to restore fish and wildlife habitats, provide money for fish and wildlife projects and upgrade reports on the area's ecosystem.

The money won't be spent unless included it's included in separate appropriations bills, but supporters said it would build momentum for a comprehensive $20 billion plan to restore the Great Lakes.

"This is a victory for our Great Lakes and the people who enjoy its beaches, world-class fishing streams and national parklands," said Tom Kiernan, president of the National Parks Conservation Association.

The lakes make up about 95 percent of North America's fresh water and have been threatened by pollution, invasive species and the loss of habitat.

The measure aims to guard thousands of different species of fish and wildlife and 130 endangered or rare plants and animal species that have been identified within the region's ecosystem. It was led by Sens. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, and Carl Levin, D-Mich., and Reps. Mark Kirk, R-Ill., and Dale Kildee, D-Mich.

Overcrowding, Not Race, Is US's Immigration Problem (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

Some time in the next few days the 300 millionth American will be born or perhaps – so the joke goes – will cross illegally into the US from Mexico at night. Like many jokes, this one has a kernel of truth. In 1967, when America's population hit 200m, only five per cent of the country was foreign-born. Today that proportion has more than doubled. By 2043, when the US is projected to cross 400m, it is likely to be far higher. An increasingly large share will be Hispanic.

But America's population milestone is significant for reasons other than the politics of immigration. Samuel Huntingdon, the author of The Clash of Civilisations and the lesser-known Who Are We? The Challenges to America's National Identity, may or may not speak for large numbers of Americans when he warns of the "unique and disturbing challenge" posed to America's social fabric by the influx of Mexicans. But history is definitely not on his side.

As the Washington-based Brookings Institution points out in an excellent series on America's 300m landmark*, fears of being swamped by un-American foreigners are older than America itself. Writing more than 20 years before the American revolution, Benjamin Franklin warned that the influx of Germans into Philadelphia "will shortly be so numerous as to Germanise us instead of our Anglifying them".

Today more Americans describe themselves of German than of British descent yet almost all of them are able to do so only in English. The notion that America's newer "Latino" arrivals will somehow convert America into a Spanish-speaking country is barely less tenable than Mr Franklin's fears about Germans.

It is fairly certain, however, that Hispanic immigrants will energise America's economy in much the same way as their Polish, Jewish, Irish and Italian predecessors – or indeed as do their less numerous contemporaries from Africa and Asia. As President George W. Bush once said, perhaps with one eye on the Hispanic vote: "Hell, if they can make it through the Great Bend we want 'em."

It is true that America is becoming less white, assuming – as the US Census Bureau does – that you define Hispanics as non-white. Some Americans sublimate their fear of being swamped by darker skins by talking instead about the linguistic or cultural threat to the American way of life. But the very fact that only a tiny slice of rightwing nuts feel able to articulate their racial fears suggests that the tide is permanently against them.

Between 1980 and 2000 the proportion of Americans in racially mixed marriages doubled to six per cent. A quarter of Americans say they have a close relative of a different colour. In short, there is little reason to believe the character of America's current expansion is a serious threat to its long tradition of assimilating large numbers of newcomers from strange lands.

More interesting, but perhaps less appreciated, is what America's continued expansion means for its future quality of life – and, indeed, that of the rest of the planet. Nobody who drives through America's seemingly endless suburbs and "exurbs" can miss the tension between the country's vast open horizons and the increasing traffic gridlock around them. Nor can they fail to notice that it is America's sprawling urban environs, rather than the cities themselves, that are accommodating the country's growing numbers. It is true that America's population density is still less than a quarter that of continental Europe. But Europe's population growth has reached a virtual standstill. Besides, there are not too many Americans who aspire to live in North Dakota.

For the large majority of Americans living near or on its east or west coastlines, the reality of growing population density is hard to ignore. What were once isolated mountain escapes or unblemished patches of coastline are now jam-packed with resorts, second homes and, of course, snaking queues of traffic. So condensed have America's coastlines become that it is often hard to distinguish one built-up area from another because what falls in between is crammed with the same strip malls and chain motels as the last.

Imagine America a generation from now with one-third more freeways, out-of-town malls, refuse landfills, residential developments and sports utility vehicles than it has today. That, of course, is without mentioning the threat of global warming to which Americans disproportionately contribute. With 4 per cent of the planet's population, America contributes a quarter of the world's greenhouse gas emissions.

Like many others, I will raise my glass to the vibrant culture of diversity and optimism that is symbolised by America's latest notch on the population ladder. But, like growing numbers of mainstream Americans, I will also ask whether this is the latest sign of America's economic success or a reminder that growth cannot continue in this fashion indefinitely. It is a good question to which the answer is yes, and probably.

Science Ignored, Again (NYT)

The Bush administration loves to talk about the virtues of "sound science," by which it usually means science that buttresses its own political agenda. But when some truly independent science comes along to threaten that agenda, the administration often ignores or minimizes it. The latest example involves the Environmental Protection Agency's decision to reject the recommendations of experts inside and outside the government who had urged a significant tightening of federal standards regulating the amount of soot in the air.

At issue were so-called fine particles, tiny specks of soot that are less than one-thirtieth the diameter of a human hair. They penetrate deep into the lungs and circulatory system and have been implicated in tens of thousands of deaths annually from both respiratory and coronary disease. The E.P.A., obliged under the Clean Air Act to set new exposure levels every five years, tightened the daily standard. But it left unchanged the annual standard, which affects chronic exposure and which the medical community regards as more important.

In so doing, the agency rejected the recommendation of its own staff scientists and even that of its Clean Air Scientific Advisory Council, a 22-member group of outside experts that had recommended a significant tightening of the standards. Stephen Johnson, the agency administrator, claimed there was "insufficient evidence" linking health problems to long-term exposure. He added that "wherever the science gave us a clear picture, we took clear action," noting also that "there was not complete agreement on the standard."

One wonders how much evidence Mr. Johnson requires, and how "complete" an "agreement" must be before he takes action. A 20-2 vote in favor of stronger standards seems fairly convincing to us; likewise the unanimous plea for stronger standards from mainstream groups like the American Medical Association.

The environmental and medical communities suspect that the administration's main motive was to save the power companies and other industrial sources of pollution about $1.9 billion in new investment that the more protective annual standard would have required. But here, too, the administration appears to have ignored expert advice. Last Friday, the agency released an economic analysis showing that in exchange for $1.9 billion in new costs, the stronger annual standards could save as many as 24,000 thousand lives and as much as $50 billion annually in health care and other costs to society. Studies like these always offer a range of possible outcomes, but even at the lower end — 2,200 lives and $4.3 billion in money saved — the cost-benefit ratios are very favorable.

In the next year or so, the administration must decide whether to tighten the standards for another pollutant, ground-level ozone, which causes smog and is also associated with respiratory diseases. The scientific advisory committee has tentatively recommended that the ozone standard be tightened, citing new evidence of smog's adverse effects. This time Mr. Johnson should pay more attention to the scientists and less to the political strategists in the White House.

Medical Marijuana Advocate Faces New U.S. Indictment (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 13 — A leading medical marijuana advocate who successfully appealed his federal conviction this year has been indicted on new criminal charges that include tax evasion and money laundering.

DOJ_NMG_0081108

The man, Ed Rosenthal, a well-known spokesman for the movement to legalize marijuana, was already facing a retrial on federal charges of growing marijuana for medical use. He is to be arraigned Monday in Federal District Court here on the new indictment, unsealed late Thursday.

It accuses Mr. Rosenthal, 61, of 14 felony charges that include cultivating marijuana plants; laundering $1,850, which the government says he got from selling the plants to medical dispensaries; and tax evasion. His tax returns, prosecutors said, omitted income from the sale of the plants.

Reached Friday at his home in Oakland, Mr. Rosenthal said he thought the efforts to prosecute him were part of a campaign to shutter medical marijuana sites in California and to subvert the state law allowing them.

"They want to shut me up," he said. "They are vindictive. They don't like anybody beating them, and they will go after you again and again until they wear you down."

The state and the federal government have been locked in a legal and cultural battle over the medicinal merits of marijuana since 1996, when California voters approved a ballot measure giving seriously ill patients the right to buy and use the drug with a doctor's prescription.

The Drug Enforcement Agency has been aggressive in investigating medical marijuana facilities. Last week, the authorities raided and closed five Bay Area sites, arresting 15 people.

A spokesman for the United States attorney's office, Luke Macaulay, would not comment on the new indictment, but said, "Drugs are a priority for the Justice Department, being that marijuana is illegal under federal law."

The new charges against Mr. Rosenthal are similar to those in a 2002 federal indictment. At the time, Mr. Rosenthal worked for the City of Oakland and was sanctioned under city and state laws to grow marijuana plants and sell them to dispensaries. He was convicted by a jury, but a federal appeals court overturned the decision, citing juror misconduct. He was granted a new trial, and prosecutors were moving forward, but the new federal indictment supersedes the earlier one.

Guilty Pleas By 2 Top Cali Cartel Figures Were 15 Years In Making (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

The guilty pleas by the two highest-ranking Colombian cocaine traffickers ever to appear in a U.S. courtroom had their roots in a hot summer morning 15 years ago when a drug-sniffing dog named Iowa found something suspicious.

The dog's alert on Aug. 26, 1991, led to the discovery at the Port of Miami of more than 12 tons of cocaine concealed in metal tubes that had, in turn, been hidden inside heavy concrete posts.

The shipment served notice to federal investigators that the Cali cartel had surpassed the better-known - and much more violent - Medellin cartel in controlling Colombia's cocaine trade and was employing ingenious new smuggling methods.

"It was electric, the atmosphere at the time," recalled Eddie Ryan, a federal prosecutor who worked the case until leaving Miami for Charlotte three years ago. "It was a huge load. This was a new game and they were better at it than anybody had ever been."

The investigation spawned by the big find would take many twists and turns and break new legal ground along the way.

It culminated in the Sept. 26 guilty pleas to U.S. drug trafficking charges by brothers Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, the Cali cartel kingpins nicknamed "The Chess Player" and "The Master" who are now serving 30-year prison sentences. A total of 141 cartel members have been convicted or pleaded guilty for their roles in an organization once responsible for 80 percent of the world's cocaine.

For Ed Kacerosky, the Customs agent who led the investigation from its inception, that moment in a Miami courtroom wasn't his biggest in the case.

Far better, he said, came after a midlevel defendant briefly mentioned links between the Cali smugglers and operations in Guatemala. That would lead to a Miami frozen vegetable warehouse used as a front to smuggle cocaine and to a lawyer who ran the cartel's South Florida operations.

"You need to catch a break," said Kacerosky, 50, now a U.S Customs and Immigration Enforcement supervisory special agent. "You could be the greatest detective but you need to have a little bit of luck."

One of those breaks came after one of a dozen Cali associates waited a bit too late to throw his cell phone into the Miami River.

Kacerosky had identified the Miami-based operatives by decoding phone numbers seized from a man arrested for involvement in the load hidden in concrete posts. When he called the numbers, all of them were dead except one - and that one had called the replacement numbers for all his confederates.

"That was the first big success. That's what turned the tide in this whole case," Kacerosky said.

It was also the early days of cell phones - the big, clunky gray or black ones - and well before computers were in common use to crunch investigative data, Kacerosky said. "This was all first-time stuff," he said.

Information from that cell phone information led to the frozen vegetable operation that got weekly shipments from Guatemala - "I said 'bingo'" recalled Kacerosky - and to a lawyer named Harold Ackerman, who lived in a Miami Beach mansion. A wiretap was placed on his phone and investigators monitored 186 phone calls over a six-day period discussing Cali cocaine shipments, money laundering and so forth.

"That was just an absolute gold mine," Kacerosky said.

Ackerman was eventually convicted and sentenced to six life terms but won sentence reductions for his cooperation with federal prosecutors. Well before that, however, he provided another set of clues that helped unravel the cartel.

There were 24 employees listed in Ackerman's coded address book. All had fled Miami after Ackerman's 1992 arrest except a new hire named Raul Marti, who worked at the Taino Coffee Co. Investigators discovered that Taino was getting three or four shipping containers of "coffee" per month from Panama, which seemed suspiciously high.

Marti had no cell phone and didn't make many calls from his office. But four times a day, Marti would go to one of several banks of pay phones in Miami and use a prepaid phone debit card - cutting-edge technology in those days - to call numbers in Cali, Colombia.

Kacerosky was able to trace the cards' access numbers to a switching service in Miami that specialized in Colombian phone debit cards. So rather than trying to obtain difficult-to-get wiretap orders for dozens of pay phones, Customs investigators got warrants for the card numbers and monitored the calls through the switching service.

That led to hundreds of tapes of conversations between Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela and several Cali operatives and lawyers in the United States. Eventually, other Miami-based attorneys would join Ackerman in prison for convictions on such things as preparing false affidavits, paying hush money and relaying threats from cartel kingpins.

Those prosecutions, and the unprecedented search warrants approved in 1994 by the Justice Department for lawyers' offices, changed the way defense attorneys do business - especially the care taken to discover the source of a client's money.

"It really changed the landscape for the country on how lawyers had to look at their fees and had to protect themselves in addition to their clients," said David O. Markus, who represents Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela.

The case also provided important lessons for law enforcement. Perhaps the key, Kacerosky said, was that investigators didn't quit after arresting a trio of low-level people who had been hired to break open those original cocaine-laden concrete posts in 1991.

Investigators knew the Cali kingpins had a state-of-the-art warehouse filled with cutting tools and a dozen workers ready to slice open the posts and distribute the cocaine gradually. But the Rodriguez Orejuela brothers opted instead for three guys with sledgehammers, Kacerosky said, to test whether U.S. agents were on the trail of their big load.

It would have been easy to declare victory and go home after making that bust, but Customs, the Drug Enforcement Administration and drug task force other investigators did not.

"The No. 1 lesson is you never stop investigating," Kacerosky said.

Guilty Plea In Colo. House Bombs Case (AP)

By Jon Sarche, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0081110

(AP) - DENVER-A former air traffic controller accused of planting homemade bombs in March outside the Grand Junction homes of four co-workers and a Federal Aviation Administration official pleaded guilty Friday to one single count that could put him in prison for more than a decade.

Burke, 54, was arrested in Utah in April. He agreed to plead guilty to a charge of malicious damage to a building used in interstate commerce.

U.S. District Judge Robert Blackburn said the charge is punishable by five to 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000. Prosecutors said they will recommended a term of 10 years when Burke is sentenced on Feb. 2.

Burke had worked for Serco Group PLC, a British company that staffs air traffic control towers at airports in Grand Junction and 55 other locations. He was fired in 2004 after working for Serco for four years.

The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms has said the Grand Junction bombs were similar to a device that exploded at Serco offices in Murfreesboro, Tenn., in February.

No one was injured and only minor property damage was reported when three of the bombs in Grand Junction exploded. Two others were defused by bomb technicians.

IMMIGRATION:

Suit Over Illegals OK'd For Workers At Tyson Foods (WT)

By Steve Hirsch, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

A federal judge has ruled that workers can file a class-action suit against Tyson Foods Inc. for depressing wages by hiring illegal aliens.

Howard W. Foster, a Chicago lawyer for the Tyson employees, described the ruling in Winchester, Tenn., as a "very big step," allowing him to seek damages for thousands of workers at eight plants -- including one in Glen Allen, Va. -- instead of just the four original plaintiffs.

The case, filed in 2002 under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), is one of a growing number across the nation challenging illegal aliens in the workplace. In August, a temporary agency in California sued its competitors under the state's unfair-competition laws.

Mr. Foster has represented U.S. citizens seeking damages for wage depression caused by employment of illegal aliens in other cases, including one against Mohawk Industries and a class-action case against Zirkle Fruit Co., which has been settled.

"You can't bring these cases unless they get certified as class actions," he said yesterday.

"An individual person can't bring one -- it's not economically viable to do it. So it's important that it gets certified as a class action," he said.

An estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens are living in the United States, making up a large part of the nation's work force.

In April, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced a nationwide crackdown to target employers who "knowingly and recklessly" hire illegal aliens, and those who help them find jobs.

His announcement coincided with news that more than 1,180 illegal aliens had been arrested during raids at 40 IFCO Systems North America Inc. plants. The Houston company is the largest pallet services company in the U.S.

Yesterday, Tyson Foods described the judge's ruling as "procedural," adding that it was "not based on the merits of this case, which was actually dismissed by another judge back in 2002."

"We remain confident our company will ultimately prevail," Tyson spokesman Gary Mickelson said by e-mail.

"The plaintiffs' claims in this lawsuit are simply unfounded and largely based on federal charges our company has already successfully defended," he said, adding, "In 2003, a Chattanooga jury found the Springdale, Ark., company not guilty of violating immigration laws, confirming the company has made a concerted effort to hire properly and abide by the law."

U.S. District Judge Curtis L. Collier's order, issued Tuesday, schedules a Jan. 29 conference with lawyers. It is expected he will set a trial date then.

A federal jury in March 2003 acquitted Tyson and three former managers of conspiring to hire illegal aliens from Mexico and Central America for low-wage production jobs to boost profits. Two former Tyson managers who made plea deals were sentenced to one year each of probation.

Before the case went to trial, four former employees at Tyson's Shelbyville, Tenn., plant sued. The lawsuit by Birda Trollinger, Robert Martinez, Tabetha Edding and Doris Jewell contends the company violated the RICO Act by knowingly hiring illegal aliens who were willing to work for wages below those acceptable to Americans.

In 2004, a three-judge panel of the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati overturned a lower-court dismissal of the four workers' case.

The lawsuit says Tyson relied on a network of recruiters and temporary employment agencies that brought illegal workers into the United States and supplied them with false identification.

Mr. Foster said Tyson employee pay, "probably $8 to $10 an hour," was depressed by the hiring of illegal aliens.

"We haven't stated exactly" by what amount wages were depressed, he said, adding that that would be determined by "experts."

The eight Tyson plants named in the suit are at Shelbyville; Corydon, Ind.; Gadsden, Ala., Blountsville, Ala., Ashland, Ala.; Sedalia, Mo.; Center, Texas and Glen Allen, Va.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Govt. Reports 788 Cases Of Lost Data (AP-Y)

By Stephen Ohlemacher, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Federal workers at 19 agencies have lost personal information affecting thousands of employees and the public, raising fresh concerns about the government's ability to protect sensitive information.

Most of the data was lost or stolen. In a few cases, it was accessed by computer hackers, according a report released Friday by the House Government Reform Committee. Government contractors were responsible for many of the security breaches.

In all, the committee reported 788 incidents involving the loss or compromise of sensitive personal information since Jan. 1, 2003. That was in addition to the "hundreds of security and privacy incidents" at the Department of Veterans Affairs, the report said.

"Data loss is a government-wide occurrence," the report said. "The vast majority of data losses arose from physical thefts of portable computers, drives and disks or unauthorized use of data by employees."

The committee asked all Cabinet agencies, the Office of Personnel Management and the Social Security Administration to report all losses of sensitive personal information since January 2003. The request came after a laptop with information for more than 26.5 million military personnel was stolen from a Veterans Affairs Department employee in May. Law enforcement officials recovered the laptop, and the FBI said Social Security numbers and other personal data had not been copied.

In many of the newly reported cases, the agencies still don't know the extent of the losses, the report said.

The Treasury Department reported the most incidents — 340 — including one in 2005 in which an IRS employee reported a missing computer drive nearly a month after he had last seen it.

The Commerce Department reported 297 incidents since January 2003. However, in a separate report released in September, the department acknowledged losing 1,137 laptops since 2001. Most of the lost computers had been used by the Census Bureau.

Among the other security breaches cited in the report:

_In August, a laptop containing personal information on 30,000 applicants, prospects and recruiters fell off a motorcycle driven by a Navy recruiter. Someone in a car apparently stopped and picked up the computer. A notification letter is being prepared for those affected.

DOJ_NMG_0081112

_In 2004, a federal student aid contractor used a commercial shipping company to send personal information on 8,290 borrowers. The package was lost in transit, but the Education Department decided against notifying the affected people.

_A computer hacker used "malicious software" to access files containing personal information on 1,717 employees of the National Nuclear Security Administration in 2005. The Energy Department, which oversees the agency, said it has improved its computer defenses.

• Two employees of a contractor for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services stole records containing information on about 1,574 Medicare beneficiaries "for the purpose of identity theft" in 2005. The affected people were notified.

_A company that issues charge cards for the Interior Department lost data tapes containing information on 61,000 cardholders in 2005. The cards were issued under the General Services Administration's SmartPay program. Affected cardholders were notified.

_In July, six Justice Department employees submitted computerized attendance reports containing Social Security numbers. Those reports were then downloaded 220 times and viewed 7,772 times. The incident is being investigated.

Data Theft At Agencies Not As Uncommon As Hoped (LAT)

By Moises Mendoza, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

A House report deems the incidence of lost or stolen information more pervasive than thought. Most cases are outright theft, it says.

WASHINGTON — Incidents of lost or stolen personal data at federal government agencies are more widespread than previously thought, affecting all 19 federal departments and millions of citizens since 2003, according to a congressional report released Friday.

Most of the nearly 800 incidents of data losses have never been publicly reported. The "vast majority" were not accidental misplacements, but rather outright thefts of computers or data disks containing sensitive information such as Social Security numbers. In some cases the data were used inappropriately by employees and private contractors, the report said.

The House Government Reform Committee began investigating data losses after several high-profile security breaches, including the theft in May from an employee's home of a Veterans Affairs laptop containing the personal data of more than 26 million veterans.

Since then, several other agencies, including the Social Security Administration, the Internal Revenue Service and the Department of Health and Human Services, have revealed security breaches that affected thousands more individuals.

The report found that agencies are often slow to realize that data thefts have taken place or how many people were affected by the breaches. And it was unclear how often they have informed citizens that their data might have been compromised, the report added.

Committee member Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) said federal agencies were losing too much information and suffering too many breaches.

"Americans expect their private information to be protected," Waxman said in a statement. "But the reality is that federal security systems remain far too vulnerable."

According to the report, recent incidents included:

• The loss in March of a Defense Department portable data drive that included personnel records of more than 200,000 Marines who served from 2001 to 2005. The report said the department sent a notification letter to the Marine Cops and the affected Marines.

• The loss of a Department of Education magnetic tape containing the personal information of more than 11,000 student loan borrowers.

• An unauthorized breach of an Air Force database compromising personal data of more than 30,000 members of the military.

Other incidents of data loss were reported to the committee by the departments of Housing and Urban Development, Transportation, State, Treasury, Commerce and Veterans Affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0081113

The Commerce Department, for example, reported 214 incidents of lost or stolen computers at the Census Bureau. Veterans Affairs officials reported their data on two large spreadsheets covering hundreds of security and privacy breaches, the report said.

In most cases, the report said, there was little evidence that thieves used the data to steal people's identities. However, the report did cite one identity theft scheme last year by a Health and Human Services contractor that affected more than 1,500 people.

A few incidents have involved hackers looking to use citizens' personal data for illegal purposes, the report said.

U.S. Careless With Citizens' Information (WASHTIMES)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

Personal files maintained by the federal government on all U.S. citizens "remain at risk," according to a House report released yesterday, which said the stored information is routinely lost because of carelessness, misconduct or theft.

"The federal government compiles and holds sensitive personal information on every citizen, including health records, tax returns and military records," said a report by the House Government Reform Committee.

"In many cases, agencies do not know what information they have, who has access to the information, and what devices containing information have been lost, stolen or misplaced."

The report said much of the information was lost when laptop computers were stolen, documenting the theft of more than 1,800 government-owned laptop computers -- including one belonging to the Defense Department and containing personal information on 30,000 applicants, recruiters and prospects that "fell off a motorcycle belonging to a Navy recruiter."

The committee, chaired by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, began an investigation into the government's ability to keep its files secure after the Department of Veterans Affairs' disclosure that computer equipment containing the personal information of 26.5 million veterans and active-duty members of the military had been stolen from the home of a department employee.

Since that time, several other agencies -- including the Social Security Administration, the Internal Revenue Service and the Department of Health and Human Services -- have acknowledged security breaches that affected thousands more people.

To develop what the committee called "a full picture of the risks posed by data breaches at federal agencies," it asked agencies to provide details about incidents involving the loss or compromise of any sensitive personal information held by the agency or a contractor since Jan. 1, 2003.

The report outlined a "wide range of incidents involving data loss or theft, privacy breaches and security incidents," noting that despite the volume of sensitive information held by the agencies, there is no requirement that the public be notified if it is compromised.

The committee found that data loss is a governmentwide occurrence, noting that 19 federal departments and agencies had reported at least one loss of personally identifiable information since January 2003. It said the agencies do not always know what has been lost or how many people could be affected by a particular data loss.

It also said that only a small number of the data breaches are reported to the committee were caused by hackers breaking into computer systems online, with the vast majority of losses resulting from thefts of portable computers, drives and disks, or unauthorized use of data by employees.

The committee also said that federal agencies rely heavily on private-sector contractors for information-technology management services and, as a result, many of the reported data breaches were the responsibility of contractors.

According to the committee, problems concerning the loss of personal information were found at Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, Education, Energy, Health and Human Services, Homeland Security, Housing and Urban Development, Interior, Justice, Labor, State, Transportation, Treasury, Veterans Affairs, Office of Personnel Management and the Social Security Administration.

The Identity Theft Scare (WP)

By Fred H. Cate

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Identity theft is getting a lot of attention these days -- from news stories about missing laptops and lost data to television commercials for fraud prevention and credit monitoring services. Congress has held hearings, and members have issued forecasts of an impending plague of identity theft. Rep. Edward Markey (D-Mass.), in a statement typical of many of his congressional colleagues, said that "Social Security numbers and date-of-birth information are pure gold in the hands of identity thieves, who quickly convert them into credit cards and cash equivalents to perpetrate massive frauds."

When a laptop was stolen from the home of a Department of Veterans Affairs employee this year, newspapers across the nation editorialized about the dangers facing the people whose data were on the computer. The Post alone published more than 40 stories and wrote that "26.5 million veterans were placed at risk of identity theft." The VA notified all 26.5 million of them and asked Congress for $160.5 million to cover the cost of one year of credit monitoring for the veterans.

Then the laptop was recovered -- the data untouched and the risk of identity theft shown to be nonexistent.

The happy ending to the VA saga should have come as no surprise. The fact is that few if any such breaches lead to identity theft or other consumer injuries.

A 2005 study by ID Analytics, which operates a nationwide fraud-detection network, found that even when the missing information included credit card numbers or other account-level data, the risk of identity theft was no greater than for accounts from which no information was lost or stolen. Two years after a theft, only one out of every 1,020 account holders whose information had been stolen -- less than one-tenth of 1 percent -- had been targets of any attempted fraud.

The reasons are not hard to discern.

First, the term security "breach" is so broad that it includes cases, such as that of the VA employee, in which the target of the theft was equipment, not data. In fact, most security breaches involve the accidental loss of information or equipment rather than a deliberate attack on data.

Second, identity theft is most commonly the result of data being obtained directly from victims, not through security breaches. According to a 2005 Javelin Strategy & Research survey, for the half of victims of identity-based fraud who knew where their information had been obtained, the most common source was a "lost or stolen wallet, checkbook, or credit card."

Thirty-five percent of identity-theft cases in which the perpetrator was identified involved a "family member or relative," and 18 percent a friend or neighbor. That means that roughly half of all known identity thieves were not strangers. Another 23 percent of such cases involved dishonest employees. All together, three-fourths of identity theft cases did not involve access to the kind of third-party data obtained through a security breach.

Third, identify theft affects far fewer Americans than the hype suggests. Although the figure most commonly cited in the media is 10 million U.S. victims a year, in April the Justice Department put the number at 3.6 million for the second half of 2004.

But more than half of those cases (two-thirds, according to the Federal Trade Commission) actually involve credit card fraud. This is good news, because Congress long ago limited consumer liability for credit card fraud to $50, and the universal industry practice is to waive that charge.

The Justice Department estimates that there were only 538,700 cases of true identity theft (those in which personal information was used to open accounts in the victim's name) in the second half of 2004. The FTC received about 250,000 identity-theft complaints in 2005. Moreover, research shows that identity theft is on the decline.

The danger of the security breach frenzy is not merely that it exaggerates the risk of identity theft and the role that security breaches play but that it ignores greater threats, such as the involvement of organized crime and the emergence of new and harder-to-detect frauds, that menace our increasingly information-dependent society.

Outgoing Medicare Chief Cites Drug Savings (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Washington Post Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0081115

The Medicare prescription drug benefit is on pace to cost the federal government about $30 billion this year, far less than the $43 billion originally projected, outgoing Medicare chief Mark B. McClellan said yesterday.

The lower cost is a result of cheaper-than-expected premiums, fewer people than anticipated enrolling in the new coverage, and slower growth in drug spending, said McClellan, who is returning to the private sector next week after 2 1/2 years as administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

McClellan, 43, spent his last day having breakfast with a dozen reporters, conducting a conference call about Medicare's online tools for consumers and talking with his staff.

"And I've got a few boxes to pack up -- photos and things like that," said McClellan, who added that he was "probably just going to go home and collapse" at day's end.

The economist and physician previously served as commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration and as a member of the White House's Council of Economic Advisers. Leslie V. Norwalk, No. 2 at CMS, will take charge as acting administrator.

McClellan plans to announce an affiliation with a Washington think tank on Monday. The Texan said he is pleased that independent surveys show that 80 percent of people who signed up for the new drug benefit are satisfied with their plans. But what he is most proud of has been his emphasis on shifting Medicare toward better-coordinated, prevention-oriented care, he said.

"We have got to move in this kind of direction to have a sustainable, innovative, affordable health-care system," he said.

The lower costs, he said, are due largely to the competition among insurers to lure seniors to their plans. When Congress created the benefit, the average monthly premium was expected to be $37; it has turned out to be $24. And instead of rising to $40 next year as projected, the average premium should be $26, he said.

A House Democratic analysis, however, concluded that the average monthly premium in 2007 will be about $29, and that some beneficiaries will see far steeper increases. The analysis calculated that the average cost of the lowest-priced plan will rise 44 percent, to $13.58.

McClellan has called the analysis "misleading" because it does not account for seniors who have drug coverage through HMO-style Medicare Advantage plans.

Another factor in holding down costs is enrollment. There are 43 million people on Medicare, the federal health insurance program for the elderly, and actuaries estimated that 38 million would seek the new drug coverage.

Instead, about 23 million seniors enrolled in drug plans directly through Medicare, and 7 million others got coverage through employers that received a Medicare subsidy to continue private drug plans for their older employees and pensioners, officials said. An additional 5 million seniors get drug coverage through the Department of Veterans Affairs, and about 2.5 million are covered through the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program.

Predictions that many employers would drop their plans and send older workers or retirees to Medicare for drug coverage did not come to pass, McClellan said.

Finally, costs were lower than predicted because about 60 percent of the prescriptions filled under the new benefit were for generic drugs, compared with the national average of about 52 percent, he said.

The drug benefit's costs are projected to climb to $48 billion next year, in part because people who enrolled as late as this May will be on the books for all of 2007. But because that estimate does not reflect the latest cost data from the plans, McClellan doesn't expect it to stick.

"I think it's unlikely that we're going to see anything but a significant reduction in that $48 billion projection," he said.

White House Denies Book's Allegations (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

A former Bush aide claims that evangelical Christians were embraced for political gain at the White House but derided privately as "nuts," "ridiculous" and "goofy."

The allegations — denied by the White House on Friday — are in a new book by David Kuo, a conservative Christian who was deputy director of President Bush's Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives until 2003.

The book describes Kuo's frustration at what he felt was lackluster enthusiasm in the White House for the program, which seeks to steer more federal social service contracts to religious organizations. Details from the book, "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction," were reported by MSNBC ahead of Monday's publication date.

Kuo singled out staffers in the office of Karl Rove, Bush's top political adviser and deputy chief of staff, as particularly condescending toward evangelical Christians, viewing them as necessary to help win elections but ridiculing them behind the scenes.

Kuo also described how officials from the faith-based office were systematically dispatched to hold large events in areas where there were key House and Senate races before the 2002 elections.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said he had not yet seen the book. But he said Rove was asked if he made the comments and replied he had not. Kuo, however, doesn't single out anyone by name as making the condescending comments.

"These are people who are friends. You don't talk about friends that way," Snow said.

Bush's spokesman also said there was no attempt to exploit the office to score political points, and that the president had specifically directed it not be politicized.

Snow denied Kuo's charge that the White House's religious charities program wasn't given the status it deserved, saying Bush's personal commitment to the policy was solid. Kuo has complained publicly in the past that the White House did not push hard enough for promised federal funding for religious groups to help the poor.

Snow read from what he called a "very warm letter" Kuo wrote to Bush when he left the White House. Kuo told the president he was proud of what the initiative had accomplished and said "it's your staff's keen awareness of your unwavering support for this initiative that's made the difference."

Snow concluded that the reports on the book "seem at odds with what he was saying inside the building at the time he departed."

Kuo's account of how the faith-based office has been regarded inside the White House recalls that of another high-level alumnus of the program. John J. Dilulio Jr., the faith-based office's first director, who quit in 2002, told Esquire magazine that "Mayberry Machiavellis" led by Rove based policy only on re-election concerns. After his comments caused an uproar, Dilulio apologized for making what he said were rude remarks.

Conservatives Rally Against Bush Aide-Turned-Critic (WP)

By Alan Cooperman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

ExposÃ© of White House Scorn for Evangelicals Is Disputed

Conservative religious leaders described themselves as shocked yesterday by a new book's charge that Bush administration staffers privately dismissed evangelical Christian political activists as "nuts" and "goofy."

But their dismay was aimed at the book's author, former White House official David Kuo, rather than at President Bush or his senior advisers.

James Dobson, Charles W. Colson and other stalwarts of the conservative Christian movement defended the Bush administration and questioned the timing of the book's publication, a month before the midterm elections. Some suggested that Kuo had betrayed the White House.

"I feel sorry for him, because once you do something like this, you get your 15 minutes in the spotlight, but then after that nobody will touch you," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, a Christian advocacy group in Washington. "These kiss-and-tell books do more damage to the author than to the people they attack."

Kuo, who was deputy director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives in Bush's first term, alleges in the book, "Tempting Faith," that the Bush administration used its funding of religious charities to court evangelical voters in Machiavellian fashion.

The book is being published at a pivotal moment not just for Republicans who are battling to maintain control of the House and Senate but also for conservative Christian voters, whose support for the GOP has dipped in recent polls.

At 7 p.m. Sunday, evangelical leaders including Perkins and Dobson plan to broadcast a 90-minute television special from a Boston church to hundreds of other churches across the country in an attempt to keep religious conservatives from sitting out the election.

Called "Liberty Sunday," it will "highlight specific cases and stories where people's religious liberties have been threatened because of homosexual activism and gay marriage in Massachusetts," said Family Research Council spokeswoman Bethanie Swendsen.

At the same hour, CBS's "60 Minutes" will broadcast the first interview with Kuo about his book, which is scheduled to go on sale Monday. CBS and the book's publisher, Simon & Schuster, tried to keep a lid on the book's contents until the "60 Minutes" exclusive. But MSNBC host Keith Olbermann obtained a copy and began broadcasting excerpts Wednesday.

Conservative Christian leaders as well as present and former White House officials responded yesterday to the MSNBC report, noting that they had not yet seen the book itself.

White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters that the book's "assumption or insinuation seems to be that the administration takes lightly faith-based groups." That is "false," he said.

Asked whether the president's "faith-based initiative" was used for political purposes, Snow said flatly: "No." Snow also read from a letter Kuo wrote to Bush when he left the administration in December 2003, saying he was "proud of all the initiative has accomplished."

In the book, Kuo asserts that the faith-based office was hurriedly set up after Bush took office in 2001 by a transition volunteer who was given less than a week to roll out the initiative.

Kuo asserts that evangelical leaders were called "the nuts" by people in White House political strategist Karl Rove's office. "National Christian leaders received hugs and smiles in person, and then were dismissed behind their backs and described as 'ridiculous,' 'out of control' and just plain 'goofy,' " the book says, according to MSNBC.

Kuo previously has criticized the Bush administration for not carrying out the president's 2000 campaign promise to boost charitable giving at least $7 billion a year by extending charitable tax breaks to people who do not itemize income tax deductions.

In the book, he says the White House opted instead for cuts in the estate tax that eliminated the incentive for many wealthy people to make charitable donations. The "ultimate impact was to brutalize the very charities Mr. Bush once identified as his top priorities," Kuo says.

Beginning in 2002, the White House held ostensibly "nonpartisan" conferences about the availability of federal grants for religious charities. But Kuo alleges that the events were, in fact, designed to help vulnerable Republican incumbents.

Ken Mehlman, then the White House director of political affairs and now chairman of the Republican National Committee, "loved the idea and gave us our marching orders" to hold meetings in 20 congressional districts, the book says.

H. James Towey, who directed the faith-based office during Kuo's time there, said yesterday that "it sounds like he worked at a different White House than the one I worked for."

Towey added that he, not Mehlman, decided where to hold conferences. "If a congressman in a tight race invited me, I went," he said. "But that was true of Democrats as well as Republicans."

Dobson, the psychologist and radio host who heads the influential group Focus on the Family, issued a statement calling the book "a mix of sour grapes and political timing."

Colson, who founded Prison Fellowship Ministries, said he was "shocked and disappointed by what appears to be political timing to sell a book, and a very unfair characterization of the parties involved."

Jan LaRue, chief counsel of Concerned Women for America, a Christian women's group in Washington, said she sees "no reason to question the sincerity of this president" based on the accusations aired so far.

"So, in Rove's office people of faith are mocked? Well, who in Rove's office did the mocking? It's easy to make allegations like that if you don't give the name, date, time," she said.

Perkins of the Family Research Council said he would not be surprised if derisive comments were made behind Christian leaders' backs.

"I have no misconceptions about how people in the Republican Party and the establishment view social conservatives. They are dismissive. I see how they prefer to work with fiscal conservatives," he said. "Having said that, I see it really as a marriage of convenience. We are not without significant gains by working with this administration."

Congressman Demands Retraction From WSJ (AP)

By Tim Whitmire

Associated Press, October 14, 2006

CHARLOTTE, N.C. (AP) -- A congressman in the thick of a tough re-election battle demanded Friday that The Wall Street Journal correct and retract statements in an article that said he slipped projects benefiting his own business interests into the federal budget, a claim he called libelous.

Rep. Charles Taylor said he would sue the newspaper if it does not meet his demands, made in a letter written by Asheville lawyer Robert B. Long Jr. and released by Taylor's office.

Taylor is demanding that the Journal retract a front-page article published Wednesday titled "Seat in Congress Helps Mr. Taylor Help His Business." It said he added "earmarks" to legislation to widen two highways near property he owns, to give millions to nonprofit groups run by his business partners and supporters, and to provide $3.8 million for a park in front of a downtown Asheville bank he owns.

Written by John R. Wilke, the story cited congressional, corporate and real-estate records. Taylor described it as "full of misinformation and unsupported falsehoods."

A Wall Street Journal spokesman was unable to immediately confirm that the newspaper had received Taylor's letter and therefore could not comment.

Taylor, a veteran Republican from Brevard who is one of Congress's wealthiest members, is in a fierce re-election battle with Democrat Heath Shuler, a former NFL quarterback. Although Taylor's district in far western North Carolina leans conservative, many analysts have rated the race a tossup.

In a summary, Taylor identified 15 statements in the article he said were false. He said he owns no property near one of the highways mentioned, and that the other road project is needed for the safety of area residents, not for the timberland he owns "miles away."

He said another earmark the story attributed to him - a much publicized grant of $500,000 to fund a teapot museum in Sparta - actually came from Rep. Virginia Foxx, a Republican who represents the district that includes Sparta.

Strategist In Chief (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

No political figure is more vital to the self-esteem of the Democratic Party and its faithful than Karl Rove. Ever since Rove rose to national renown with George W. Bush some six years ago, he has provided sweet relief for Democrats otherwise ill equipped to explain Bush's successes. For the president's critics, it is axiomatic that Rove is supremely diabolical and inscrutably brilliant, since they're also pretty sure the president himself is neither. I doubt any political consultant has sold more books without writing one himself.

Just ask James Moore and Wayne Slater, two veteran Texas political reporters who have tracked Rove for years. In 2003 they published their first Rove book, the best-selling "Bush's Brain," a trenchant chronicle of Rove's triumphant efforts to turn Bush into a winning presidential candidate. Now they've returned with a blistering sequel, "The Architect: Karl Rove and the Master Plan for Absolute Power," promising a close look at Rove's strategy to cement today's thin Republican majorities into enduring ones.

Much of the master plan will sound familiar to anyone who subscribes to a newspaper. The Republicans must court and mobilize the party's religious conservative base with wedge issues like gay marriage; discourage unionization and defang the trial lawyers, key sources of Democratic cash and ground troops; build a finely tuned grass-roots machine that can overpower the Democrats during elections and bolster Republican initiatives in between them.

Put the pieces together, the authors argue, and Republicans can control Washington for a generation. "Democracy, to Karl Rove, is like a very large board game," they write. Monopoly, I'm guessing. One of the conceits of "The Architect" is that Rove's hand is behind practically everything Republican officials say and do, no matter how minor or conventional. (The strategy of "tort reform," for example, long predates Rove's appearance on the scene.) Though Rove frequently disappears from the narrative for pages at a time, the authors invariably suggest that the lack of apparent fingerprints merely proves his cunning. Of new Labor Department regulations requiring unions to reveal more of their finances, for example, the authors write that a union lawyer "could not prove Rove's involvement, but there were connections." The appointee who drafted the rules previously worked for the chairman of the Republican National Committee, who in turn "took his orders from Karl Rove."

"The Architect" rapidly descends into self-parody. Take the authors' account of meetings where Rove cooked breakfast for the Bush re-election team. "Rove's speciality was his scrambled eggs — eggies, he called them — which he announced with great fanfare were prepared with a special ingredient, most likely cream," they write breathlessly. "As in everything, Rove pursued his cooking with manic, relentless attention." By then, it's clear "The Architect" isn't chiefly an explication of Rove's master plan. Rather, it's an indictment of the man himself as a cynical and manipulative hypocrite who will do anything to win. (Unsurprisingly, few of Rove's confidants appear by name in this book, and the only original quotations from Rove appear to be drawn from interviews he agreed to for "Bush's Brain.")

Rove's sole interest in religion, Moore and Slater charge, is to exploit the anger and alienation of religious conservatives "as a political tool." Likewise, he has no particular beef with gays, but found that demonizing them gets Republicans elected. I suppose it is to illustrate the party's insincerity on this issue that the authors devote much space to discussing the bachelorhood, confirmed and otherwise, of various Republican officials. But the book veers into thoroughly unappealing territory when the authors insinuate, in a chapter all the more lurid for its pretense of sympathy, that Rove's adoptive father, Louis Rove, left Karl's mother because he was gay. As Louis Rove lay on his deathbed in the summer of 2004, Moore and Slater write, "his son was in the midst of launching the antigay issues campaign that was to lead to the re-election of George W. Bush."

It's what happened after Bush's re-election, though, that ultimately compromises "The Architect." Social Security privatization, the centerpiece of Bush's much-touted "ownership society," was a political disaster. Iraq is turning into an albatross. Bush has endured some of the lowest approval ratings of any president since Richard Nixon, and voters appear even less enchanted with his allies on the Hill. Even some prominent conservatives, dismayed by growth in the size of government and the deficit spending that has fueled it, are fuming.

Meanwhile, the Republican Party's battles over immigration have repelled Hispanic voters, and the administration's handling of Hurricane Katrina reversed whatever gains Bush had made among blacks. Rove once hoped to build a new big-tent party that could thrive as ethnic and racial minorities become a majority of the electorate. He's had to settle for a narrower and more self-limiting coalition built around white religious conservatives, their fear of what Democratic rule would bring and the genuinely impressive machinery he's built to muster them on Election Day.

It's worked for two elections now, and it may well work for a third. But machines can be imitated. Demographics cannot; nor can the kind of substantive policy accomplishments that ultimately bind voters to a party over the long term. The authors depict the decline in Rove's fortunes toward the end of their account, but they never really square it with their belief in his near infallibility. "Karl Rove would almost certainly design a plan to make his problems disappear," they write. "The architect never runs out of ideas." Soon we'll see just how sturdy his creation is.

Cheaper Gas Lifts Spending By Consumers (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

Lower gasoline prices encouraged Americans to spend more on clothing, furniture and building materials, and propelled consumer confidence to the highest level in more than a year, according to reports released yesterday.

The largest decline ever in gas-station receipts pushed overall retail sales down 0.4 percent in September, the Commerce Department said. Excluding service stations, purchases climbed 0.6 percent, three times the gain in August.

In addition, the University of Michigan reported that its consumer sentiment index jumped to 92.3 in October, from 85.4 the prior month. It was the highest reading since July 2005.

According to the Commerce Department, sales excluding autos, gasoline and building materials, which the government uses to calculate gross domestic product figures, increased 0.8 percent in September, the most since January. The gain was twice as much as in August.

Sales excluding autos fell 0.5 percent in September after a 0.2 percent rise. No change was forecast by economists. Sales at automobile dealerships and parts stores were unchanged last month after a 0.4 percent decline in August.

Purchases at nonstore retailers, including online and catalog sales, increased 1.1 percent in September after falling 0.2 percent the month before. Sales at department stores increased 1 percent after no change.

The data suggests that housing has yet to take a big bite out of consumer spending. This week, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, Richard W. Fisher, said that "it's important not to over-fixate on housing" because "the rest of the economy is running on all pistons."

A healthy labor market is sustaining consumer spending. The unemployment rate fell to 4.6 percent last month, matching a five-year low, and workers' average hourly earnings rose 4 percent from September 2005, matching the biggest gain in five years, the Labor Department said this month.

Economy Benefits As Gas-Price Drop Spurs Outlays (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

Consumers took much of the money they saved at the gas pump last month and spent it elsewhere, giving the economy a critical boost at a time when overall growth appears to be slowing.

The Commerce Department said Friday that retail sales in September eased 0.4% from the previous month, primarily due to a 9.3% plunge in gas-station revenue precipitated by a big drop in oil prices.

Consumers impressed economists with their quick turnaround in spending money saved at the pump. Read a handful of economists' reactions2 to the September retail-sales report.

Economists were unfazed by those declines, though, because virtually every other kind of retailer benefited from consumers having some extra spending money. Apparel stores saw particularly strong gains, and retail sales excluding the volatile gas and automobile industries posted a robust 0.8% increase last month.

"Overall, this report is encouraging evidence that consumer spending has not been much affected by the slumping housing market," said David Resler, chief economist at Nomura Securities International Inc.

Many economists said consumers, supported by a strong labor market and solid wage growth, are still increasing their spending at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of 3% or more. That's proving to be especially critical now that the economy appears to be settling into a period of slower growth, damped by a decrease in residential construction, higher interest rates and a wider trade deficit.

In a recent speech, Federal Reserve Vice Chairman Donald Kohn said "the economy could be in the process of registering several consecutive quarters of growth below its potential rate."

The potential rate, generally considered to be about 3% a year, is widely seen as the fastest pace at which the economy can expand without sparking a damaging surge in inflation. Periods of below-potential growth in the past have led to recessions, but Mr. Kohn said "several features of the current financial situation," such as historically low interest rates and easy credit availability, suggest "this time will be different."

The average economist surveyed recently by WSJ.com said the economy grew at a modest annual rate of 2.3% in the third quarter, with some saying it grew as slowly as 1.5% or less. On average, economists predicted growth for the next year would stay below the economy's potential rate. The government will release its estimate of third-quarter economic growth in two weeks.

The biggest drags on the economy now are the decline in residential construction, which is subtracting about one percentage point from economic growth, and the widening trade deficit. Economists said a slowdown in inventory accumulation could prove to be another negative factor.

Separate data released by the Commerce Department on Friday showed that business inventories grew by 0.6% in August, slightly slower than the 0.7% gain in July.

Aside from solid consumer-spending growth, the economy is getting strong support from business investment and commercial construction. Strong corporate profits have paved the way for businesses to buy equipment, and significant price appreciation in residential real estate in recent years is helping cushion the blow from the weakening housing market on consumer spending.

Another plus is the drop in oil prices, which is helping to reduce inflationary pressures and boost consumers' moods. These effects could be seen in two other reports released Friday. The Labor Department said import prices fell 2.1% in September, the first decline in six months, primarily thanks to a 10.3% fall in petroleum prices.

Meanwhile, the University of Michigan said its preliminary index estimate of consumer sentiment in early October soared to 92.3 from 85.4 in September, marking the highest level of consumer confidence in more than a year.

Consumers with more money to spend increased buying of nondurable goods like clothing and restaurant meals more than they did on durables like cars and kitchen appliances, according to data from the retail-sales report.

Revenue at clothing stores in September rose 3% from August, but sales at motor-vehicle and parts dealers fell 0.5% over the same period. Sporting goods, music, book and hobby stores saw their sales increase 1.1% in September, but revenue at furniture stores grew by a more modest 0.2%.

"Durables tend to be bigger-ticket items and are often financed, so higher financing rates will likely make consumers think twice about laying down the plastic for these purchases," said Gina Martin, an economist at Wachovia Corp. "In contrast, an extra $50 at the pump translates fairly easily to picking up an extra sweater at the mall or an extra dinner out."

Savings At Pump Fueling Shoppers (WT/AP)

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Bolstered by falling gasoline prices, consumers headed back to the malls to shop in September, and with confidence rebounding sharply this month, strong sales are forecast for the all-important holiday period.

Overall, retail sales fell by 0.4 percent in September, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. But that decline was skewed by the good news that gasoline prices plummeted last month, sending sales at service stations down by a record 9.3 percent.

Excluding service stations, retail sales posted a solid increase of 0.6 percent, the government said, as consumers used the money they saved on gasoline to spend on other items.

"Households continue to empty their wallets at a very rapid pace," said Joel Naroff, chief economist at Naroff Economic Advisors, a private forecasting firm.

A second report yesterday showed that consumer confidence, which had been depressed by surging gasoline prices, posted a strong rebound in October.

The University of Michigan's confidence survey rose to 92.3 in October, according to a preliminary reading, up from 85.4 in September. The October confidence level, the best showing in 15 months, was far better than economists had been expecting.

Signs of strength in the consumer sector lifted spirits on Wall Street, sending the Dow Jones Industrial Average up by 12.81 points to close at 11,960.51. It was the Dow's sixth record close in the past two weeks and put the blue-chip index tantalizing close to the 12,000 mark.

Analysts said the rise in confidence, which is being fueled by falling gasoline prices, should translate into solid consumer spending during the upcoming holiday sales season and help keep the nation from stumbling into a recession.

Since peaking above $3 per gallon in early August, the nationwide average for regular gasoline has fallen by 78 cents per gallon.

Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, said this decline is like a huge tax cut that will give consumers nearly $100 billion more to spend on other items.

The economy skidded to a sharp slowdown in the spring under the impact of soaring gasoline prices, rising interest rates and a cooling housing market, raising fears of a possible recession.

Now, with gasoline prices falling and the Federal Reserve putting its two-year credit-tightening campaign on hold, economists think growth will slow in the second half of the year but a recession will be avoided.

Mr. Behravesh said the overall economy, which grew at a 2.6 percent rate in the spring, probably grew by just 1.8 percent in the third quarter but should rebound to around 2.5 percent growth in the final three months of this year.

"Wage growth is improving; the stock market is doing well; and gasoline prices are down. All of this is very good news for the consumer," he said.

For September, retail sales jumped 1.1 percent at department stores and were up an even larger 3 percent at specialty clothing stores, the biggest increase in this category in 11 months, as cooler weather last month put shoppers in the mood to buy the new fall clothing lines.

Oil Price Drop Cheers US Consumers (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott In New York And Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

The sharp fall in oil prices last month left US consumers with more money to spend on other goods and services and gave them a more hopeful outlook on the state of the economy, according to data released on Friday.

The firm underlying retail sales figures and an unexpectedly strong upswing in consumer confidence further diminish the prospect that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates any time soon.

The reports came after Michael Moskow, the president of the Chicago Fed, said in a speech Thursday night that he still believes that “the risk of inflation remaining too high is greater than the risk of growth being too low.”

The Michigan consumer sentiment index jumped to its highest reading in over a year on Friday, beating analysts expectations.

Overall retail sales fell 0.4 per cent, compared with analysts expectations of a 0.2 per cent rise. But the decline was entirely due to a sharp fall in spending on gasoline.

”The sales report had a weak headline figure but were strong underneath,” Mike Pond, treasury and inflation link strategist at Barclays. “That’s no real surprise given the price of gasoline has fallen. But the data points to stronger consumer spending in the final quarter of the year.”

Resilience in consumer spending will weigh heavily on the Fed’s policy-making Open Market Committee.

“Maybe the Fed not only won’t cut rates, but might have to tighten them,” said Richard Gilhooly, senior bond strategist at BNP Paribas. “That’s not the view in the marketplace at the moment but if we continue to get data like today that could change.”

Overall inflation is likely to have fallen thanks to the 12 per cent drop in gasoline prices last month, and the Fed hopes that lower energy prices will also over time reduce the pressure on firms to “pass through” higher energy costs to consumers.

However, some analysts argue that the core rate, which excludes the volatile energy and food prices, may not decline as rapidly as expected if businesses feel shoppers can afford higher prices.

“If the transfer of purchasing power to the consumer is sustained, we will see a increase in pricing power for the retailers,” said Mr Gilhooly.

Retail sales rose by 0.6 per cent, excluding gasoline sales. Taking out sales of cars and parts, which can also fluctuate widely from month to month, retail sales rose by 0.8 per cent, following gains of 0.4 per cent in August and 0.6 per cent in July.

The Deathwatch For Cheap Oil (NYT)

By Paul B. Brown

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

THOSE falling prices at the gasoline pump may only be temporary. Indeed, they could signal the start of an era in which, forecasters say, "the death of cheap, abundant crude might unleash war and plunge the world into a second Great Depression."

"Peak oil is a reality," says Willem Kadijk, a hedge fund adviser quoted by Bloomberg Markets magazine. He is just one of many who believe that global oil production is now at or near its peak, and the only place to go is down.

"Once the flow crests and starts to decline, and some geologists say it already has, oil will no longer be able to slake the world's growing thirst for energy," Deepak Gopinath writes in summarizing the argument. "The result will be the oil shock to end all oil shocks."

The price of a barrel of crude oil, which closed yesterday at $58.68, "will spiral to $200 — and keep rising," he writes.

Representative Roscoe G. Bartlett, a Maryland Republican, has formed the Congressional Peak Oil Caucus to draw attention to the issue. "The world has never faced a problem like this," he told the magazine.

The nation's oil companies dispute the assertions. An Exxon Mobil spokesman says the company's geologists expect global oil production to keep rising for at least the next two decades.

ON SECOND THOUGHT If you think ethanol is a simple answer to solving our gasoline needs, think again, argues Consumer Reports in this month's cover article, "The Ethanol Myth."

"Despite the avid support of the Bush administration and major American car companies," E85 — a commonly used blend of 85 percent ethanol and 15 percent gasoline — "is unlikely to fill more than a small percentage of U.S. energy needs," the magazine says.

Reasons for the pessimism are that ethanol costs more, is hard to find outside the Midwest — only about 800 gas stations out of 176,000 nationwide sell E85 — and provides fewer miles to the gallon. The magazine tested ethanol on a Chevrolet Tahoe and found that the fuel economy dropped "27 percent when running on E85 compared with gasoline, from an already low 14 m.p.g."

At the time of the test, the average retail price of E85 was $2.91 a gallon, which meant the 27 percent fuel-economy penalty would have caused drivers to pay "$3.99 for the energy equivalent of a gallon of gasoline."

A FAR BIGGER BANG The Rolling Stones, fronted by their 63-year-old lead singer, Mick Jagger, are heading into the home stretch of what will be the most commercially successful rock tour of all time, Rolling Stone reports.

By the time the tour ends in Hawaii next month, the band will have sold nearly two million tickets for a total of $256 million in revenue, according to the magazine, which cited figures compiled by Pollstar.

The "Bigger Bang" tour, which began last year, set a record during its 2005 leg when it recorded $162 million in 43 dates, "so this fall's tour ... could be considered a victory lap," Brian Hiatt writes.

"We're kind of looking at it like we're Lewis and Clark — we're playing the Wyomings and Montanas," said Keith Richards, the guitarist.

Michael Cohl, a promoter, said the tour could continue next year, although no dates are scheduled.

In case you were wondering, U2's 2005 "Vertigo" tour is the second-highest-grossing tour ($138.9 million); the Stones own third place with the "Voodoo Lounge" tour in 1994 ($121.2 million); Bruce Springsteen and the E Street Band grossed $115.9 million in their 2003 tour; and U2 rounds out the top five with $109.7 million in 2001 during its "Elevation" tour.

FINAL TAKE Even assuming that the growing number of companies devoted to space travel are successful, becoming a rocketman (or woman) is going to cost you at least $200,000. However, Popular Mechanics reports that for $295 "you can launch a photo of yourself — or some other keepsake — into space on Bigelow Aerospace's Genesis II spacecraft, due to launch early next year." Not surprisingly, the company plans to sell space for corporate advertising as well. Can orbiting billboards be far behind? PAUL B. BROWN

The former president tells a crowd of 5,000 that Prop. 87 would allow the state to do something remarkable -- save the planet.

Accusing oil companies of lying about the cost of Proposition 87, former President Clinton on Friday called "bogus" their contention that approving a tax on oil revenues would trigger higher gas prices for California motorists.

During a rally at UCLA, the former president said the state ballot measure would help California move toward less expensive, cleaner forms of energy by funding research into alternative fuels.

Gas prices are lower in other states that already have oil taxes like the one proposed by Proposition 87, Clinton added.

"California is being given an opportunity and an obligation to do something remarkable — to save the planet, improve our national security, create the next generation of good jobs for the American people," Clinton said.

The measure on the Nov. 7 ballot would impose up to $485 million a year in taxes on companies that extract oil from California land, with the money going to finance research and development of alternative energy. Over its life, the measure would raise $4 billion for grants and loans to projects developing alternative fuels and more energy-efficient vehicles.

With opponents, led by oil companies, pumping more than $52 million into the campaign to defeat the state ballot measure, supporters brought Clinton into the state just days after launching a television ad campaign in which his former vice president, Al Gore, said the measure would reduce the state's dependence on foreign oil and clean the air.

Clinton, still popular in a state that he twice won in presidential elections, will be featured in a new round of ads that were filmed during Friday's rally in front of a cheering crowd of 5,000, many of them students.

Opponents of Proposition 87 noted Friday that support for the measure is sagging, and predicted that the involvement of Clinton and Gore would not be enough to save a proposal that they say would create an unaccountable bureaucracy.

"The proponents can bring in big names from outside California who will leave the state before the election," said Al Lundeen, communications director for No on Proposition 87. "It's those of us who live here who will have to live with the negative impacts of Proposition 87."

A Field Poll on Oct. 4 found voters split on the measure, with 44% supporting and 41% opposing. It led in an earlier poll, 52% to 31%.

The involvement of two national political figures should provide a "modest boost" to the Proposition 87 campaign, but it is rare that the involvement of outsiders, including former presidents, makes a big difference in state initiative races, said John J. Pitney Jr., a professor of government at Claremont McKenna College.

"This is an effort to pump up the Democratic base of voters. It's a very smart move, because these are the folks the base will respond to," Pitney said.

Most of the $45.7 million raised so far by the measure's supporters has come from venture capitalists and Hollywood figures, including real estate heir and environmentalist Stephen L. Bing, whom Clinton acknowledged Friday as a friend.

Clinton arrived at the rally in a hybrid Mercury Mariner and, before appearing on the outdoor stage, met privately with a group of children who suffer from asthma made worse by air pollution.

"They are paying the price for our addiction to oil," Clinton said later during the rally.

The former president directly addressed opponents' contention in radio and television ads that already high gas prices would get worse if an oil tax was imposed.

If oil companies "really thought you were going to pay for this, would they be spending all that money trying to convince you to vote against it?" Clinton asked.

He said that other states, including his native Arkansas, charge an oil extraction tax and that gasoline is less expensive in many of them.

"It never makes any difference in the price," Clinton said, adding that the price is set in the markets.

Opponents said the comparison with other states is not fair because California already has other taxes that are higher, so a new tax would make California an even more expensive place to pump oil.

Economists cited by the opposition have concluded that the proposed tax would result in oil companies bringing in more oil from out of California.

"If you are reliant on sources outside the state, it ends up costing more in the long run," Lundeen said.

Another Record Week For The Dow (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

The Dow Jones industrial average inched to another record close yesterday, giving it three consecutive weeks of triple-digit increases.

The Dow spent much of a quiet session in the red after the strong surge Thursday in which it broke through 11,900 for the first time. Thursday's advance came amid optimism over the health of corporate earnings, and yesterday's gain put the Dow 12,000 benchmark within closer reach.

The average's gain yesterday was the Dow's sixth record close in two weeks. Still, stocks showed little overall movement as traders were unimpressed with a profit report from General Electric and brokerage firms issued negative comments about Home Depot.

Oil prices, which have supported stocks as they have fallen in recent weeks, moved higher, holding the major indexes to modest gains.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 12.81 points, or 0.11 percent, to 11,960.51, passing the record close of 11,947.70 set Thursday.

Broader stock indicators also advanced. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 2.79 points, or 0.20 percent, at 1,365.62, and the Nasdaq composite index was up 11.11 points, or 0.47 percent, at 2,357.29.

Bonds fell, with the price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note down 7/32, at 10019/32, and the yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, rising to 4.80 percent from 4.77 percent late Thursday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices fell.

Crude oil settled up 82 cents at $58.68 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The markets were caught off guard yesterday by a 0.4 percent decline in retail sales last month. The decline, reported by the Commerce Department, was largely a result of a 9.3 percent decline in spending on gasoline. Spending did increase in other areas, however.

"I think this morning's retail sales figure was actually positive once you parse out all the details," said Mike Malone, a trading analyst at Cowen & Company, referring to a drop in spending on gasoline that enabled consumers to spend elsewhere. "For all the talk of the death of the consumer, that is definitely not manifesting itself."

The University of Michigan's preliminary consumer sentiment figure for October was a stronger-than-expected 92.3. In September, the figure was 85.4.

In corporate news, G.E. reported a 6 percent increase in its third-quarter profit, matching Wall Street's expectations, and turned in better-than-expected revenue. G.E., which was down 24 cents at $35.98, held back the S.& P. 500, which is weighted by market capitalization.

Home Depot declined $1, or 2.64 percent, to $36.90 after several brokerage firms issued negative comments on the company, the nation's largest home improvement chain. Home Depot, one of the 30 stocks that make up the Dow, announced plans on Thursday to shake up its executive structure to try to improve performance.

The furniture maker La-Z-Boy fell $1.14, or 7.6 percent, to $13.86, after the company lowered its quarterly earnings and sales forecasts for all three of its divisions, citing a weak retail environment.

Viewpoint, which provides Web search and advertising services, was down 26 cents, or 25.5 percent, at 76 cents a share after cutting its full-year revenue forecast amid soft ad spending and customers' product delays.

FMS Financial rose $4.85, or 18.1 percent, to $31.60 after Beneficial Mutual Bancorp agreed to purchase the company, the parent of Farmers and Mechanics Bank, for $28 a share, or about $183.2 million in cash and stock.

Big 12000 Mark Stays Out Of Reach For Dow (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

DOJ_NMG_0081126

As the Dow Jones Industrial Average flirts with a close above 12000, a familiar pattern has emerged. It edges closer to that benchmark, then pulls back.

What happens once it tops that milestone may be less predictable.

The Dow scratched up a small gain Friday, touching another new record close. But it ended short of a fresh 1,000-point benchmark, held back by data showing surprisingly weak retail sales in September. The blue-chip average rose 12.81 points, or 0.1%, to 11960.51, up 0.9% on the week and up 12% for the year.

Friday's finish was the sixth record close for the Dow in nine days. Before the average crossed its old January 2000 peak for the first time early this month, it flirted with that mark for several weeks. Beginning in late September, it crossed the record several times on an intraday basis but closed shy of it.

Strategist Chris Johnson, of the research firm Schaeffer's Investment Research, said the Dow's tentative approach to 12000 echoes the recent chase of the old record, with some investors taking an opportunity to take money off the table before pushing the blue-chip average higher later.

"As soon as the buzz about a record died down a little, it finally pushed through," said Mr. Johnson, who expects the average will make it to 12000 soon. "The real question is how long can it last afterward, and what follows."

The Dow historically performed well following its initial breaches of 1,000-point benchmarks, according to the data firm Ned Davis Research, rising an average of 1.8% in the first month and 14.2% twelve months after such milestones.

But the most recent milestone, which came amid the dot-com bubble, was an unpleasant exception. After the Dow finished above 11000 for the first time in May 1999, it was off 4% just a month later and remained in the red 12 months later, off 1.8%. If 12000 comes soon, it will have taken more than seven years to rise the next 1,000 points.

Some market watchers, like Standard & Poor's strategist Sam Stovall, believe the market is due for a similar pullback now. "It would be good for the market to have a bull-market correction soon, just to make sure it doesn't get ahead of itself," Mr. Stovall told clients in a recent briefing.

For the moment, other indexes are following the Dow higher, for the third straight week of gains.

The broad S&P 500-stock index gained 0.2%, or 2.79 points, to finish at 1365.62, its highest level in more than five-and-a-half years. The S&P is up 1.2% on the week and 9.4% for the year. The technology-focused Nasdaq Composite Index gained 0.5%, or 11.11 points, to 2357.29, up 2.5% on the week and 6.9% for 2006.

Keeping the stock market's mood subdued Friday were fresh data from the Commerce Department showing that U.S. retail sales fell 0.4% last month, contrary to Wall Street's expectation for a small rise. Also, crude-oil prices rose. Contracts for November delivery gained 71 cents, or 1.2%, to end at $58.57 a barrel, off 2% on the week at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose, and bond prices fell: The 10-year note slipped 7/32 point, or $2.19 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.806%.

The dollar strengthened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 119.67 yen, compared with 119.40 yen late Thursday. The euro fell to $1.2510, compared with $1.2554.

GE Earnings Point To Solid Economy (WSJ)

By Kathryn Kranhold

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

Net Rises 6.2% as Strength Of Industrial Unit Benefits From Infrastructure Projects

Robust third-quarter financial results from General Electric Co.'s industrial units suggest that the global economy is weathering both high oil prices and a slowdown in the U.S. housing market.

Overall, GE reported results that met expectations but disappointed some investors. But GE's industrial units posted a 14% increase in revenue and an 18% jump in profit, bolstered by strong sales of power turbines, locomotives and aircraft engines, among other products.

Chairman and Chief Executive Jeffrey Immelt said the global economy is "solid" and GE is benefiting from increased spending on infrastructure projects. "We're seeing great growth around the world," he said in a conference call. For the current quarter, GE projected that revenue would increase 10% and profit would rise 11% to 14%.

For the third quarter, the Fairfield, Conn., company said net income grew 6.1% to $4.96 billion, or 48 cents a share, from $4.67 billion, or 43 cents a share, a year earlier. The year-earlier results include GE's insurance business, most of which has been sold. GE said profit from continuing operations grew 10% to $5.06 billion, meeting analysts' expectations.

Revenue grew 12% to $40.8 billion. GE had estimated quarterly sales at more than $40 billion; analysts had estimated about $39.9 billion.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

Money & Investing editor Jon Hilsenrath2 discusses GE's earnings report, calling it a mixed bag of positives and negatives.

GE's results were hampered by disappointing results in its commercial-finance unit and continued weakness at its NBC Universal entertainment unit. Operating profit at NBC fell 10%, as projected.

On the other side of the ledger, though, sales at GE's biggest division, infrastructure, increased 20%, and operating profit jumped 24%. The infrastructure unit includes aircraft engines, power turbines, and oil-and-gas and transportation equipment.

GE's health-care and industrial units reported 19% and 10% increases in operating profit, respectively. Across the company, GE said orders grew 15%, faster than revenue, suggesting strong future results.

"Industrial businesses were the real horses here," said Stephen Tusa, an analyst with J.P. Morgan. "These are the high-value businesses where investors want to see the growth."

Even within the industrial units, there were some caution signs. The energy group reported a lower-than-expected profit margin of 14.8%, compared with 20% for the rest of infrastructure.

The energy group is selling more power turbines but Mr. Immelt said prices fell 2% in the quarter. And GE's plastics business continued to be hit by high raw-material prices, reporting operating profit fell 23% to $152 million.

Take a peek8 at what to expect in the quarterly reports of other major companies.

Chief Financial Officer Keith Sherin called the revenue results "a good news story," noting that strong equipment sales will translate into future revenue for GE's services businesses.

Still, investors fretted over the weakness in GE's commercial-finance unit and an unexpectedly low tax rate that lifted profits. Profit at the commercial-finance unit rose 6% to $1.29 billion, short of GE's projection of 10% to 15% growth.

Mr. Sherin said some transactions that were expected to close in the third quarter were not finalized.

3RD-QUARTER REVENUE

By division, in billions

For the third quarter in a row, GE benefited from a lower tax rate than projected. Its financial units reported an 11% tax rate, below GE's projection of 13%. The industrial tax rate was 22%, below analysts' expectations of about 24%. Mr. Sherin said the lower rates lifted profit by about $120 million, or one cent a share.

In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, GE fell 24 cents, to $35.98, the fourth consecutive quarter that GE shares fell on the day it posted financial results. Since posting second-quarter results in July, however, GE shares are up 12%.

General Electric (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0081128

The US economy is proving resilient – at least if one focuses on the right set of core measures. Excluding autos, gasoline and building materials, retail sales rose by 0.8 per cent during September. The data are volatile but fit the rosy macro-economic picture painted by General Electric, a bellwether if there ever was one.

Incidentally, GE has long mastered the art of drawing attention to flattering measures. On Friday, it trumpeted its strong organic revenue growth, with earnings from continuing operations up 10 per cent. But underlying trends were less impressive. Consolidated sales from continuing operations rose 12 per cent but costs increased even faster, leaving pre-tax profits up just 5 per cent. Minimising taxes remains one of GE's key strengths but there seems to be rather weak operating leverage in the conglomerate's core activities.

GE also suffered from higher raw materials costs in plastics. The turnround at NBC appears on track but has yet to lead to rising profits. Meanwhile, rather spectacular infrastructure equipment sales are depressing margins now but should lead to lucrative service contracts next year. GE's results are also becoming more intelligible. But with the shares up 10 per cent since the last results and half its profits coming from financial services, investors have every reason to tread carefully.

G.E. Reports That Earnings Rose Sharply In The Quarter (NYT)

By Claudia H. Deutsch

General Electric, buoyed by strong equipment sales overseas that more than counteracted weak performance in the plastics and NBC Universal units, said yesterday that it earned $5.059 billion in the third quarter of 2006, a 10 percent rise over the period last year. Revenue rose 12 percent, to $40.86 billion from $36.37 billion in the 2005 quarter.

Earnings per share from continued operations, after a $100 million loss from discontinued insurance operations, came in at 49 cents a share, a penny more than last year and in line with Wall Street expectations. G.E. reaffirmed that it would earn $1.97 to $1.99 a share for the year.

"We're finishing up on a solid year, with all the critical metrics heading the right way," Jeffrey R. Immelt, G.E.'s chairman, said on a conference call.

Investors reacted tepidly to yesterday's report, sending G.E. shares down less than a percent, to $35.98. But G.E. shares, which had been stagnant for most of the year, rose 13 percent in the last two months, and analysts do not anticipate a sell-off now.

"They had broad-based 10 percent organic growth, and that is reassuring," said Deane M. Dray, an analyst at Goldman Sachs with a buy rating on G.E. shares. Mr. Dray had anticipated 8 percent growth.

Keith S. Sherin, G.E.'s chief financial officer, noted that equipment orders were up 15 percent, boding well for the year.

"We promised to grow two to three times G.D.P., and this is the seventh quarter we made good on that promise," he said in a telephone interview after the morning call with analysts. "We've invested in technology; we've focused on the customer; we've put insurance in the rearview mirror; and we've invested in growth as a process. Investors are finally responding to those changes."

Investors may also have reacted well to G.E.'s buyback program; the company has repurchased $7.1 billion of its shares this year.

Still, the quarter was not devoid of disappointments. Profit at GE Commercial Finance, which rose 6 percent, fell short of the 10-to-15-percent growth the company had projected. The reason, Mr. Sherin said, was that some deals that were expected to close in the third quarter would instead close later in the year.

Profit at NBC Universal, which is still struggling with prime-time viewership, declined 10 percent in the quarter. Although Mr. Sherin insisted that the unit was poised for a turnaround, he conceded that "NBC is still a work in progress."

And at G.E.'s plastics business, which was unable to raise prices despite soaring costs for raw materials like benzene, operating profit declined 23 percent, to $152 million.

"High commodity prices are a double-edged sword that hurts G.E.'s plastics business even as it helps G.E.'s oil and gas services businesses," said Daniel J. Rosenblatt, an analyst at Marble Harbor Investment Counsel, which owns G.E. shares.

Several analysts suggested that G.E. put plastics on the auction block.

"There is such a strong private equity market out there; this could be a good time for them to sell it," suggested Richard Tortoriello, an analyst with S&P Equity Research who rates G.E. a buy.

In the conference call and news release, Mr. Immelt stressed that G.E. would invest only in the more specialized, higher margin plastics in the portfolio. But he was careful not to suggest a sale of the unit — or to rule out the possibility of one.

Mr. Sherin was similarly circumspect. "We are not currently working on selling plastics," he said, but acknowledged that "there may be pieces of the plastics portfolio that we can use to free up some capital."

Not all investors relish a sale, though. Until this year, many analysts were clamoring for G.E. to sell its consumer businesses, which were then lackluster. Instead, G.E. focused on more expensive appliances. And, appliance sales are up 18 percent this year.

"Just because a business is at the bottom of a cycle doesn't mean that G.E. should jump ship," Mr. Rosenblatt said.

Some analysts also questioned why some of the quarter's upside surprises did not translate into higher-than-expected earnings. G.E.'s tax rate was lower than Wall Street had anticipated. And most analysts had expected revenue to fall shy of $40 billion.

"When revenues are above expectations, earnings would normally also be above expectations," said Timothy M. Ghriskey, chief investment officer at Solaris Asset Management, which does not own G.E. shares. "Were there increased costs? Lower productivity? More marketing and research expenditures? We just don't know."

The answer is none of the above, Mr. Sherin said. Most of the unexpected sales strength was from infrastructure equipment like turbines, which are among the lower-margin items in G.E.'s portfolio.

Trusting A Promise To Care (LAT)

By Molly Selvin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

Some elderly clients aren't getting the long-term benefits they had counted on. As liabilities grow, some insurers leave the market.

To avoid becoming a financial burden to her children and grandchildren, Vera Smith bought long-term care insurance. Like a growing number of Americans, the 87-year-old retiree saw it as a sensible way to cover care-giving costs not included in Medicare and conventional health insurance.

But almost two years ago, Smith's insurer stopped paying benefits, contending that she violated the policy's terms by moving in with her daughter after she became too frail to take care of herself. That forced Veray Smith, the daughter, to quit her supervisory job and sell her mother's South Los Angeles house so she could afford to stay home with her.

"I'm the full-time caregiver now. It's hard," said Veray, who along with her mother has sued the insurer for bad faith. The insurer, Penn Treaty Network America Insurance Corp., declined to comment.

Consumer advocates and insurance regulators say that lawsuits and complaints like the Smiths' are likely to mushroom in the coming years as more baby boomers and their ailing parents make claims on long-term care insurance.

Sales of such policies grew 65% from 2000 to 2004, but actual and projected payouts have already caused a shakeout that could leave some policyholders with huge bills worried that insurers can't or won't pay. Some insurers who underestimated their potential obligations have sharply hiked their premiums or abandoned the market.

Insurers have denied long-term care claims for a variety of reasons, lawyers say. They have, for example, rejected as inadequate documentation from seniors too sick or distracted to be diligent record keepers. Or they have rescinded policies, saying the individual didn't fully disclose a preexisting medical condition on his or her application.

In response to multiplying consumer complaints, some states are requiring more training for sales agents and limiting insurers' ability to raise premiums, along with other restrictions.

The growing popularity of long-term care insurance "puts pressure on us as regulators to ensure that policies live up to their promise to pay," said Sandy Praeger, the insurance commissioner of Kansas and vice president of the National Assn. of Insurance Commissioners.

Industry representatives say the popularity of these policies speaks to their value for consumers and public confidence that carriers will make good on their promises.

"This product is rigorously regulated" by all 50 states, "each of them representing consumers," said Laura Moore, senior vice president for long-term care insurance at John Hancock Life Insurance Co., one of the largest participants in the market.

But experts say it's hard to predict the future of the market because these policies are fairly new and relatively few policyholders have needed to make claims so far.

For example, Moore said, just 1% of John Hancock's policyholders have claimed benefits. But the company is confident in its financial assumptions and its ability to make good on every policy, she said.

More than 6.1 million Americans were covered by long-term care policies in 2004, up from 5 million in 2002 and 3.7 million in 2000, according to the National Assn. of Insurance Commissioners. Employers have fueled the boom by offering group rates on care policies.

Policies typically cover care-giving, such as home nursing services, up to a fixed amount, such as $100 or $150 a day. But the policyholder must meet certain disability criteria, perhaps severe cognitive impairment or requiring help with dressing or bathing.

Premiums are based on an individual's medical history and the age at which the policy is purchased. For instance, a person in his or her late 40s who buys a typical employer-sponsored group policy can expect to pay premiums of $1,200 a year, Moore said. Annual premiums could rise to $2,000 for an individual policy and higher for an older person or someone with a history of diabetes, cancer or other chronic disease.

But financial pressures have forced some companies out of the long-term market, including CNA Financial Corp., Transamerica Corp. and Fortis Insurance Co., although regulations require that the policies they sold be honored.

Complaints about long-term care policies rose to 2,472 nationally in 2005, up from 2,175 in 2004 and 1,755 in 2003, according to the national insurance commissioners group.

The Smiths' case, regulator Praeger said, is a lesson to those considering a long-term care policy. "You want to make sure it has the most flexibility possible and that help can be delivered in the most settings possible."

Vera Smith moved to Los Angeles from Tennessee in 1945 with $1 in her pocket, her daughter said, and eventually saved enough from jobs as a cleaning lady and a school cook to buy her house.

The policy she bought in 1998 allowed her to stay in her own home even after she was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease six years ago, paying as much as $100 a day for caregivers.

But after she was hospitalized with a severe urinary tract infection in January 2005, Smith grew so frail that her physician said she needed continuous care. The family decided she should move into her daughter's Phillips Ranch home, where Veray Smith had added a room equipped with grab bars and a wheelchair ramp to accommodate her mother.

That's when insurer Penn Treaty stopped paying for caregivers, Veray said, saying the residence did not qualify as a home under the terms of her policy.

Veray said her mother now has arthritis and diabetes and suffers from the aftereffects of a stroke. A few months ago, she was also diagnosed with bladder cancer.

Her mother's daily needs leave Veray little time for herself or her husband, she said. Apart from the constant care — bathing, helping Vera on and off the commode, doing her hair and cooking for her — Veray said her mother had become "very clingy. She doesn't want me out of her sight."

"I love her, but it's changed the dynamic of my marriage," she added. "I'll be lying in bed with my husband and she'll call, 'Veray, where were you?' "

The suit she and her mother filed in Pomona Superior Court last month accused Penn Treaty of breach of contract, bad faith and unfair dealing.

Veray, who holds power of attorney for her mother, said she notified Penn Treaty of her mother's change of address upon her discharge from the hospital and told the insurer that her mother would be leasing the room for $100 a month.

A month later, Veray received a letter from the company that denied her mother's claims for home helpers, explaining only that "your current residence does not meet the policy definition of a home."

"I sent them a copy of the rent checks, pictures of my mother's room, the building permit from the city and daily care-giving notes," she said. "But they kept saying no."

Linda Carraghan, an attorney with Penn Treaty, declined to respond to the Smiths' charges, saying only that "company policy is not to comment on litigation."

The Smiths' attorney, Frank Darras of Claremont, insists that Penn Treaty's definition of a "residence" in the policy should not disqualify the elder Smith. The policy, he said, defines "your personal residence" as "a private dwelling owned or leased by you, and includes a home for the retired or aged."

Darras, who called the facts in this case "particularly egregious," said he had filed about 20 cases involving such policies and said he received 15 to 20 calls from unhappy policyholders each month.

In most of his lawsuits, Darras said, the carrier disputed the policyholders' inability to care for themselves.

In one bad-faith case Darras settled last year, an elderly woman with Alzheimer's died while awaiting trial against Conseco Inc.

The woman and her husband claimed Conseco requested unreasonable and duplicative documentation of her condition, failed to respond to her request for help and then informed her that the care policy was invalid.

Newspaper Company Returns Outside Funding For Investigation (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - Marilyn W. Thompson, then the executive editor of the Lexington Herald-Leader in Kentucky, faced a problem last year that's afflicting more and more newspaper editors across the country: She wanted to initiate a major reporting project but lacked enough money to pay for it.

Thompson, who wanted the paper to take a deep look at Mitch McConnell, Kentucky's senior U.S. senator, a Republican, came up with an answer: She'd seek support from the Center for Investigative Reporting, a California-based nonprofit group that's financed or conducted groundbreaking work in television and print journalism.

The idea was approved by Thompson's bosses at Knight Ridder, which owned the Herald-Leader at the time. The center approved a $37,500 grant, and Herald-Leader reporter John Cheves went to work.

This week, with Cheves winding up a six-month examination of McConnell - and the senator's staff raising questions about the unusual grant - the Herald-Leader's new owner, McClatchy Co., came to a different conclusion. McClatchy acquired Knight Ridder in June.

Howard Weaver, McClatchy's vice president for news, announced that the company would reimburse the Center for Investigative Reporting for the grant.

"If we want one of our staff members to do a report for one of our papers, we should pay for it," Weaver said.

The Herald-Leader said the four-part series would be published as planned, beginning Sunday.

The newspaper's report comes on the eve of an election that could make McConnell the majority leader of the Senate.

First elected to the Senate in 1984, McConnell has risen to be the chamber's No. 2 Republican.

He drew national attention for his outspoken opposition to a bipartisan campaign-finance bill that President Bush signed into law in 2002. He was the lead plaintiff in a lawsuit against the measure, which the Supreme Court upheld in December 2003.

McConnell's stance "begged the question" of how he himself had become such a prodigious political fund-raiser, said Thompson, who left the Herald-Leader in July to become the national investigations editor for the Los Angeles Times.

Cheves, 34, was assigned to answer that question. He's worked for the Herald-Leader since 1997, examining the political campaign finances of Democrats and Republicans alike in local, state and federal elections.

The decision to find outside funding put the Herald-Leader on the cutting edge of an industrywide wave of change, as cash-strapped newspapers, facing increased Internet competition, explore new revenue sources beyond the traditional advertising and circulation streams.

"The old business model of just having advertisers and readers fund journalism is giving way to a new model where news organizations go to philanthropic and other groups to subsidize watchdog projects," said Tom Rosenstiel, a former Los Angeles Times reporter who founded the Project for Excellence in Journalism, a research center that monitors the performance of the press.

Public TV and radio networks long have used money from a broad array of foundations to finance documentaries and other news reports, but the practice is more recent in print journalism.

"It would be better if it didn't happen, but the old model does seem to be giving way," Rosenstiel said.

As the Herald-Leader prepares to publish a series on McConnell focusing heavily on how he raises money and who provides it, the senator is trying to turn the tables on the paper.

In a series of e-mails and phone calls to Herald-Leader editors, McConnell's top aides accused the Center for Investigative Reporting of liberal bias.

Don Stewart, McConnell's communications director, said a search of campaign contributions by members of the center's board of directors and staff members had revealed donations only to Democratic candidates or affiliated groups.

McConnell's aides delved further: Cheves' work on McConnell had really been funded by the Deer Creek Foundation, a St. Louis organization that's giving the Center for Investigative Reporting $300,000 over three years to pay for an in-depth look at campaign financing by both parties.

Stewart noted that in 2002, Deer Creek gave $100,000 to New York University's Brennan Center for Justice to help defray the costs of litigating against the lawsuit that McConnell and others brought over the campaign-finance legislation. The Brennan Center was co-counsel in the case.

"Just as (gun-control advocate) Sarah Brady would question the objectivity of a reporter paid by a pro-gun-rights group, it should be easy to see why we question the objectivity of a reporter whose salary was paid by a group that provides millions of dollars to the senator's political opponents," Stewart said.

From 2001 through 2004, the Brennan Center received more than $1 million from the Deer Creek Foundation, according to the foundation's IRS filings. Seven other groups that many conservatives regard as hubs of left-wing politics got a total of nearly $2.6 million from the Deer Creek Foundation, among them Public Citizen, the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities and the Alliance for Justice.

Stewart said that Joan Claybrook, the president of Public Citizen, called McConnell "King of the Prevaricators" in 2001 and accused him of having "feasted on today's legalized bribery and corruption." Deer Creek gave Public Citizen a total of $458,000 from 2001 through 2004.

In its solicitation of grant proposals, Deer Creek says projects should "focus on the preservation and advancement of majority rule in our society, including the protection of basic rights as provided by the Constitution and Bill of Rights and education that relates to this concept."

Mary Hawker, the director of the Deer Creek Foundation, declined to be interviewed. In three faxed statements, however, she challenged McConnell's motives for protesting the Herald-Leader series.

"We think false issues are being raised (what better way to divert attention from the main story)," Hawker said. "Deer Creek has been supporting organizations working for campaign-finance reform since 1984. Organizations receiving grants often point up abuses under current law (by Democrats and Republicans) to support and demonstrate the need for reform."

The allegations that the Center for Investigative Reporting is biased surprised Dan Noyes, its acting executive director.

"We certainly have been attacked over the years, but I'm not sure I've ever seen somebody attack the story in the media before it has even appeared," he said.

The center, Noyes said, collaborated with PBS' "Frontline" program to produce ambitious investigations of the campaign finances of both parties in the 1992 and 1996 presidential elections. A 1997 project, also financed in part by Deer Creek through the center, became an award-winning book called "Secrets: The CIA's War at Home," Noyes said. It revealed the clandestine efforts of President Lyndon Johnson, a Democrat, to undermine reporting that was critical of the Vietnam War, he said.

Cheves, the McConnell series' reporter, said the Center for Investigative Reporting "has reviewed various drafts of the stories" but has "made no suggestions or changes."

The center doesn't show material to the Deer Creek Foundation or any of its other funding sources, Noyes said.

Cheves and his editors at the Herald-Leader said neither group placed any constraints on his reporting. They said he had limited contact with the Center for Investigative Reporting and none with Deer Creek as he produced the series.

"It is extremely thorough and very fair," said Sharon Walsh, the enterprise editor at the newspaper. "I don't know how else I would be able to associate my name with it. I think it's an excellent piece of journalism."

The controversy over the McConnell series and its funding ended up in the lap of Weaver, McClatchy's vice president for news. After consulting with several editors involved in the project and with McClatchy Chief Executive Officer Gary Pruitt, Weaver decided to reimburse the Center for Investigative Reporting for the original grant to the Herald-Leader.

"I'm not uncomfortable with the journalism, and I'm certainly not uncomfortable with the journalist," Weaver said. "I just think that the relationship (with the outside groups) was sufficiently unorthodox that we don't need to do it."

The decision to refund the grant drew various responses from some of the main players in the controversy.

For McConnell, the move comes too late.

"Returning the money after the fact doesn't change the product or any of the concerns we've raised," Stewart said. "It would be hard to explain why the paper is running stories that McClatchy has determined came as the result of an inappropriate funding process."

For Bob Steele, who teaches journalism ethics at the Poynter Institute in Florida and in newsrooms around the country, the decision to return the money was the right one.

"I would think that kind of specific funding by an organization with a direct stake in the players and the issues is ethically problematic," Steele said. "You can't erase the board here in its entirety because there's a history, but at least it's wise for McClatchy to say it's going to pay for the costs of doing this reporting."

The decision disappointed Thompson, the former Herald-Leader executive editor, whose Knight Ridder bosses had praised her for producing important journalism with outside funding.

"The truly important thing is that revelatory reporting will be published, after it has been thoroughly vetted for accuracy and fairness," Thompson said. "Which, of course, was our goal from the very start."

Despite Woes, Bush Offers Fund-Raising As Promised (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

WASHINGTON, Oct. 13 — President Bush is not the kind of guy to back out on a promise, especially when it comes to raising money for fellow Republicans.

So it is that Mr. Bush, who has slogged his way through many a fund-raiser this campaign season, plans to make the rounds of what might be called the Congressional newsmakers caucus next week, with back-to-back fund-raisers on Thursday for Representative Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania and Senator George Allen of Virginia.

Mr. Sherwood, who is now vulnerable in what had been considered a safe seat, has admitted having an extra-marital affair with a woman who has accused him of trying to choke her; he has said the “allegation of abuse was never true.”

Mr. Allen is fighting for re-election after a string of controversies involving racially insensitive remarks; his denial and subsequent embrace of his newly discovered Jewish heritage, and reports that he had failed to disclose stock options.

“The president made a commitment, and he’s going to stick with it,” Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said Friday, explaining the fund-raising appearances. “The president supports their quest for election. He understands what’s going on.”

In a year that has seen Republicans tarred by scandal — Mark Foley of Florida resigned his House seat late last month after revelations he sent sexually explicit e-mail messages to teenage pages; Representative Bob Ney of Ohio pleaded guilty on Friday to taking bribes in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, and Randy Cunningham, a former House member, was sentenced to eight years in prison in March for taking bribes — the troubles of Mr. Allen and Mr. Sherwood might seem tame by comparison.

But the president's appearances on their behalf underscore the challenge facing Mr. Bush. With a little more than three weeks to go until Election Day, he and his party are investing time and money to hold seats they did not originally think they would have to defend so aggressively.

"It's all about maintaining the majority and turning out your vote," said Scott Reed, a Republican strategist. "It's normal at this stage of the campaign to go back and tap down some of the wobbly races, and it sounds like Pennsylvania and Virginia are on the top of the trouble list."

Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, said the Allen campaign hoped to raise enough money Thursday to counter the $1 million that the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee recently gave to Mr. Allen's opponent, Jim Webb.

A spokesman for Mr. Sherwood did not return a reporter's call.

Mr. Snow said the president supported both men and was comfortable appearing with them. "George Allen is not a bigot. Period," he said.

As to Mr. Sherwood, Mr. Snow said the president "believes that we are all sinners and we all seek forgiveness."

Bush To Campaign For Troubled Lawmakers (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

AP, October 14, 2006

A congressman who admitted to having an affair and a senator accused of using racial slurs will get some political help from President Bush next week.

Bush will make campaign stops Thursday in Pennsylvania and Virginia to help the two troubled Republicans as the GOP struggles to maintain its endangered grip on the House and Senate.

"The President has made a commitment, and he's going to fulfill the commitment," White House press secretary Tony Snow said Friday.

Bush's appearances are intended to give a boost to four-term Rep. Don Sherwood, R-Pa., and Sen. George Allen, R-Va.

Sherwood had one of the safest seats in Congress as his conservatism played well in his heavily Republican, rural district in northeastern Pennsylvania. Democrats didn't even bother fielding a candidate in the last two elections.

Then last year Sherwood admitted to a five-year extramarital affair with a woman 35 years his junior. He settled a lawsuit claiming he had choked her.

"Mr. Sherwood has certainly admitted to what has gone on, and the president also believes that we're all sinners, we all seek forgiveness, and in this particular case, he's supporting Don Sherwood's candidacy," Snow said.

Allen has spent weeks rebutting accusations he used racist language and liked Confederate symbols. The furor began Aug. 11, when the senator called a volunteer for his opponent "macaca," considered by some to be a racial slur, during a political rally.

"George Allen is not a bigot. Period," Snow said. "And you've had a number of black leaders who've come forward to make the point.

"So the president, absolutely, supports his candidacy," Snow said.

Snow suggested that Allen's opponent, Democrat Jim Webb, was vulnerable for things he has said. Webb, a former Navy secretary under President Reagan, argued in a 1979 magazine article that women are not fit to command men in battle and criticized their admission to the U.S. Naval Academy.

Bush Is Said To Have No Plan If GOP Loses (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, October 13, 2006

Some Republican strategists are increasingly upset with what they consider the overconfidence of President Bush and his senior advisers about the midterm elections November 7–a concern aggravated by the president's news conference this week.

"They aren't even planning for if they lose," says a GOP insider who informally counsels the West Wing. If Democrats win control of the House, as many analysts expect, Republicans predict that Bush's final two years in office will be marked by multiple congressional investigations and gridlock.

"The Bush White House has had no relationship with Congress," said a Bush ally. "Beyond the Democrats, wait till they see how the Republicans–the ones that survive–treat them if they lose next month." GOP insiders are upset by Bush's seeming inability to come up with new ideas or fresh approaches. There is even a heightened sensitivity to the way Bush talks about advisers who served his father.

At the president's news conference on Wednesday, allies of his father complained that the president seemed dismissive of former Secretary of State James Baker, who remains close to his dad and is cochairman of a bipartisan panel studying the war in Iraq.

"I think it's good to have some of our elder statesmen–I hate to call Baker an elder statesman–but to go over there and take a look, and to come back and make recommendations," Bush said. Baker fans felt this made the former secretary seem part of a bygone era. There is also considerable criticism of Bush for making little or no news in his 63-minute encounter with the press.

"He had nothing to say at the press conference," says a prominent GOP insider. "My question is, why call it?"

Tight Races Republican Money Can't Stave Off New Peril In Senate (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

Chances Rise for Democrats Controlling Both Houses As Funding Gap Narrows Paying a Scandal Premium

WASHINGTON -- As their prospects dim for holding control of the House, Republicans are increasingly alarmed they also could lose their Senate majority on Nov. 7, and the party is finding its fund-raising edge isn't going as far as it used to.

The late cash crunch shows just how much an already difficult political environment has worsened for Republicans since the scandal over Rep. Mark Foley's emails to pages erupted two weeks ago. For the first time since taking control of Congress in 1994, party leaders are being forced to pick and choose which of the tight races they can throw money into winning. They simply can't afford them all.

Mounting fears of a growing anti-incumbent wave have led many well-off party veterans to hoard more of their war chests to protect themselves, rather than share with more vulnerable colleagues as they usually would. New York Republican Rep. Peter King, for instance, has outraised a feisty Democratic opponent by sixfold. But with three weeks until the election, he is resisting pressure to send a late check to his party's campaign committee. "The concern any Republican has is: Will there be a political tsunami? Will the bottom drop out of the polls?"

Republicans have increasingly concentrated on three Senate seats -- Tennessee, Missouri and Ohio -- to try to salvage at least a one-seat majority. They currently hold 55 of the Senate's 100 seats, but at least six of those are now seen as vulnerable. The party's national and Senate campaign accounts have recently spent $14.1 million to hold the seats of retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, Missouri Sen. Jim Talent and Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine -- with $8 million spent on Mr. DeWine alone. Yet most polls show Democrats still leading in all three races.

That spending comes at the expense of other vulnerable incumbents, including Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and Montana Sen. Conrad Burns, who are also both running behind. They are getting voter turnout help but not independent advertising support from the national party.

The party's new priorities also divert money away from the overall House contest, in which the Republican National Committee has invested less than $1 million in ads. Meanwhile, many Republican national strategists now expect to lose their House majority, as the number of endangered seats has recently risen and Democrats have been able to hold a bigger portion of their cash back for a late push.

"There is no question this is the most challenging environment we've had since 1994 from lots of perspectives, from issues to targeting races," says RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman. But he noted the party also has raised more money than ever before and plans major voter-turnout help for candidates in tight races. It also is unclear yet whether incumbent Republicans will manage to boost their fund raising in the last weeks to swamp individual Democratic opponents.

Republicans are used to having more money than Democrats but this year the margin is narrower. And Republican money needs to be spread across an unusually large number of races. Those tight contests in turn are creating an air-time crunch that is sending advertising costs soaring compared with just two years ago.

Republicans also are paying a scandal premium. The uproar over Rep. Foley has made it harder for Republican candidates to break through with their desired message. Other recent ethical scandals, such as the Abramoff lobbying case, also have raised the effective price to elect some Republican candidates.

A large number of the toughest Republican races this year are concentrated in expensive urban media markets, particularly in the Northeast. That means Republicans must spend more on defense, and can't invest as heavily in offense.

For instance, Republicans say they can defeat New Jersey's freshman Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez. Republican campaign committees are using direct mail and blast emails to highlight alleged ethical violations by the incumbent, and boosting ground troops for the turnout effort on Election Day. But the real road into the homes of New Jersey voters is by way of the pricey New York and Philadelphia markets, the country's first and fourth biggest. So far, the party hasn't reserved a penny to put its attacks against Mr. Menendez on the airwaves.

The Republican House campaign committee has reserved about 20% of its national television advertising budget -- $10 million -- just for the Philadelphia market. That is because three House Republicans are endangered there. But that doesn't buy nearly as much airtime as it used to. A 30-second commercial before an 11 p.m. local newscast cost $1,509 in 2004. The current price: $3,044, according to TNS Media Intelligence/cmag, which tracks political advertising.

The Republicans' vulnerability in those races has drawn well-financed challengers in the House contests, as well as the re-election race of Sen. Santorum. Those supply-and-demand pressures have pushed advertising costs skyward.

The investment in Philadelphia means House leaders have to forgo spending elsewhere. After their favored candidate lost in an Arizona primary, the House Republican campaign committee canceled television time it had reserved for the general election contest for that open seat, which now is likely to flip from Republican to Democrat. Party leaders are debating shifting resources away from a Colorado open seat, which also could become a Democratic pickup. And wealthy House incumbents, such as Indiana Rep. Chris Chocola, are being told to dip into their own personal fortunes to pay for their re-elections rather than waiting for a handout from the national committees.

Comparing balance sheets between the two parties, Republicans don't seem in bad shape. The national committee, combined with the party's Senate and House campaign committees, has raised $378 million since this campaign cycle began in January 2005, which still dwarfs the $270 million the Democrats have raised. And Republican candidates outraised the Democrats by more than $10 million through August, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, the most recent figures available.

But those are less comfortable margins than Republicans are used to having, and the overall numbers mask some surprising weaknesses.

The Democrats' campaign committees specifically targeting House and Senate races have surpassed or matched their Republican counterparts in building up cash on hand, which has never happened before. According to Tony Corrado, an expert on political finance at Colby College, the two Democratic congressional committees have helped cut the Republicans' cash edge at this point to less than half the margin it was overall in the 2002 midterms.

"We have to at least surpass them to just stay competitive," Illinois veteran Republican Rep. Ray LaHood says of the Democrats. "This is the most competitive I have ever seen it."

A study by the Campaign Finance Institute, a nonpartisan Washington organization that tracks political money, also holds unsettling news for Republicans. Democratic candidates vying in competitive districts are in their best financial position in years, raising an average of $1 million in the first 18 months of this campaign cycle, compared with an average $1.7 million by the Republican incumbents. At the same point in 2004, Republican incumbents enjoyed a four-to-one advantage over their challengers.

It has fallen to the Republican National Committee, the party's biggest money machine, to provide some breathing room. The RNC reported in August a $28 million edge over the Democratic National Committee. But the vast majority of that money is earmarked for a $30 million national get-out-the-vote effort, which party leaders say will push some marginal candidates over the finish line.

The Foley scandal could make it even harder for Republicans to sustain their cash advantage. The day before his emails became public, the House Republican campaign committee chairman, Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York, told members he was raising his "battleground" budget by $5 million, to $22 million.

In short order, questions about the House leadership's management of the scandal -- including Mr. Reynolds himself -- tarnished some of the Republicans' biggest fund-raiser headliners. Embattled candidates across the country were already shunning money-raising events with unpopular President Bush. Now they are avoiding fund-raisers that feature House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, and House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio.

To keep control of the House, Republicans have to limit their net losses at 14 seats. To keep control of the Senate, they can't drop more than five. But, as the election nears, they are being forced to defend an ever-widening field.

Since the Foley furor, the number of House Republican seats in play has moved from 36 to 43, according to Amy Walter, of the Cook Political Report. The number of Democrats in some peril is unchanged at nine.

At the same time, Republicans seem to have to pay an increasing price to hold on to each seat. In a June special election, the national party committees spent about $5 million to hold the seat of Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the San Diego lawmaker who pleaded guilty to bribery. Their candidate, Rep. Brian Bilbray, won with 78,341 votes. The cost per ballot: about $64. In the 2004 midterms, Mr. Cunningham spent less than $6 per vote, $939,000 overall.

In Rhode Island, Republicans spent at least $1.6 million defending incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee against a primary challenge from a candidate party leaders considered too conservative to win in November. Mr. Chafee won with 34,936 votes, a cost-per-vote ratio for the party committees of $46. In 2000, Mr. Chafee faced no primary challenge but won the general election spending only about $10 per vote.

Mr. Gerlach was elected to Congress in 2002 after stints in both chambers in the state legislature. In both his congressional races he won by a narrow 51%-49% ratio. His 2004 Democratic challenger, Lois Murphy, is racing against him again this time. Mr. Gerlach says he made his first round of fund-raising calls for this campaign in January 2005 -- less than two months after his 2004 re-election.

Mr. Gerlach calculates he has held 60 to 70 fund-raisers a year to collect the approximately $3 million he has budgeted for the campaign, about a million more than he spent in 2004. But Ms. Murphy sometimes has matched or surpassed his fund raising, and boosted her campaign budget to more than $3 million after Mr. Gerlach unleashed an early round of direct mail accusing her of favoring tax increases.

The House Republican committee is rushing to Mr. Gerlach's aid, earmarking $4 million of its $10 million for Philadelphia TV ads just for his race. The Democratic House committee is countering with about $3 million. "We have to make up for that and we will. I will not lose this election for a few million dollars," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said in an interview.

Mr. Gerlach's campaign finances also have been affected by scandals. In August, he returned a $7,000 donation to him from Ohio Rep. Bob Ney, who pleaded guilty Friday in the Abramoff lobbying scandal. He has refused to give back the $30,000 that came from former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay's campaign accounts, arguing that though the former Texas lawmaker has been charged with money laundering, he hasn't been convicted of anything.

Now Mr. Gerlach is grappling with fallout from the Foley scandal. He canceled a fund-raiser that was to be headlined by Majority Leader Boehner, whose role in managing the crisis is a subject of scrutiny, and quickly transferred a $1,000 check from Mr. Foley to charity. During a recent senior-center appearance, Mr. Gerlach gave up trying to talk about terrorism or taxes when it became apparent that the Foley matter was chiefly on his audience's minds. "Did you think people knew?" one participant asked. As the congressman dodged, another woman pressed him that "there had to be some" hints.

Mr. Gerlach opted for political survival and distanced himself from his party leaders. The disclosure of the so-called "overly friendly" email to a page, initially brushed aside by House leaders, "should have set off some bells and whistles," he said, "because that's not a normal thing."

Incumbents Hold Cash Advantages (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Incumbent senators entered the final weeks of the midterm campaign with substantial sums in their bank accounts, but challengers also stepped up fundraising to keep races competitive and ad buyers busy to the very end.

Republican Sen. Mike DeWine, locked in one of the fiercest Senate races this year, had a $3 million advantage over Democratic challenger Rep. Sherrod Brown at the end of September. However, Brown had the edge on fundraising for the quarter, according to reports they plan to file with the Federal Election Commission.

In Connecticut, Sen. Joe Lieberman, running as an independent, had $4.7 million in the bank as he attempts to fend off millionaire Democrat Ned Lamont. New Jersey Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez had $5.5 million at the end of September, compared with $3.17 million for Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr.

Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell of Washington said she had $3.5 million in the bank after raising $2 million in the past quarter. Her opponent, Republican Mike McGavick, outraised her this quarter, bringing in nearly $2.2 million for the period ending Sept. 30, and had $2.1 million on hand.

In Rhode Island, incumbent Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee reported about $700,000 on hand, compared with $1.4 million for his challenger, Sheldon Whitehouse.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton had more than $14 million in her campaign account as she coasts through an easy re-election campaign in New York. Any money she has left over after the Nov. 7 election could be used in a possible presidential campaign, giving her a head start over her potential opponents.

Democrat James Webb, who is seeking to unseat Republican Sen. George Allen of Virginia, reported having $2.7 million on hand after raising $3.5 million in the quarter. Allen, who had not released his new quarterly numbers, had $6.6 million on hand at the end of June.

As a rule, incumbents tend to raise more money than challengers. In this election cycle, that advantage helps Republicans. But Democratic operatives say third-quarter fundraising by their candidates have helped close that gap.

In Ohio, DeWine had $4.5 million in the bank compared with Brown's $1.2 million. But Brown managed to raise slightly more money since July than DeWine. The Brown campaign also said its cash-on-hand figure was lower because it had paid for about $2.5 million in advertising until election day.

Lamont's campaign did not immediately release his campaign finance data. He has spent about $9 million of his own money to unseat Lieberman, including a $2 million contribution this week.

In New Jersey, Kean raised $1.76 million in the quarter.

For Chafee, his lower cash-on-hand total reflects the enormous effort he made to beat back a primary challenge from Republican Steve Laffey on Sept. 12. Chafee has had little time to resupply his campaign account. Chafee, who lists his net worth between $41 million and $64 million, could also write a check to his campaign as he did during the primary.

The deadline for July-September finance reports is Sunday. Several campaigns were beginning to release their figures Friday.

At this point in a campaign, the amount of cash in the bank can determine a campaign's ability to surge ahead or defend against an opponent's momentum. The money is also a factor in helping national parties decide where to spend their resources.

In Ohio, for example, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, the National Republican Senatorial Committee and the Republican National Committee have been spending heavily on television advertising and other means of reaching voters. Outside groups have also weighed in with ads.

Campaign strategists said the amount of cash candidates had was especially important in states with a number of media markets, such as Ohio, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Smaller states such as Montana and Rhode Island are less expensive.

Kerry Says GOP Lied About Foley, Iraq (AP)

By Holly Ramer

Associated Press, October 14, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. (AP) -- Sen. John Kerry, a potential presidential candidate in 2008, likened the congressional page scandal to the war in Iraq and the handling of North Korea, saying that Republicans have lied repeatedly.

"A lie, a lie, a lie, a lie. What we have in Washington is a house of lies, and in November, we need to clean house," Kerry, D-Mass., said Friday night during the New Hampshire Democratic Party's annual fall fundraising dinner.

"They tell us we're making progress in Iraq and that there is no civil war. That is a lie," he said. "It's immoral to lie about progress in that war in order to get through a news cycle or an election cycle."

Kerry criticized the Bush administration for blaming the North Korean nuclear test on former President Clinton.

"That is a lie. North Korea's nuclear program was frozen under Bill Clinton. When George W. Bush turned his back on diplomacy, Kim Jong Il turned back to making bombs, and the world is less safe because a madman has the Bush bomb," he said.

Republicans also are lying when they claim the page scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley is a Democratic plot to win the midterm elections, Kerry said.

"This issue is here because of a Republican cover-up," he said. "And those from the party that preaches moral values that covered this up have no right to preach moral values anymore."

Responding to the speech, Wayne Semprini, chairman of the New Hampshire Republican State Committee, said Americans didn't buy what Kerry and the Democrats said in 2004.

Webb Has Profitable Quarter, But Allen Still Leads (WP)

By Tim Craig, Washington Post Staff Writer

Democrat James Webb outraised Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) by nearly $1 million from July to October, according to campaign finance reports released yesterday that reflected a surge in support for the challenger after Allen made several controversial comments that dramatically tightened the race.

Allen still has twice as much in the bank as Webb, but both candidates said they will have enough money in the campaign's closing weeks to compete on TV in the crucial advertising war that will help decide the outcome.

Allen raised $2.6 million between July 1 and Sept. 30 and reported $5.5 million in the bank, according to his finance report, the last required before the Nov. 7 election.

Webb, who released his numbers earlier this month, raised $3.5 million during the same period. Webb had $2.7 million in the bank at the end of September, compared with the $437,000 he had after winning the Democratic nomination in June.

"Obviously, Webb has had a lot of momentum in the last two or three months," said Charlie Cook, editor of the Cook Political Report, which last week rated Virginia's Senate race a tossup. "There are a lot of people who didn't give to Webb six months ago because they didn't think he had a chance, but now he has a chance and they are jumping in."

Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager, discounted Webb's recent fundraising success by pointing to the amount of money his candidate still had in the bank.

"What is important is the bullet you have left to shoot," said Wadhams, who accused Webb of raising all of his money from national Democratic leaders who support higher taxes.

Kristian Denny Todd, a Webb spokeswoman, countered that Wadhams is "desperate" because Webb is picking up support.

"This shows what we have been saying all along: The more people get to know George Allen, the more they know George Allen is wrong for Virginia and Jim Webb is the right choice," Todd said.

The Federal Election Commission reports do not take into account the amount of money each candidate has raised so far this month. Vice President Dick Cheney headlined an Allen fundraiser last week in Fairfax. Webb spent Thursday and Friday raising money in Atlanta.

Allen's and Webb's bank accounts probably will get another boost next week when the current president and a former president travel to Virginia to lend their support. President Bush will appear at an Allen fundraiser in Richmond on Thursday, the same day former president Bill Clinton will attend a Webb fundraiser at the McLean home of former senator Charles S. Robb (D).

The high-profile visits underscore how the race has become one of the most closely watched Senate contests in the country. With less than a month to go until the election, both candidates and their affiliates are expected to pour millions of dollars into television commercials, direct mail, telephone calls and other efforts to mobilize voters.

Allen, a former governor who has raised $13 million for his reelection, was expected to crush Webb, a political newcomer, in the money race this year. In June, Allen had a 15-to-1 money advantage over Webb.

But Webb campaign officials say their fundraising soared after Allen made international headlines when he referred to a Webb campaign aide of Indian descent as "macaca" at a GOP rally in Southwest Virginia on Aug. 11. The term is considered a racial slur in some cultures.

After facing weeks of questions about his racial sensitivity, Allen watched his once-double-digit lead over Webb in the polls vanish. A Mason-Dixon poll released earlier this month showed the race tied.

The tightening of the race forced Allen to spend $3.6 million between July and October, compared with $1 million spent by Webb, according to finance reports.

Webb began advertising heavily only this month, to respond to weeks of assertions by Allen that Webb wrote a 1979 article that was demeaning to military women. Webb campaign officials say fundraising is still brisk, including $100,000 in online donations so far this week.

Webb also is being aided by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which this week began a $1 million ad buy focusing on Allen's voting record and his macaca comment. The committee also is planning a $750,000 ad buy next week, according to sources in both campaigns. The National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee has paid for direct-mail brochures, but it is unclear whether it also will start airing television or radio ads in the state. These amounts are independent expenditures that do not have to be listed on the candidates' reports.

Allen still has the advantage in money; yesterday, he released his second ad in a week accusing Webb of wanting to raise taxes. The ad will cost the campaign more than $600,000, an aide said.

Cook, who said Virginia is a key battleground in efforts by the Democrats to regain control of Congress, expects a lot of money to flow into the state between now and Election Day.

"If Webb loses, I am not sure it's going to be because of money," he said.

Allen's Ads Put Webb On Defense (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth Mclaughlin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

U.S. Sen. George Allen will reprise his role as a quarterback on the attack, while James H. Webb Jr. employs a defensive strategy in the final weeks before the election in Virginia's Senate race.

Mr. Allen, a Republican, will try to steamroll Mr. Webb, a Democrat, with a barrage of political ads before the Nov. 7 election.

The strategy has so far forced Mr. Webb to deflect a different issue each day, but Mr. Allen has been most effective pummeling the Democrat on taxes and social issues to rally his conservative base.

"Jim Webb, Hillary Clinton and their liberal allies in Washington don't want to give constitutional protection to traditional marriage," an announcer says on an Allen radio ad. "And if they don't share our values on something as basic as marriage, how can we trust them on any issue?"

The ad, which is running in rural parts of the state, is one of several that hit the airwaves this week to paint Mr. Webb as a liberal out of touch with Virginia values.

The Webb campaign fired back.

"All George Allen has left are lies," Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny-Todd said. "The latest ad contains the baseless charge that Jim Webb wants to redefine marriage. Radio stations should immediately pull the ad."

DOJ_NMG_0081141

Mr. Webb, who served as secretary of the Navy under President Reagan in 1987-88, is appealing to centrist Republicans and voters fed up with the Iraq war.

The decorated Vietnam War veteran is no stranger to a fight, and has surrounded himself with tough and seasoned Democrats, including former President Bill Clinton, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and former Gov. Mark Warner.

"We have an administration that is telling us that the global war on terror is World War three or four, take your pick, and that Iraq is the central battlefront on the central war on international terror," Mr. Webb said at a recent campaign appearance in Dumfries, Va. "But ask yourself, how many of them are risking their own kid?"

Mr. Webb's son Jimmy, a 24-year-old lance corporal in the Marine Corps, is in Ramadi, one of the most dangerous regions of Iraq.

The Democrat's campaign said Mr. Allen's marriage ad includes the false claim that Mr. Webb "would like to change the definition of marriage."

Mr. Webb said that as a Christian, he thinks marriage should be between one man and one woman, but he plans to vote against the proposed amendment on the Virginia ballot because he thinks it takes rights away from all unmarried couples.

"We have a law right now that defines marriage," he said at a debate Monday night. "We don't need to ruin the Constitution."

Mr. Allen also is telling voters Mr. Webb would repeal President Bush's tax cuts, which forced the Democrat to run an ad rebutting the claim.

"Take a look in your wallet. Are you rich?" asks the Allen radio ad. "Jim Webb thinks you are. He thinks you don't need a tax cut. In fact, he thinks you aren't paying enough taxes."

Mr. Webb's ad responds: "George Allen's lying again. Truth is, Jim Webb's plan cuts taxes for middle class families and veterans."

Mr. Webb, who benefited from free publicity after numerous Allen missteps over the past two months, dismissed Mr. Allen's commercials this week as employing "Karl Rove" tactics and claims he is misquoted.

"What I've said is any tax breaks that benefit a large section of the American people, I am for," he told reporters Wednesday.

But Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams responded: "It's pretty clear that Webb's refusal to agree to a 'no-new tax' pledge means what we all know, that he would join Hillary Clinton and Ted Kennedy in rolling back the tax cuts Senators Allen and Warner helped pass in 2001 and 2003."

Several elements of Mr. Bush's tax cuts are set to expire over the next few years if Congress does not renew them.

Kean Campaign Shows Improvement In Its Fund-Raising Efforts (NYT)

By David W. Chen

TRENTON, Oct. 13 — Posting his strongest fund-raising numbers to date, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr. has significantly reduced what had been a three-to-one advantage in resources for his opponent, Senator Robert Menendez, according to preliminary campaign finance data released on Friday.

Yet in a caustic race that figures to be dominated by television advertising in its final four weeks, Mr. Menendez, the Democratic incumbent, still enjoys a solid lead in overall cash on hand, $5.5 million compared to $3.2 million for Mr. Kean.

From July 1 to Sept. 30, Mr. Kean, a Republican, raised nearly $1.8 million and spent $866,000 — eclipsing his best fund-raising efforts over a three-month period, when he raised $1.6 million in the first quarter of this year.

Mr. Menendez, meanwhile, had his slowest quarter of the year, collecting almost $1.4 million. And with a television blitz that began in September, he spent $3.4 million, or almost double what he had spent in the previous two quarters combined.

The campaigns are required to file detailed breakdowns of contributions with the Federal Election Commission on Sunday, but said they would not publicly release those fuller reports for at least a week.

In an election year in which control of Congress could be in the balance, the New Jersey totals are part of a national spreadsheet of campaign data that will be used to help gauge the wherewithal of Democrats and Republicans heading into Nov. 7.

In Connecticut, for instance, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman reported having $4.7 million on hand. He raised $6.1 million from July 20 to Sept. 30, and spent $4.9 million in that period. Mr. Lieberman is running as an independent after having been defeated in the Democratic primary by Ned Lamont, who did not release his financial report on Friday. Mr. Lamont, a cable television executive, has previously said that he contributed $4.7 million to his own campaign since the Aug. 8 primary.

In New Jersey, the third-quarter fund-raising figures had been much anticipated, because recent polls have showed Mr. Menendez, who was appointed in December to fill the seat, and Mr. Kean in a virtual tie.

Steele Hits Cardin For Linking Him To Bush, GOP (WT)

By Jon Ward, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

HAGERSTOWN, Md. -- A visibly angry Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele yesterday lashed out at Democratic attempts to tie him to President Bush and national Republicans in the U.S. Senate race, saying that he refuses "to be the whipping boy for or against the Republican Party."

"You know, I'm tired of this. I've got to justify everything the administration does, or everything it doesn't do. This is not about that," Mr. Steele told reporters after participating in a forum conducted by the Washington County Chamber of Commerce.

The Republican Senate nominee noted that his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, "mentioned the president 113 times" during their debate last week.

"If he wanted to run against George Bush, he should have done it two years ago," said Mr. Steele, who began airing a TV ad this week that criticizes both parties.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele took part in a forum that had been billed as a debate. The Senate candidates separately took to the podium, addressed the Chamber of Commerce and answered questions from the audience.

The 10-term congressman from Baltimore talked at length about health care, transportation, and especially his desire to balance the federal budget.

"Mr. Steele talks about changing the direction of America," said Mr. Cardin, who spoke to the chamber before his Republican rival. "I don't know how you change the direction of America when you agree with the president on so many issues."

Democratic ads for Mr. Cardin have linked Mr. Steele to the president and Republican leaders, such as strategist Karl Rove.

Asked if he thinks the general unpopularity of national Republicans will affect his campaign, Mr. Steele said: "I'm not going to stand here and try to be the whipping boy for or against the Republican Party because this is the same nonsense ... that keeps this cycle going.

"Let's move forward," he said. "You know what's going to make the difference between my winning this seat and losing this seat? Me. Me. Nothing else. Me. That's why this is a conversation between me and the people."

Mr. Steele, who is the first black to win a statewide election in Maryland, said that he is "feeling a pulse and a heartbeat in this state that is not being captured in polls. I'm excited about that."

Mr. Steele previously had distanced himself from Mr. Bush, saying that his Republican Party affiliation is a "scarlet letter" in Maryland, where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-to-1. But he also has called the president his "homeboy."

The Democratic strategy of linking Mr. Steele to national Republicans was recommended last spring by a pollster who said that Mr. Steele was a "unique threat" to Democrats' monopoly on black voters.

Pollster Cornell Belcher identified an "emerging black swing vote" and advised Democrats to turn Mr. Steele "into a typical Republican in the eyes of voters, as opposed to an African-American candidate."

Recent polls have shown Mr. Cardin leading by an average of 10 points. But cracks have appeared in Democratic unity since Mr. Cardin defeated Kweisi Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, in the party's Senate primary.

Black political, religious and business leaders have said that there is growing grass-roots discontent with the lack of minority leaders in the Democratic Party. They say that some black voters, who are mostly registered Democrats, are going to cross party lines and vote for Mr. Steele.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele have scheduled two debates -- Oct. 25 on WJLA-TV (Channel 7) and Oct. 29 on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Opposition To Abortion Won't Affect Job, Steele Says (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Ann E. Marimow, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Maryland Senate candidate Michael S. Steele said yesterday that his strong personal opposition to legalizing abortion would not factor into his work in Washington, or his evaluation of a nominee for U.S. Supreme Court justice, should he be elected next month.

"I have no litmus test in that regard because my constitutional obligation is to represent the people of the state," said Steele, who is Catholic.

"In that instance, you put on the bench the best jurist because our country is more than one issue, even though it's a profound issue," he said during a meeting with Washington Post editors and reporters. "I have never subscribed to a benchmark, litmus test mentality. And I never would. I never will."

The Republican candidate was less emphatic when asked about gun rights and suggested that his general support might not extend to assault weapons.

"You draw the line. I mean, what do you need an assault weapon for?" Steele said. The National Rifle Association has spent about $4,000 in support of his bid this year, campaign finance records show.

The remarks highlighted a continued effort by Steele -- who is running in a state where Democrats outnumber Republicans by nearly 2 to 1 -- to soften the edges on his conservative views on a number of incendiary social issues.

They came the day after the lieutenant governor began a television ad criticizing his party for implementing an education policy, the No Child Left Behind act, that he says "teaches to the test."

"It's clear that Michael Steele will say anything to get elected," said Oren Shur, a spokesman for Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, Steele's Democratic rival. "At this point, it's hard to tell if Steele is just hiding his support for Bush's convictions or if he has no real convictions at all."

If there has been any brushback from the Republican National Committee, Steele said he was unaware of it. Steele said yesterday, "They ain't gonna give up on the brother."

Steele has spent much of his campaign distancing himself from the GOP in a year when the president is polling below 40 percent nationally and lower in Maryland.

Earlier yesterday, Steele and Cardin spoke about economics, health care and gas prices at a forum held by the Hagerstown-Washington County Chamber of Commerce.

The candidates stood at the same podium, answering many of the same questions, but they spoke separately. They overlapped briefly, shaking hands in the back of the hotel ballroom as Cardin departed and Steele arrived.

Their contrasts in style and substance were striking. Cardin, sounding like a policy professor, presented himself as a fiscally responsible "deficit hawk" with a record of working with Republicans during his 20 years in Congress.

"I'm a hawk on paying the bills," Cardin told the audience of about 100 people. "It doesn't sell well in the polls. People love tax cuts; people love big spending. Well, legislators have to make tough decisions."

Steele, emphasizing his personal story, portrayed himself as an outsider who would bring a small-business owners' perspective to what he called out-of-touch official Washington.

"Washington, in my view, has gotten outside itself," he said. "It is beyond the ivory tower. It is a place that none of us have any clue of what they're doing because they have no clue as to what's going on in your daily lives."

On policy, the candidates' differences were most apparent on two issues. Cardin opposes suspending the federal gas tax because, he said, the revenue is needed to pay for critical transportation projects. Steele said he would suspend the tax for four months to give consumers a break. On health care, Cardin supports a universal coverage plan similar to legislation passed in Massachusetts. Steele prefers to give businesses more flexibility to pool their resources.

Rural Areas' Racism May Cost Steele Votes (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0081144

By S.a. Miller, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

Residents in Western Maryland and on the Eastern Shore say there are many whites among them who will not vote for a black candidate, such as Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who is running for the U.S. Senate.

"Here in rural parts of the state, race might be an issue. It shouldn't, but it might," Greg Slick, a physical education teacher at North Hagerstown High School, said at a recent Friday night varsity football game. "They are not openly going to say it."

Mr. Slick, 52, a registered Republican who is white, said he will vote for Mr. Steele. But he added that the World Knights of the Ku Klux Klan is not based in nearby Sharpsburg by accident, despite public outcry every summer over the group's annual rally at Antietam National Battlefield.

"Someone is drawing them here," he said.

David Marshall, 54, a white waterman from Crisfield on the Eastern Shore, said he is sure some of the people he works with will vote against Mr. Steele because of his skin color.

However, he said he and his friends will vote for Mr. Steele, regardless of his race.

"The people I talk to say it won't affect their vote," Mr. Marshall said on a recent afternoon as he moored his trawler.

Racial politics in Maryland has focused on the Democratic Party's efforts to secure support among its most loyal bloc -- black voters, who increasingly say that the party has taken them for granted.

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin -- the Democratic Senate nominee who is a white, 10-term congressman from Baltimore -- is trying to woo black votes amid criticism that the state party's ticket lacks diversity.

But white voters in Republican strongholds in rural areas pose a threat to the senatorial ambitions of Mr. Steele, who already has battled race-baiting by Democrats in his Senate bid.

"On the Eastern Shore, there are a lot of rednecks," said Dawn Thomas, 46, a white waitress at a Kent Island restaurant. "I know how my family is. They come from over here, and they're very prejudiced."

A Steele campaign adviser said the Senate nominee can do little to counter racism. However, the adviser remained confident that conservative rural voters from both parties will overwhelmingly support Mr. Steele.

In 2002, Mr. Steele became the first black to win a statewide election, as the running mate of Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. The Ehrlich-Steele ticket drew 2-to-1 support among voters in rural areas, such as Allegany, Washington and Wicomico counties. During a luncheon Monday at The Washington Times, Mr. Ehrlich said much of Mr. Steele's support is from white women.

In last month's primary election, Mr. Steele easily won the 10-candidate contest for the Republican Senate nomination, collecting thousands of votes over many white contenders who garnered only double-digit support in rural jurisdictions.

Such results prompted Paula A. Lampton, chairwoman of the Washington County Republican Central Committee, to say that race is not an issue.

"I've lived here for 30 years and I haven't seen it," she said. Mr. Steele "is very well-received when he comes here. He definitely represents our values and our needs in this portion of Western Maryland."

In addition, Catherine Poe, president of the Talbot County Democratic Forum, said she expects solid support for Mr. Steele among Republicans on the Eastern Shore.

"I know the Republican base is jazzed up and working way hard," she said. "Republicans are much more disciplined. They will stick with their guy."

However, an elected Eastern Shore official -- a white Republican -- said privately that racism probably will hurt Mr. Steele "a little bit" among white voters.

In Hagerstown, Gail Curtis, a black hairstylist, said local residents have shouted racial slurs at her and her children. She has "no doubt" that some white voters will be reluctant to cast a ballot for Mr. Steele because of his race.

"It's bad," said Ms. Curtis, 35. "This town is extremely set back in time. But it is changing."

Hagerstown City Council member Alesia Parson-McBean, a Democrat who last year became the first black elected to the council, said racial tensions are easing but acknowledged the persistence of old prejudices.

"I know within my first year [in office] I received hate mail and all these things," Mrs. Parson-McBean said. "It splintered people and caused division in our city, and much of the division was based on race."

Last year, Mrs. Parson-McBean and black high-school students were the target of death threats from Jeffrey Shifler, who was a member of the Boonsboro Police Department.

Shifler, 42, pleaded guilty in August to federal civil rights charges for hate mail and telephone calls to the council member threatening to burn her house down and for calls to the school board threatening to shoot black students. He is scheduled to be sentenced in December.

"That was considered amazing for this area," Mrs. Parson-McBean said of Shifler's prosecution. "I'm hoping we already learned from the ugliness of the past and are headed to a brighter future."

Mr. Steele's potential to break the Democratic lock on black urban votes has made Maryland's Senate race one of the country's most closely watched campaigns and one of the most fiercely fought between the national parties.

The Senate has one black member -- Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat and the fifth black senator in U.S. history.

The country has not had a black governor since L. Douglas Wilder, a Virginia Democrat, left office 12 years ago. He was the country's second black governor: Pinckney Benton Stewart Pinchback led Louisiana from 1872 to 1873.

Mr. Steele is among three black U.S. Senate candidates and three black gubernatorial candidates -- a record number -- on the Nov. 7 ballot. Only Democrat Deval Patrick in the Massachusetts governor's race is ahead in the polls.

To Invade GOP Strongholds, Tap Bay Area (LAT)

By Rone Tempest, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

Activists are flooding into the districts of Reps. Pombo and Doolittle on behalf of Democratic challengers, making the races more competitive.

BERKELEY — The congressional fundraiser was at a pub in the heart of this liberal political stronghold. A local band, The Flux, entertained with a tune titled "Impeach the President."

The focus of attention: two candidates vying for seats in bedrock conservative districts to the east, currently occupied by Republicans John T. Doolittle of Granite Bay and Richard W. Pombo of Tracy.

Although most experts still give them a narrow edge, Doolittle, 55, seeking his ninth term, and Pombo, 45, pursuing his eighth, are in the toughest fights of their political careers going into the Nov. 7 election.

Their Northern California races are considered the most competitive in the state. President Bush demonstrated his concern by showing up at fundraisers for the duo last week, garnering more than $1 million for their campaigns.

But the prospect of upset victories contributing to a Democratic takeover of Congress — potentially installing San Francisco's Nancy Pelosi as speaker — has added another dimension to the Doolittle and Pombo races. Hundreds of volunteers and activists in Berkeley and other Bay Area communities have mobilized on the Democratic side, raising money, manning phone banks and carpooling into the districts to canvass neighborhoods for votes.

"They are already trying to figure out the color of Nancy Pelosi's rug in the speaker's office," said Allan Hoffenblum, publisher of the nonpartisan California Target Book, an election compendium.

The Berkeley event at the Albatross Pub was preceded Sept. 27 by a rally at Oakland's Grand Lake Theater at which former San Francisco mayor and state Assembly Speaker Willie Brown urged the crowd to fan out into the Doolittle and Pombo districts.

"There is a concerted effort to nationalize the elections," complained Doolittle, interviewed after the Bush fundraiser at the Serrano Country Club in suburban Sacramento. "You've got a lot of them being bused in here from the Bay Area — left-wing, antiwar activists."

Doolittle, whose 4th District stretches from the Sierra foothills east of Sacramento to the Oregon border, is opposed by retired Air Force Lt. Col. Charlie Brown, 56, of Roseville. Brown, a soft-spoken Air Force Academy graduate, is counting on his military background to help him in what is arguably California's most conservative district, based on Republican registration.

Pombo, whose 11th District includes Bay Area suburbs and San Joaquin Valley ranch lands, is challenged by wind energy scientist Jerry McNerney, 55, of Pleasanton. McNerney's intellectual and environmental credentials are an asset in some of the high-tech corners of the district, which includes the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory.

The incumbent defended the Bush policy in Iraq.

"Going to war in Iraq was to protect this country," Pombo said. "I would rather take the war over there than fight it here."

McNerney countered that "we need to find a smart and a tough way to end this war."

The McNerney-Pombo contest is a repeat of the 2004 election, which Pombo won handily. Since 2004, however, both Doolittle and Pombo have suffered from their association with convicted Washington lobbyist and power broker Jack Abramoff.

Doolittle's wife, Julie, owns a political consulting firm that did extensive work for Abramoff. Doolittle has also been criticized for paying his wife's firm, Sierra Dominion Financial Solutions, a 15% commission on campaign contributions.

When President Bush raised $600,000 at the Oct. 3 fundraiser, Julie Doolittle earned $90,000.

Pombo received $7,500 in campaign contributions from Abramoff and $30,000 from Abramoff clients.

Like Doolittle, Pombo has also come under attack for bestowing campaign funds on his immediate family, including several hundred thousand dollars for his wife, Annette, and brother Randall.

On the heels of the Abramoff matter came the congressional page scandal that led to the resignation of Rep. Mark Foley, a Florida Republican. With the environment for Republicans deteriorating, the independent Cook Political Report last week downgraded both the Pombo and Doolittle races from likely GOP victories to merely leaning Republican.

Still, both Doolittle and Pombo have amassed significant campaign reserves. In the last federal reporting period, Pombo had 10 times more cash on hand than McNerney, a disparity that could give the incumbent a big advantage when television ads begin airing in earnest this month.

Both the Brown and McNerney candidacies, however, have been bolstered by activists from the Bay Area, the most Democratic chunk of the state.

"I'm overjoyed to find a place where I can work and perhaps make a difference," said Keith Miller, 69, a retired UC Berkeley mathematics professor who spent a recent evening manning a phone bank for McNerney in a downtown Oakland union hall.

In addition to phone banks and fundraisers, the activists organize several convoys a week into the Doolittle and Pombo districts. Their energy and zeal are evident, if a tad florid.

"Yesterday, Sept. 23, 2006, a date which will live in infamy," blogged San Jose volunteer Jason Spitzer, 43, a semiconductor engineer who has made three trips into the San Joaquin Valley on behalf of McNerney. "The passionate progressive patriots of America suddenly and deliberately attacked the residential neighborhoods of the city of Manteca."

The volunteer efforts for Brown and McNerney have impressed veteran political observers.

"They see this national Democratic tsunami in which they are on the verge of taking over the House for the first time since 1994," Hoffenblum said. "The best they can do to participate is work in these two congressional districts within driving distance of the Bay Area."

Speaking at the Albatross gathering, McNerney was grateful for the help. "This is about the people taking our country back from the corporate interests — this is ground zero," McNerney said.

Brown mirrored his sentiments: "John Doolittle likes to say that I like to come to the Bay Area because I'm only interested in liberals. But I like to come to the Bay Area because you want to take this country back."

Leaders of the migrating Democrats say they are sensitive to local issues and attitudes in districts that are often hugely different from those in the Bay Area. When they go into Pombo's district, for example, they first ally themselves with local Democratic Party clubs.

"We are aware that these two candidates are not running in Berkeley," said Kim Wayne, 68, co-chair of the Progressive East Bay Democrats.

Doolittle and Pombo have characterized the Bay Area activists as carpetbaggers who want to implant liberal ideas in the largely conservative districts.

"Brown has become the ultimate chameleon candidate," Doolittle said on his campaign website. "By day, he pretends to be a conservative. By night, his true colors come out as he raises money and recruits volunteers from the most liberal activists in the Bay Area."

Pombo has played up the Bay Area liberal invasion theme in his political mailers. Doolittle is expected to make it the theme of his television ads. But the volunteers say they have met with little hostility from potential voters. Political analyst Hoffenblum says the effect of the political activists is still uncertain.

"My guess is that it is probably productive work," said Hoffenblum. "When someone comes to their door for a candidate, voters seldom ask 'Where do you live in California?' "

3 Southland Congressional Seats Safe, Despite Ethics Issues (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

The GOP lawmakers are expected to win despite questions.

Ethics scandals around the nation have rendered Republican members of Congress vulnerable and buoyed Democrats hoping to unseat them.

Except in Southern California.

Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to regain control of Congress, a prospect that political watchers say is realistic for the first time this decade.

But three Southern California Republicans with legal and ethical troubles of their own — including being named among the "most corrupt members of Congress" by the public interest group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington — are expected to coast to reelection in November.

The public-interest group is the same one that provided the FBI with e-mails it obtained of Rep. Mark Foley's correspondence with congressional pages.

Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands) is accused of earmarking hundreds of millions of taxpayer dollars for the clients of a lobbyist and close friend.

Rep. Gary Miller (R-Diamond Bar) is accused of using his position in Congress to help a business partner and campaign contributor gain access to a prime piece of public land and of sheltering millions of dollars in real estate investment gains from taxes.

Rep. Ken Calvert (R-Corona) is accused of earmarking millions of taxpayer dollars for transportation improvements near real estate developments in which he has a financial interest.

"They're not in competitive races; it's as simple as that," said Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the nonpartisan Rothenberg Political Report. "There's no buzz around town about any of them."

Though Northern California has a pair of competitive races, most of the action will again be far from the nation's most populous state — Ohio, Pennsylvania and the northeast, most notably. Because California has some of the most heavily gerrymandered electoral districts in the country, members hold almost insurmountable voter registration advantages of 15 to 20 percentage points.

"That these congressmen face no serious challenge despite the questions about their ethics highlights the problems with gerrymandered districts," said Ned Wigglesworth, a policy advocate for California Common Cause, which has unsuccessfully pushed to reform how districts are drawn in California. "Gerrymandered districts drain competition out of the electoral system and undermine the accountability which is necessary for a functioning, healthy democracy."

Even Lewis, who faces the most potential legal trouble as the target of an investigation by federal prosecutors, is on safe ground.

He is facing off against Louie Contreras, a candidate with no previous political experience who has raised less than $5,000. By contrast, Lewis, a 28-year House veteran who holds one of the most powerful positions in government as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, had $1.4 million in the bank as of June. Not that he is using it to run much of a race. Lewis has not opened a campaign office or even hired a campaign manager.

DOJ_NMG_0081148

Calvert is being challenged by Louis Vandenberg, a University of California administrator and Iraq war opponent who has run against him twice before. Campaign finance reports as of June showed his campaign had a little more than $2,500 in cash, compared with more than $260,000 for Calvert.

Miller isn't even facing a challenger.

Fla. Dems Attack Election Day Notices (AP-Y)

By Brian Skoloff, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Florida Democrats asked a state court Friday to block Election Day notices at polling places that would inform voters in Rep. Mark Foley's district that his GOP replacement on the ballot will receive his votes.

Foley had been a shoo-in for re-election before he resigned from Congress on Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually explicit instant messages he wrote to male Congressional pages.

Foley's name is still on the ballot, though, and election supervisors want voters to know that votes for Foley will be given to state Rep. Joe Negron instead.

Democrats say that would be electioneering, which is illegal under state law.

"We think the issue is very simple. What they propose to do is electioneering, and the law says electioneering is not allowed within 100 feet of a polling place. Simple as that," said Democratic Party spokesman Mark Bubriski.

Jenny Nash, a spokeswoman for the Florida secretary of state, said electioneering includes any notice or advertisement that informs voters about a specific candidate but does not necessarily ask voters to cast their ballots for that candidate.

She called the Democratic Party's motion for an emergency injunction "a reach." Democrats filed the motion in state court in Tallahassee.

The notices also would let voters know that a vote for Tim Mahoney, Negron's Democratic challenger, will count for Mahoney and a vote for unaffiliated Emmie Ross will count for Ross.

"There is plenty of support in Florida election code for both the department and the supervisors to educate voters and to provide them with necessary information," Nash said. "We feel it's a commonsense approach that in order to avoid confusion at the polls, voters should be educated to any last-minute changes to the ballot."

Negron called the Democrats' request "a desperate attempt to try to confuse voters."

"I can't imagine why anyone would oppose voters knowing how their votes will count," he said. "But you know what, voters are a lot smarter than the experts give them credit for."

Registered Republicans in the district outnumber Democrats 202,500 to 170,369, according to the latest state figures. Foley had been seeking his seventh term in Congress.

GOP's Sure Bets In Florida Now Appear In Question (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

PUNTA GORDA, Fla. — In this conservative sanctuary in Florida's 16th Congressional District, the matrons of the Peace River Federated Republican Women's Forum gathered to hear why they should cast their votes for disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley.

"A vote for Mark Foley is a vote to elect Joe Negron," explained Negron, who took over the GOP spot on the ballot when Foley resigned after explicit messages he sent to teenage male pages were made public.

The Nov. 7 ballot had already been approved and some absentee forms mailed out when Foley resigned. Florida law forbids variation in the voting materials within any district, so Foley's name had to stay.

"People are saying you can't push the button next to Mark Foley's name. But I know that you're smarter than that," Negron said.

The 45-year-old attorney's assurances that the party can hang on to the congressional seat were comforting to a staunchly Republican crowd still reeling from the scandal that put its district up for grabs for the first time in a quarter-century.

But even here in Charlotte County on Florida's west coast, where voter turnout is regularly above 70% and heavily GOP, there are fears that the Foley scandal could discourage Republicans from going to the polls.

With President Bush's slumping approval ratings, dissatisfaction with the Iraq war and the failure of the Republican-dominated Congress to tackle issues like Social Security and immigration, GOP candidates in several once-certain Florida races now appear to be in trouble.

A new squabble over the unchangeable ballot arose Friday, when the Florida Democratic Party filed a court motion to prevent "illegal electioneering" at polling places — which is how it sees district election officials' plan to post notices telling voters that they should mark their ballots for Foley if they want to vote for Negron.

"Plain and simple, posting candidates' names is considered electioneering, and electioneering within 100 feet of a polling place is illegal," said Karen Thurman, state Democratic party chairwoman. "It's not the state's job to inform voters about the Republican candidate."

Negron retorted that the appeal for an injunction was Democratic challenger Tim Mahoney's admission of weakness. "He knows that the only way he can win this race is to run against Mark Foley," Negron said.

Before Foley resigned, Republicans held 18 of Florida's 25 U.S. House seats. Political analysts believe five of those are within Democratic reach — potential pickups that could help break the Republicans' control of Congress.

"This is about a lot more than one errant person, and voters know that," Florida Democratic Party spokesman Mark Bubriski said of the bounce in support for Democrats.

Just north of here, in the 13th District put into play by U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris when she decided to challenge Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson, Democrat Christine Jennings leads Republican Vern Buchanan by 12 percentage points, according to a recent poll, despite the wealthy Buchanan's $3 million contribution from his own pocket.

Democratic State Sen. Ron Klein has been running neck-and-neck with Republican U.S. Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. for his 22nd District post. Brian Smoot, Klein's campaign manager, said he had no fresh polling data, but noted that the buzz on the stump trail along the Gold Coast of Palm Beach and Broward counties was lifting spirits.

"Certainly the man on the street, or the voter on the street, has been talking about the Foley scandal and disapproval of the handling of the war in Iraq," Smoot said, reporting a rise in campaign event turnout. The Republican leadership's failure to confront Foley before the revelations that forced his resignation "has crystallized in people's minds that this is not just a do-nothing Congress but a Congress afflicted with various scandals and more interested in political games than addressing important issues."

Democrat Phyllis Busansky's bid for the 9th District has gained strength in the last two weeks, say campaign workers, who are awaiting new poll results. The former local government leader is facing Gus Bilirakis, son of retiring U.S. Rep. Michael Bilirakis. "Anecdotally, the phones are ringing off the hook," says her campaign manager, Robert Becker.

Gus Bilirakis was quoted as telling reporters in Washington that his campaign wouldn't have a comment on the leadership's handling of the Foley affair "until after we win," a remark that voters found callous and evasive, and that had his handlers scrambling to contain the damage.

In the Orlando area's 8th District, Republican incumbent Ric Keller has been getting a spirited challenge from Democrat Charlie Stuart, although nonpartisan forecasts such as the Cook Political Report continue to rate that seat as likely Republican.

In staunch Republican territory, voters express revulsion and a sense of betrayal about Foley's behavior. But those still politically active tend to blame the man, not the party.

"The Foley thing is very upsetting to everyone, but I can't actually believe it will interfere" in voters' deliberations, says Diane D'Andrea, president of the Peace River group that brought Negron to speak here. "I don't think people will vote against Joe Negron because of what someone else did."

But negative campaigning in the closely contested races is turning off voters, she added. "You hear a lot of people saying, 'I get all this garbage in the mail, and I don't want to vote for anybody.' "

Negron brushes off the Foley specter and has taken to the stump with gusto, crisscrossing his bizarrely contoured bicoastal district — it stretches from the Gulf of Mexico to the Atlantic Ocean over migrant-tended farmland in the interior of the state — with a solidly conservative platform. In his first week on the campaign trail, he addressed business, labor and agricultural groups in each of the eight counties that constitute the district.

"Before Mark Foley's downfall, Tim Mahoney wasn't considered a credible candidate," Negron says of his opponent, insisting he will not let the Democrat "get a free ride."

Three field managers from the Republican National Congressional Committee have come from Washington to direct Negron's 11th-hour bid, and the effort has gotten $1 million in funding from federal party coffers.

Mahoney's campaign did not return phone calls, but a new TV ad released Thursday cast the Democrat as an alternative to a Republican-dominated Congress rife with corruption, incompetence and scandal.

Florida Republican Party spokesman Jeff Sadosky dismisses Democrats' claims to be drawing away disaffected Republicans and independent voters.

"Voters see this for exactly what it is: one guy with a sick problem that needs to get some help," Sadosky said. "They're not holding that against other Republican candidates."

Prominent national party figures, including President Bush, are expected to stump for Negron and other Florida GOP candidates, and Negron has been touting his close ties to Gov. Jeb Bush, who enjoys approval ratings upward of 60% — almost double those of his brother in the White House.

The Democrats also have been sending their biggest political guns south to shore up their hopefuls. Former presidential candidate Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York have all visited Florida in the past two weeks. Former President Clinton also has been raising money for Klein.

Republican voters predict the Foley fallout will subside by election day.

"We've moved past it by now," says 64-year-old Darlene Queener, a retired bank employee who moved here from Wisconsin. "For the first few days, everyone talked about it. But it's something that happened, and it's going to be taken care of and we have to get beyond it because the goal is that the Republican Party keeps that seat."

Battle Lines Drawn Along Mexico Border (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

Every night between 6,000 and 6,500 foreigners try to cross from Mexico into the US, most of them into the desert state of Arizona. Some two-thirds of them -succeed.

If J.D. Hayworth's crushing handshake is any guide, future illegal aliens can expect much stiffer resistance at the border. The Republican congressman, who represents a large suburb of Phoenix, Arizona's commercial capital, is one of the leading lights of the "enforcement first" Republicans who want to build a 1,120 km fence along the US border with Mexico. They also want to deport as many as possible of the estimated 12m illegal aliens already living in the US.

That puts the former American football player at odds with John McCain, his fellow Republican and a senator from Arizona, who is sponsoring "comprehensive reform" that would set up a temporary guest-worker programme for unskilled immigrants and stiffen policing all along the US-Mexico border.

It also puts Mr Hayworth at loggerheads with Harry Mitchell, his Democratic opponent, who polls say stands at least an odds-even chance at mid-term elections next month of ejecting the Republican from the seat he has held since 1994.

Like Mr McCain, a probable Republican contender for the 2008 presidential race, Mr Mitchell believes in providing existing "illegals" with a pathway to American citizenship once they have cleared their tax arrears. Although it is also sponsored by George W. Bush, Mr Hayworth believes that most of Arizona rejects the plan to prov-ide what he describes as an "amnesty" to illegals.

"If you have a hole in the roof and the water is flooding into your house, the first thing you do is you fix the roof," said Mr Hayworth, at his modest campaign offices off one of Phoenix's many freeways. "Once you've fixed the roof then you attend to the interior water damage."

With an unemployment rate of just 3.6 per cent – well below the national average – Arizona's interior economic damage is not easy to detect. Fuelled by a booming services sector and America's inexorable demographic shift to the south, Arizona is visibly prosperous. But if you peer behind the shiny new wallpaper you can find damp on the walls, say supporters of Mr Hayworth.

"If you look at what has happened to the wages of people in the bottom half of the economy – particularly among African-Americans – then illegal labour has a direct downward effect on incomes," said Randall Pullen, an attorney who also runs Protect Our City, a group that campaigns to deport illegal aliens from Phoenix. "Then there is the crime. Statistics show that 13 per cent of illegals who come to America have a criminal record, often for very serious crimes such as rape and murder."

But their loudest argument is that America's porous southern border undermines national security. Mr Hayworth cites recent testimony by Robert Mueller, the head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, who said that some of those caught crossing over were from Muslim countries. "There is a popular belief they are all from Mexico: not true," said Mr Hayworth. "Many of them are from Islamo-fascist countries that wish to do us harm."

Across town, at another oasis of strip malls amid Phoenix's endless desert of eight-lane freeways, Harry Mitchell is addressing a gathering of postal workers. Although the quaintly named National Association of Letter Carriers has endorsed the Democrat, one or two are sceptical of comprehensive reform. "Why aren't you proposing to penalise employers who hire illegal immigrants?" asks one. Mr Mitchell prevaricates. Then says that he is.

A grandfather who has held locally elected positions for the past 32 years, Mr Mitchell's almost teddy-bear demeanour cuts a striking contrast with his opponent. But his message is equally consistent.

"Why is my opponent only talking about immigration now in an election year?" he asks. "The Republicans have controlled the House of Representatives since 1994 and they have done nothing. Hayworth is playing politics with immigration to divert your attention from other issues, such as the collapse of ethics in Congress."

It is a charge that has some force. According to Washington's Center for Responsive Politics, Mr Hayworth is one of the largest recipients of donations from clients of Jack Abramoff, a notorious lobbyist imprisoned for fraud this year.

"I am a great believer in public service," Mr Mitchell continues. "We need to change the way business is done in Washington."

Although hardly original, Mr Mitchell's plea appears to be sincere. As does Mr Hayworth's uncompromising line on immigration. "My opponent," says Mr Mitchell, "wants to hire bond bailsmen – call them bounty hunters – to deport illegal immigrants. Is this the kind of America we want?"

The postal workers evidently like Mr Mitchell. But their applause is not emphatic.

Wolf Vs. Feder Becomes Race To Watch (WP)

By Amy Gardner, Washington Post Staff Writer

Northern Virginia's sprawling 10th District, which meanders 70 miles from McLean to the Shenandoah Valley, is nothing if not predictable. For 26 years, voters have sent Republican Frank R. Wolf of Fairfax County to represent them in Congress.

That fact alone gives Wolf, 67, an enormous advantage over his Democratic challenger this year, Judy Feder. His name recognition among voters is vast. And a quarter-century of public service has provided him with a long list of accomplishments to tout, from securing Metro funding and fighting gang violence to calling attention to atrocities in western Sudan.

But 2006 is not a year to assume that history will be a guide. The war in Iraq, high gasoline prices and the House page scandal are pushing voters away from President Bush's party -- even in a district viewed widely as Northern Virginia's most Republican. Add to that the uncertainty of seeking office in a fast-growing region where the political allegiance has shifted toward Democrats in recent elections, and the outlook for Wolf grows less bullish.

Finally, consider the challenger: Though a political newcomer, Feder is a well-funded, well-spoken public policy expert whose aggressive campaign has caused several national political analysts and Web sites to list the 10th District as a race to watch.

"Democrats have had weak candidate after weak candidate against Frank Wolf," said Virginia Commonwealth University professor Robert D. Holsworth. "She is not a weak candidate. She's been more energetic. She's done more things that you expect a quality candidate to do, such as raise money, even against a popular incumbent. It's one of those races where it's not as certain as it normally would be."

Feder, 59, is spending most of her time criticizing Bush and Republican leaders in Congress. In cable TV ads and appearances, she has reminded voters how often Wolf has voted with Bush -- for the war, for tax breaks for oil companies, for a Medicare drug program that some seniors have found confusing and expensive. A vote for Wolf, Feder says, is a vote for staying the course.

"We need change in Washington more urgently than any time I can remember in my lifetime," Feder told the Great Falls Civic Association this week.

Feder, who is on leave from her job as dean of Georgetown University's Public Policy Institute, is a tiny woman with funky glasses and short-cropped hair. She was a leading architect of President Clinton's universal health plan, which failed. At the Great Falls forum, she seized the microphone with no hesitation and looked Wolf straight in the eye as she declared the need for new leadership in Congress.

Among the changes Feder would push for are a slow withdrawal from Iraq and the removal of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, more government investment in alternative energy sources and new spending patterns for federal transportation dollars to discourage sprawl and reward smarter growth.

On traffic and sprawl, Feder is following the successful campaign strategies of recently elected Democrats, including Va. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, who have prevailed in such congestion-choked communities as Loudoun and Fairfax counties with a promise to improve roads and encourage better growth patterns.

But she is also venturing into a policy area largely controlled by local governments. Wolf supporters scoffed at a town hall meeting hosted by Feder to discuss a land-use decision in Loudoun County last month, accusing her of trying to capitalize on a polarizing issue that has nothing to do with Congress.

Wolf also cried foul when Feder accused the 13-term congressman of failing to rescue a plan to build a tunnel instead of elevated tracks through Tysons Corner as part of the rail extension to Dulles International Airport.

Wolf said he did not oppose the tunnel. But he was instrumental in persuading Kaine to kill it last month because the added cost of the tunnel could have put the project at risk of failing to meet federal "cost effectiveness" guidelines, jeopardizing hundreds of millions in federal dollars.

"If that had happened, the whole thing would have gone away," Wolf said. "We need rail. Without rail, there is no hope."

Wolf said he is not always partisan on Capitol Hill and not in lock step with Bush. He has pushed for the bipartisan commission that is studying the administration's policies in Iraq.

"There was a failure," he said. The Iraq Study Group, he added, "will get to the bottom of this and come up with new ideas."

Wolf is a friend of such anti-sprawl groups as the Piedmont Environmental Council. Like Feder, he opposes a proposal by Dominion Virginia Power, which could need federal approval, to erect a new power line through pristine countryside in six 10th District counties, including Loudoun and Prince William.

Wolf, who lives in Vienna, also has used his authority as chairman of a House Appropriations subcommittee to encourage telecommuting for employees of the departments of Justice, Commerce and State. He demanded an investigation into possible price gouging by oil companies in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, and he has voted to increase federal investment in alternative energy sources.

One of Wolf's passions has been calling attention to human rights abuses worldwide. He has traveled abroad dozens of times, to such strife-torn regions as Tibet, Congo, Sierra Leone, Rwanda, Ethiopia, Afghanistan, Iraq and Sudan. Usually mild-mannered, Wolf's slight stoop and white hair lend him a grandfatherly air (he has 12 grandchildren). But he becomes animated, pounding the table as he speaks of suffering abroad.

"I have met people, held people, women who have been raped," Wolf said, his voice trailing off. "I have one person in my office who does nothing but human rights and religious freedom" issues.

Wolf's amiable disposition, longevity and views on such issues as transit and preservation have made him popular across a broad swath of the 10th District's electorate -- including left-leaning conservationists who might otherwise oppose an ally of Bush this year.

DOJ_NMG_0081153

Cate Magennis Wyatt is such a voter. A resident of the Loudoun County village of Waterford and a former secretary of commerce and trade for Democratic governor L. Douglas Wilder, Wyatt now leads an effort to establish a National Heritage Area along a 175-mile corridor from Gettysburg to Monticello. In Congress, Wolf is the lead supporter of the project, Called the Journey Through Hallowed Ground.

"Mr. Wolf is listening to his constituents," Wyatt said. "Mr. Wolf is really leading the charge on conservation and ensuring our history is here for generations to come."

Such support could protect Wolf against the onslaught of anti-Republican sentiment sweeping the nation. The Web page CQPolitics.com recently reclassified the 10th District race from "safe Republican" to "Republican favored." And, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has called the 10th an "emerging" race.

A recent poll conducted by the independent R.T. Strategies of Alexandria puts Feder just 5 points behind Wolf. The poll's margin of error is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Feder said, "People all over the nation are desperate for change and accountability in Washington."

But Holsworth, the VCU professor, said, "It still would be a huge surprise if Frank Wolf could be beaten."

Mr. Wolf 'S Diligence (WP)

Our choice in Northern Virginia's 10th District

OVER THE YEARS we have had our disagreements with Rep. Frank R. Wolf , the Republican who has represented Northern Virginia's 10th District since 1981. But those have been outweighed by our respect for his undisputed diligence, candor, active legislative approach and passionate commitment to human rights in some of the world's darkest corners. Those qualities continue to make Mr. Wolf part of a diminishing breed in the House -- of legislators whose independent-mindedness and pragmatic problem-solving outweigh their partisanship. He deserves reelection this year against health-care expert Judy Feder, dean of Georgetown's Public Policy Institute.

In addition to his habitual attentiveness to an array of local issues in Northern Virginia -- congested roads, stressed transit systems and the rising threat of Latino gangs -- Mr. Wolf has made a particular mark in this latest congressional term by his constructive national role. It was chiefly at his prodding that Congress established a bipartisan commission on Iraq, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton, that represents the best hope at this point of forging a national consensus on how to proceed in the war. In addition, Mr. Wolf proposed a big-picture commission to tackle the fiscal and budgetary issues that Congress has so conspicuously failed to address, including entitlement spending on Social Security, Medicaid and Medicare as well as the tax code. The object would be to devise a fiscally sustainable course for the nation and present it to Congress for an up-or-down vote.

Ms. Feder is a smart, credible candidate whose broad experience and deep knowledge of health-care policy have given her a prominent role in that national debate for years; she was a senior official in the Department of Health and Human Services during the Clinton administration. She makes a reasonable case that Mr. Wolf, by some of the party-line votes he has cast, is complicit in assorted policy failures of the Bush administration, particularly its reckless tax cuts.

But if Mr. Wolf has proved anything in 26 years in Congress, it is that he is more than a party-line Republican. His repeated visits to Iraq, Darfur, Afghanistan, Chechnya and other unlovely hot spots reflect his zeal for human rights. For that he has earned respect on both sides of Capitol Hill's partisan divide and a 14th term in Congress.

With a Parade of Attractive Candidates, the Party May Benefit From the Politics of Beauty

AUBURN, N.Y. -- Maybe Democratic candidate Michael Arcuri is running strong in this Republican House district because he pledges to expand health coverage, balance the budget and raise the minimum wage.

Or maybe it's his piercing Italian eyes and runner's physique.

DOJ_NMG_0081154

"He is pretty good-looking," observed Paula Ferrin with admiration, as the 47-year-old district attorney worked the crowd at a local senior center.

"What we want is brains, honey," scolded her friend Rose Oliver.

"True," Ferrin answered, "but handsome doesn't hurt."

The research is unambiguous that Ferrin is right: Attractive politicians have an edge over not-so-attractive ones. The phenomenon is resonating especially this year. By a combination of luck and design, Democrats seem to be fielding an uncommonly high number of uncommonly good-looking candidates.

The beauty gap between the parties, some on Capitol Hill muse, could even be a factor in who controls Congress after Election Day.

Democratic operatives do not publicly say that they went out of their way this year to recruit candidates with a high hotness quotient. Privately, however, they acknowledge that, as they focused on finding the most dynamic politicians to challenge vulnerable Republicans, it did not escape their notice that some of the most attractive prospects were indeed often quite attractive.

There is a certain logic to the trend. Back in 1994, when Republicans seized power in Congress from Democrats, the GOP had a number of fresh-faced challengers who knocked off incumbents who had grown worse for wear after years of committee hearings and fundraising receptions.

This year, it is the Democrats who have several ripe opportunities to unseat Republicans, some of whom have grown gray and portly during their years in power.

To gain the 15 seats needed to recapture House control, the party is targeting about 40 GOP-leaning districts, including New York's 24th, where veteran Rep. Sherwood L. Boehlert (R) is retiring and where Arcuri is campaigning.

In most of the races, the Democratic challengers look a lot like standard-issue politicians -- not likely to impress the judges at Atlantic City. But there are others who, while they might not have movie-star looks, are certainly well above the C-SPAN median.

The list is decidedly unscientific, but it includes several whose names come up often on Capitol Hill for reasons other than their policy platforms. Among those on it, in addition to Arcuri, are Brad Ellsworth, a swaggering Indiana sheriff; businesswoman Gabrielle Giffords of Arizona, who has chiseled features and rides a motorcycle; and Heath Shuler of North Carolina, a strapping former quarterback for the Washington Redskins. In Tennessee, Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., a lean and stylish 36-year-old, has drawn admiring looks.

Republican Bob Corker, who is running against Ford, has acknowledged the disparity. "I know I'm not as good-looking," Corker said. He hopes his business experience will compensate.

The crop of eye-pleasing pols has party operatives calculating the politics of beauty. "There's a fine line, and you can't cross it," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Voters don't like men who look like pretty boys or women who resemble bimbos. "If you're too good-looking, people won't take you seriously," Emanuel said.

Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, agreed that attractive candidates often have an early advantage. But he said voters' decisions in the polling booth are rarely skin-deep, especially in a closely contested race.

"When each side is spending four or five million, people know the records, and it doesn't have the same impact," he said. He noted that Shuler's popularity has declined in recent weeks following reports that his real estate firm was late in paying taxes. "That's gone back to being a close race."

The two candidates here in this Upstate New York district have similar rÃ©sumÃ©s. Both Arcuri and his GOP opponent, state Sen. Raymond A. Meier, are lawyers. The two first crossed paths in 1985 while working on opposite sides of a local election recount. Polls showed they entered the race with roughly even name identification. They have the same Oneida County political base.

Meier's advantage is that the 24th District is home to 45,000 more registered Republicans than Democrats. But Arcuri is a popular prosecutor, the first Democrat elected to the post in 40 years. He's also tall and thin, with dark, gray-flecked hair and sharp features. Meier, who is 53, wears glasses, and his hair is brown and thinning. His look would seem to be perfectly pleasant but nondescript.

Arcuri's image is plastered all over his campaign materials, from yard signs to the trading cards that are distributed at campaign events. In his official campaign photo, he leans forward with one hand on his hip, looking suave and casual. His Web site shows him finishing a marathon.

His political friends tease him about his fashion-magazine persona, but they acknowledge that it's a valuable asset. "He's a young, good-looking guy," said Charlie Evangelista, Ontario County Democratic Committee chairman. "He's going to connect with people."

Arcuri's theory is that voters have an immediate, visceral reaction to candidates that, if powerful enough, can trump ideology or party affiliation. "How do you get around the status quo? You look for younger, energetic faces," he said. But while people may decide in an instant whether or not they are able to vote for him, he said, "then they have to know you can do the job."

He added, "I spend a lot of time assuring people I can be congressional."

His theory might be correct. An independent poll in the district released last night showed him with a 10-point lead.

Some of the academic research on beauty and voting goes back decades, to the early 1970s. In 1990, political scientist Lee Sigelman, then at the University of Arizona, posited that Democrats were losing ground nationally, despite an advantage in voter registration, because their looks were a turnoff. He rated all governors and members of Congress on an ugliness scale and found that of the 26 least attractive, 25 were Democrats.

The playing field these days is more level. Research has shown that if candidates invest a little effort in their looks, the payoff can be huge. Campaign consultants hover around candidates, ordering them to change their hairstyles, get in shape and update their wardrobes. "The bar has been raised, without question," said Sigelman, now a George Washington University political science professor.

He singled out three Maryland statewide candidates, Republican Senate nominee Michael S. Steele and gubernatorial rivals Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and Martin O'Malley (D), "as playing the image game really well." Politicians today, said Sigelman, strive for "the personality and looks of talk show hosts." The goal is to be "well turned out."

One candidate who made a high-impact adjustment is Diane Farrell. The Connecticut Democrat used to wear her blond hair pulled back tight, but after a gentle nudge from a campaign aide, she allowed it to hang loose for a more natural, relaxed look.

The looks factor can be maddening for the opposition. One writer on an anti-Shuler blog expressed annoyance at the candidate's wife, "with all her quips about how cute Shuler is. What a way to decide how to vote!!"

Perhaps not surprisingly, research has shown that voters who are easily swayed by social trends tend to favor more attractive candidates. Conversely, people who resist social trends prefer unattractive candidates.

The latest wave of research examines a possible root of political attraction: how closely candidates and voters resemble each other. A Stanford University study this year suggested that little-known candidates can increase their electoral support by as much as 20 percentage points by tweaking visual features on their campaign materials so they look slightly more like a targeted group of voters, for instance Asians or Hispanics.

The less voters know about the candidates, as in races such as the Arcuri-Meier contest with no incumbent, the more looks seem to matter. An examination of a 2001 British local election by a team of Texas Tech University and University of Plymouth researchers found that, in the absence of facts, people who are considered attractive by survey respondents are more likely to win.

The findings were presented to the American Political Science Association's 2003 annual meeting, with the caveat that they "may offend notions of democracy that candidates should compete fairly and on the basis of issues not appearance."

Politicians Try Out MySpace (WSJ)

By Erika Lovley

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

Candidates Use Social-Networking Sites to Attract Young Voters

Luther Lowe already planned to vote for Rep. Marion Berry, an Arkansas Democrat running for re-election in November. But after finding the 64-year-old congressman's profile online at MySpace and Facebook, he was impressed enough to send the candidate a $100 donation.

"He has some funny quotes and talks about himself" in the Web postings, says Mr. Lowe, a 24-year-old from Little Rock. "I felt like I could understand him on a personal basis. It played into the decision of me not only voting, but giving money, too."

Politicians across the country are discovering that a presence on social-networking sites such as MySpace isn't just a way of communicating with voters under 30, it is also a means of attracting volunteers and their donations. Howard Dean's 2004 presidential primary run underscored the Internet's untapped potential as a fund-raising tool, and political strategists say these networking sites go further by helping candidates to home in on specific audiences, beyond those who click on campaign Web sites.

Sites such as Facebook and MySpace are increasingly popular Internet destinations for young people: cyber-locales where people create their own Web pages, congregate in large numbers and communicate with friends and strangers -- and sometimes politicians. To see if someone is a registered site member, a user can type the person's name in a search bar.

Chuck Poochigian, a Republican state senator from Fresno who is running for California attorney general, joined MySpace in early August. Within two months, Mr. Poochigian reported that the number of online donations to his campaign jumped more than 50%. "It's been pretty remarkable," he says. "There is little question that the level of enthusiasm among younger voters is higher now than it otherwise would be."

Fresno resident Sevag Tateosian, 25, says it was the endorsements by both public figures and MySpace visitors he found on Mr. Poochigian's MySpace profile that convinced him to become a campaign volunteer. "It definitely pushed me over the edge to support him," says Mr. Tateosian, who helps out as a data-entry volunteer. "I was impressed to find him on MySpace. It tells you that he cares about getting his message out to a younger forum."

With almost 500 site visitors having signed up as "friends" -- many under the age of 30 -- Mr. Poochigian's profile includes a full biography, a list of "Poochigian Trivia," and a rolling slideshow from the campaign trail. In the comment forum, friends of "Pooch," as he is nicknamed, post messages of encouragement.

"I didn't know that much about Poochigian, but this page has me sold. He's got my vote," posted user Yik, a 26-year-old man from Davis, Calif.

"Hey, Chuck. Thanks for the add. I put you on my top friends list so I hope that will help get some votes for you!!!" posted Misty, 30, of Caruthers, Calif.

Successful sites take more than a list of policy positions in a flashy font and a few photos. Only 80 friends have signed up to the MySpace page of Mr. Poochigian's opponent, Oakland Mayor Jerry Brown -- who cut a youthful figure himself when he was California governor a generation ago. Mr. Brown's page carries little campaign information, save for a few campaign-trail pictures and a video commercial that slams Mr. Poochigian's conservative views. Still, Mr. Brown, a Democrat with strong name recognition, is leading in this race. His fund-raising, too, has far outstripped his rival.

In Utah, Democrat Pete Ashdown, who is running for a congressional seat, says his number of young volunteers shot through the roof after his campaign joined MySpace in March 2005.

"It's the holy grail of politics," says Mr. Ashdown. "The amount of volunteerism was absolutely minimal compared to what we are getting now."

Political scientists, too, are paying attention to the online sites as a way to plant civic awareness in the minds of young adults. "Anything that gets young people involved in politics is great," says University of Massachusetts political-science professor Ray La Raja. In teaching undergraduates, Mr. La Raja has struggled to find an approach that inspires students to become politically active. MySpace, he says, could be that venue.

"Research points out that if people get involved in politics early, they tend to become habitual participants," he says. "Even if kids only donate $5 or $10, they will feel an attachment to the campaign."

That sentiment is echoed by Kenneth A. Gross, a political lawyer with Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom in Washington and a former associate general counsel of the Federal Election Commission.

"I don't see a downside for politicians unless the solicitation is accompanied by some scandalous personal information," he says, adding that getting younger voters involved "is one of the biggest challenges facing the democratic system."

Politicians with profiles that get the most traffic, including U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland, an Ohio Democrat running for governor, know that on MySpace, it is important to do as the under-30 crowd does: make public what is personal -- and don't skimp on the trivial.

Mr. Strickland's profile says he is a Leo with a weakness for Twinkies. A video shows his guitar-playing wife, Frances, serenading him on stage during a campaign dinner.

Since the congressman's online debut in December, he has acquired an impressive 1,440 friends, and online donations are on the rise, according to campaign spokesman Keith Dailey. While not all online donations can be tracked directly to MySpace, Mr. Dailey says the links between MySpace and the campaign-donation page helps.

"We have found a great deal of interest," Mr. Dailey says. "Being on the cutting edge of Internet technologies is increasingly becoming necessary in political campaigning."

In some instances, campaign volunteers such as 24-year-old musician Zachery Allan Starkey of Columbus, Ohio, are using their candidate's page to rally support for upcoming fund-raisers and events. Mr. Starkey uses the Strickland MySpace profile page to promote a concert event, Dance Dance Democracy Party, he's producing for the candidate later this month.

The MySpace profile, he says, made it a lot easier to promote the event. "I was able to get in contact with a lot of politicians and supporters," says Mr. Starkey, who is proud of the planning he put into the show.

"In the end, I want to sit back at night and say, 'At least I did something.' "

It's Ehrlich Vs. O'Malley, Bouts I And II (WP)

Candidates To Debate Each Other Twice Today

After accusing one another of ducking debates for weeks, Maryland's leading gubernatorial candidates are preparing for a political rarity today: a doubleheader.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley are scheduled to tangle for 60 minutes this afternoon in the studios of WJZ-TV in Baltimore.

Then, five hours later and 12 miles away, the Republican incumbent and Democratic challenger plan to meet again, this time at the Maryland Public Television station in Owings Mills for another hour-long showdown.

"I can't remember this ever happening before in any race," said Mike Morrill, a longtime Democratic operative in Maryland. "Even candidates who debate a lot don't debate twice on the same day."

The back-to-back televised debates will be the first of this year's campaign for governor -- and likely the last.

For those at home interested in watching, pay close attention: The second debate will actually air first.

Tonight's encounter is set to be shown live at 7 p.m. statewide on public television and in Baltimore on WBAL-TV, the city's NBC affiliate, where NASCAR fans expecting coverage of the Nextel Cup will be in for a surprise.

The earlier contest is being taped and won't air until 7 p.m. Monday, on both statewide public television and WJZ, Baltimore's CBS affiliate.

So just how did this happen?

Both campaigns point to the other -- and a deadline put forward by Ehrlich.

Ehrlich aides said the governor welcomed the prospect of several debates with O'Malley but made clear early on that he wanted to be done by mid-October. With Ehrlich's deadline looming, aides said, the O'Malley camp dragged its feet on scheduling.

Ehrlich spokeswoman Shareese DeLeaver said it was "a desperate attempt to run out the clock for risk of exposing a record of failed leadership."

O'Malley aides, however, said Ehrlich's team has been the difficult party -- and that the mayor remains willing to debate right up until Election Day.

"This is what happens when lines are drawn in the sand, when there are self-imposed deadlines and your opposing campaign refuses to negotiate in good faith," said O'Malley spokesman Rick Abbruzzese. "That said, the mayor is looking forward to participating in both debates and sharing his positive vision for the state with the people of Maryland."

Viewers should expect to hear plenty about education, crime, health care and other key topics in both settings.

The terms of the WJZ debate were mostly settled earlier in the week. But only in recent days did the live debate on public television start coming together.

And last night, the two sides were still scrambling to reach an agreement over who would be on the panel of questioners.

Ehrlich objected to the three-member panel that included a reporter from the Baltimore Sun, a paper with whom the governor has had a rocky relationship. Ehrlich aides said the reporter had been added to the panel without their blessing.

A scramble for a replacement ensued. In the end, both sides wound up agreeing to a two-member panel.

"There were also some issues about standing up and sitting down," said Steven J. Schupak, vice president for programming at Maryland Public Television. Schupak coordinated the debate negotiations.

Some analysts suggested the bitter debate over debates reflected the overall tone of the race.

"You have a campaign with two very competitive people as candidates, and I think that seeped into this process," said Carol Hirschburg, a GOP political consultant in Maryland. "It's really kind of a game: who can get the upper hand, who can gain some sort of advantage, a psychological advantage, catching the other candidate off guard?"

Engaging in two debates in one day, analysts said, will force some novel strategic considerations by the two campaigns.

Do they, for example, save some of their better lines for the nightcap? And, in this age of image, do they change clothes between the two contests?

"Given they're going to air on different days, the one tip I would offer is to at least change your tie, and, if you have the opportunity, put on a different suit," Morrill said.

Is Chivalry Shivved? (NYT)

Washington

Hillary Clinton became a senator because men abused her. Her husband humiliated her in public and her opponent, Rick Lazio, hounded her in a debate. She was a sympathetic figure to many voters only after she went from pushy to pushed around.

So John McCain must be wary as he figures out how to push her around. He must slide in the shiv chivalrously.

This week, he managed to attack her three ways in one sentence: as a senator, as a wife and as a future opponent. This raises the question: Is it a smart move, pleasing a base that cringes at stories of these celebrity senators palling around, knocking back drinks on an overseas trip? Or is it a misstep, making Mr. McCain look like a sexist bully for pointedly blaming his fellow senator for her husband's old policies — and calling her "Mrs. Clinton" just to rub it in?

On a trip to Detroit to campaign for a Republican Senate candidate, Mr. McCain singled out Hillary for a shellacking on North Korea. "I would remind Senator Clinton and other Democrats critical of Bush administration policies that the framework agreement her husband's administration negotiated was a failure," he said.

The next morning on CBS's "The Early Show," he was asked why he would blame the Clintons for North Korea's batty behavior.

It's clear, after all, that the North Koreans are acting immaturely in response to W. acting immaturely. They want attention because the Bush administration inexplicably refuses to talk to them. And they know, in the pre-emptive world ordained by nutty Dick Cheney, that the best way to protect themselves from the fate of Saddam Hussein is to actually go nuclear, rather than merely fantasizing and boasting about it.

But the Republicans love to blame Bill Clinton for everything, from the radioactive Congressional page explosion to the radioactive North Korean explosion.

Mr. McCain told Hannah Storm that he "was responding to attacks made on President Bush by Mrs. Clinton, Senator Kerry, Senator Reid and other Democrats." Hillary advisers noted that she was called "Mrs." while the others were called "Senator."

Just as the male Republican front-runner, known for a short fuse, must be careful how he attacks the female Democratic front-runner, the former first lady must be careful how she attacks the war hero.

If she doesn't respond forcefully, she's not fit for the alpha chair in the Oval; if she responds too forcefully, the Republicans will try to paint her as an angry harridan who would nag us to death, or go all hypersensitive on us.

"It hurts her when she gets in a defensive crouch on her husband's record," a McCain adviser said.

Clearly, the missus does not think so. Billary has their 2008 war room running and finger-wagging. Just as they teamed up recently to punch back when Condi and Bush boosters accused Bill of being lax with Al Qaeda before 9/11, Hillary swiftly rebutted the charge that Bill was lax with North Korea, calling it "ridiculous."

Privately, Hillary's camp was not overly upset by the McCain swipe because it suspected he was doing the bidding of the White House and that he ended up, as one adviser put it, "looking similar to the way he did on those captive tapes from Hanoi, where he recited the names of his crew mates." Besides, Senator Clinton does like to cruise on her husband's coattails and remind Americans that the economy was exploding and the world wasn't.

Hillary's people think she's better off tying herself to les bon-temps-roulez Bill years than Mr. McCain is tying himself to the war-without-end W. years. "It's bad enough that he strapped himself to a broken Acme rocket on Iraq and the economy, now he's strapping himself on North Korea," said one. "People were enamored of his independence, but now he just seems like Bush's windup toy, the obedient corporal."

Linking to W. may become even more problematic if Republicans lose the House next month, and Democrats begin a lollapalooza of investigations into W.'s economic policies, Katrina management methods, Iraq military plan and Iraq reconstruction record.

But Hillary and her first lad have their work cut out for them in trying to take out a popular war hero, according to Mark Halperin and John Harris, authors of "The Way to Win: Taking the White House in 2008."

"Our sense right now," Mr. Halperin says, "is that McCain would beat any Democrat including Hillary Clinton, and Clinton would beat any Republican except for McCain."

U.S. Hits Obstacle In Getting A Vote On North Korea (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 13 — The United States pressed for a Saturday vote on a Security Council resolution that would impose sanctions on North Korea for its reported nuclear test, but questions from China and Russia on Friday evening cast the timing and possibly the content of the document into doubt.

The terms of the resolution had already been softened three times this week to meet objections from China and Russia, and earlier Friday there appeared to be agreement on holding a vote Saturday morning.

John R. Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations, said the new problems appeared "technical" rather than "substantial," but said they would require another conference of Japan and the five permanent Council members, Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States, Saturday before the full 15-member panel met later in the day.

While the wording of the resolution was still being worked out, American intelligence officials said on Friday evening that they had found radioactive material in air samples taken over the region, providing more evidence that North Korea did indeed detonate a nuclear bomb. [Page A7.]

The new draft resolution dropped or softened several provisions to placate China and Russia. It eliminated explicit mention of military enforcement of the sanctions; placed more limits on the kinds of cargo that could be inspected going in and out of North Korea; and dropped a blanket embargo on conventional weapons.

Mr. Bolton indicated that one area of dispute remained the methods and legalities of how to inspect cargo. The new draft resolution limits the weapons ban to large-size arms, military systems and unconventional weapons.

The measure, drafted by the United States, still requires all countries to prevent the sale or transfer of material related to North Korea's nuclear, ballistic missile and unconventional weapons programs, and maintains a ban on travel by persons associated with those programs.

It also bars North Korea from exporting such weapons, a provision aimed at the international concern over the possibility of unconventional arms from North Korea ending up with terrorist groups or rogue states.

Kenzo Oshima, the Japanese ambassador to the United Nations and president of the Security Council, announced the Council would gather at noon, but could not say whether there would be a vote.

"An overwhelming majority of the Council members want to vote as soon as possible," Mr. Bolton said. "They still think it is important to send a swift and strong signal, and I'm confident we're going to be able to do that."

Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador, said, "It all depends on the final text, because we are not at the final text yet."

The United States and Japan, the driving forces behind the resolution, had earlier thought they had surmounted the Chinese and Russian objections to the resolution when they submitted a revision Thursday night that softened some of the earlier provisions.

Mr. Bolton said the United States was "very satisfied" with the document as it stood Friday morning and was prepared to vote for it immediately.

But Mr. Wang, while asserting his country was happy with the progress that had been made, said his country was still studying the text before officially pronouncing on it. "With progress we are always satisfied, but if we work harder, we might make more progress," he said.

Vitaly I. Churkin, the Russian ambassador, said, "I think we are on the right track, but we are not there yet."

In Washington, officials, apparently confident of the imminent passage of the measure, announced that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would travel to Asia next week to discuss how to implement the resolution, as well as to discuss other efforts to deter North Korean proliferation of a nuclear bomb or bomb-making materials. Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said Ms. Rice would travel to Tokyo, Seoul and Beijing.

The trip, he said, is "an opportunity for her in the region to reaffirm and talk about the strength of our existing alliances there, and also to have a bit more of a wider conversation with others in the region about the current situation, about the security situation, and also to talk broadly about nonproliferation efforts."

Senior State Department officials portrayed the United Nations momentum toward a resolution as evidence of a united, multilateral front agreeing to punish North Korea.

"So the first issue we need to do is to make clear that the sense of outrage and condemnation by the international community to have a resolution in the Security Council, which will not only be a resolution condemning North Korea, but actually a resolution with some teeth to it," said Christopher Hill, the assistant secretary of state for east Asian and Pacific affairs.

"North Korea needs to understand that this is indeed a very, very costly decision that will leave North Korea far worse off and far more isolated than ever before," said Mr. Hill, speaking at a conference in Washington. "We need to give that message very clearly and make sure that North Korea cannot find any differences in our views. So I think so far, so good."

The resolution condemns the test on Oct. 9 as a "flagrant disregard" of Security Council warnings, orders it not to conduct nuclear or missile tests, and urges the North to return to six-nation talks with South Korea, China, Japan, Russia and the United States.

It freezes funds overseas of people or businesses connected to the unconventional weapons programs and bans the sale of luxury goods to North Korea.

"I think the North Korean population has been losing height and weight over the years," Mr. Bolton said. "Maybe this will be a little diet for Kim Jong-il," he said, referring to the North Korean dictator.

Under the resolution, member states are to report to the Security Council within 30 days on steps they have taken to comply with the its demands.

The resolution still invokes Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which makes mandatory economic and diplomatic sanctions. China and Russia customarily resist the Chapter VII provision on the grounds that it sets a pretext for the use of military force, as many countries believe it did in Iraq.

But in a formulation used in July to obtain a unanimous vote on the resolution condemning the North Korean missile launches, the text added a reference to Article 41 of the chapter, which permits only "means not involving the use of military force."

In another change designed to gain Chinese and Russian support, the resolution now says the inspection process will be "cooperative" with local authorities. Both countries were sensitive to such interdiction being done near their coasts and borders, but Mr. Bolton said that though the inspections covered air, sea and land shipments, he expected most actions would be performed in port.

As for the agreement struck to limit the arms embargo to specific weapons like missiles, tanks, attack helicopters, artillery systems, warships and combat aircraft, Mr. Bolton said, "That would place under embargo the most dangerous, most sophisticated, most lethal weapons, so that's a substantial step forward, and, as I say, we're happy to accept that as a compromise."

Concerns Include Possible Seizure of Ships

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 13 -- The United States and Japan pushed for a Saturday vote on a Security Council resolution that would condemn North Korea's reported nuclear test and impose an embargo on the communist government's trade in weapons of mass destruction, ballistic missiles, most conventional heavy weapons and luxury goods.

But Russia raised new concerns that the resolution fails to adequately define what weapons-related goods would be covered by the embargo. And China, backed by Russia, insisted that the United States include greater assurances that the resolution could not be used to justify the armed seizure of North Korean ships traveling in international waters.

The Security Council's five permanent members -- the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France -- and Japan said they would continue negotiations Saturday morning and convene a meeting of the 15-nation council at noon.

The impasse came several hours after John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, announced that the resolution enjoyed the "unanimous agreement" of the council's key powers. "I'm still ready to go for a vote. We'll just have to see what the instructions are, particularly from Moscow and China," he said Friday evening.

The U.S.-backed draft text urges states to enforce the embargo by inspecting cargo entering or leaving North Korea. It would also ban travel and freeze the bank accounts of North Korean officials linked to the country's most lethal weapons programs.

To secure Chinese and Russian support for the resolution, the United States, Japan and their European allies have already agreed to include explicit assurances that the resolution could not be used as a pretext for military action. They also dropped other strong measures, including a U.S. proposal to give Pyongyang a 30-day deadline to suspend its nuclear activities or face additional penalties. Japan withdrew a series of controversial proposals to ban all North Korean exports and to prohibit North Korean aircraft and vessels from arriving in foreign ports.

But Bolton said that Russia raised concerns late Friday about four new problems with the text. The most important, according to Bolton, involved the "question of how we will define nuclear, biological and chemical and weapon-related materials and ballistic missile components."

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, said Friday morning that many of the chief obstacles to an agreement had been cleared but that the council would "bridge a few final points" where some minor differences remained. But Wang told reporters that Chinese officials had discovered other problems in the text.

China's chief concern involves a provision calling for international inspections of North Korean cargo. China expressed concern that some states could invoke the provision to justify the seizure of North Korean ships in international waters, an act that Wang insists would be a violation of international law.

Bolton countered that there are existing international and national laws "that allow the boarding of ships in international waters." He said that those laws provide the authority for the U.S.-sponsored Proliferation Security Initiative, an agreement among 16 states to coordinate interdiction operations on the high seas. Bolton described the resolution as "a kind of codification" of the Proliferation Security Initiative and said that there is nothing new or different in the current resolution on North Korea.

Bolton also differed with Wang over the importance of a ban on luxury goods, which he said had been crafted to prevent North Korea's rulers, primarily the leader, Kim Jong Il, from spending lavishly on expensive foreign goods. "I think, you know, the North Korean population's been losing average height and weight over the years, and maybe this'll be a little diet for Kim Jong Il."

Wang said that a ban on luxury goods was unnecessary and too vague. "I don't know what luxury good means, because luxury goods can mean many things for different people," Wang told reporters.

U.S. officials believe it is essential to pass the resolution this weekend, before Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice embarks next week on a trip to Japan, South Korea and China. Rice plans to meet with senior officials on implementing the provisions, including restricting North Korea's arms trade, the State Department announced.

"We'll be looking for ways to increase our cooperation with other countries and to make it clear to North Korea that it's going to have to figure out another way to earn its living besides this type of activity," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill said yesterday at the National Press Club.

Kessler reported from Washington.

The Search For Pyongyang's Pressure Point (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

As the countries of the United Nations wrangle over the sanctions to be imposed on North Korea following its nuclear test this week, doubts are being cast on the effectiveness of whatever measures are agreed.

With China and South Korea fearing the collapse of their volatile neighbour, and with a large proportion of North Korea's income coming from illegal trade, even targeted sanctions would have a limited impact. The regime has already survived the death of its founder and a famine that killed up to 10 per cent of its population.

Rüdiger Frank, a North Korean economy specialist at the University of Vienna, said: "I don't think there is any more room for more sanctions from the usual suspects. To be effective, China and South Korea have to join.

"But a nuclear North Korea is even more risky in case of collapse than just a humanitarian catastrophe, so why would they increase the chance of a collapse."

North Korea says its missile launches in July and the nuclear test were "self-defence" in response to US financial sanctions imposed in September last year to curb alleged counterfeiting and money laundering.

Now the US, Europe and Japan are all calling for a tough UN resolution and authorisation for countries to interdict shipments to and from North Korea, both of which China is opposing.

The dispute over the extent of sanctions reflects differences over the purposes of the measure. While the US and perhaps Japan are eyeing regime change, China and South Korea would be happy with a change in behaviour.

Marcus Noland, of Washington's Institute for International Economics, said economic sanctions were seldom effective in changing behaviour.

"If the sanctions were going to have any shot at working they would have to be comprehensive sanctions, as suggested by Japan," he said. "That package was big enough to potentially have an impact and it also had the benefit of simplicity, but they would also imply a significant degree of hardship for ordinary people."

But the suggested targeted sanctions were too weak to be effective and because of their complexity, they almost invited circumvention, Mr Noland said.

"Weak sanctions may be counterproductive because President Bush and President Roh [of South Korea] warn that they will not tolerate a nuclear test but they are not imposing the penalties or incentives to back it up. That might tempt North Korea to push the envelope even further," he said.

Much of the crisis can be traced back to North Korea's dire economic situation. The differences between the North and South Korean economies could not be more stark. The mineral-rich north had always been the industrial heartland and the more fertile South was traditionally the rice bowl.

Indeed, the South's gross domestic product did not overtake the North's until the early 1970s but now at $700bn (£377bn, €558bn), it is about 40 times larger than that of the North's.

Economic reforms that Pyongyang begrudgingly introduced in 2002, which liberalised prices and wages, have led to some changes in North Korea's decrepit economy and trade has grown exponentially.

The South's Korea Trade Investment Promotion Agency estimates the value of North Korea's legal foreign trade crossed the $3bn mark last year, the highest since the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991, with trade with China comprising more than half of the total.

But it is North Korea's sizeable illegal trade that will further dilute any economic sanctions. Analysts suggest North Korea earns about one-third of its revenues from aid, one-third from conventional exports and the remainder from criminal activities.

Crime is such a fundamental part of North Korea's economy that David Asher, co-ordinator of the US State Department's North Korea working group from 2003 to 2005, calls the country the "Soprano state".

"North Korea is perhaps the only country in the world whose embassies and overseas personnel are ex-pected to contribute income to the 'Party Centre', not rely on central government funds for their operations," said Mr Asher in a speech at the Wilson Centre last November.

Several North Korean diplomats have been caught carrying narcotics through eastern European countries in recent years. In 2004, a North Korean ship carrying $150m worth of heroin was seized in Australia.

Pyongyang has also been producing and distributing counterfeit US dollars, cigarettes and pharmaceuticals, especially the erectile dysfunction drugs Viagra and Cialis.

Counterfeit cigarettes are said to depart regularly from the North Korean ports of Rajin and Nampo for shipment through China and South Korea to the rest of the world, and tobacco companies have identified factories producing counterfeit cigarettes in North Korea.

But the international community is now most concerned about the prospect of North Korea trading missile and weapons of mass destruction technology, a concern that is only likely to be heightened with sanctions.

Jon Wolfsthal, of the Centre for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said: "North Korea is probably going to want to hold on to their precious weapons technology. But if the US squeezes them, that increases the risk that they might sell weapons to ensure their survival."

Vote On N. Korea Faces Last Hurdles (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

China and Russia have lingering concerns about sanctions sought today at the U.N.

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council plans to vote today on a resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea for its declared nuclear test after a last-minute session to address Chinese and Russian concerns over how to implement them.

Tests showing radiation in gases near North Korea dispelled most doubts that the nation had exploded a nuclear device, which had arisen after earlier sampling did not detect any nuclear particles in the air, a U.S. government official said.

The resolution calls for a ban on goods related to North Korea's missile and nuclear programs and a freeze on financial activities that support them, as well as a travel ban for senior North Korean officials. It also would put an embargo on heavy conventional weapons and luxury goods. A draft introduced late Thursday included a provision, requested by China and Russia, that made clear that the resolution would not allow military enforcement without another resolution.

But China has balked at a measure that would allow the inspection and seizure of suspected nuclear and missile materials going in and out of North Korea, arguing that it could provoke confrontation, interfere with commerce and allow intrusive activity too close to its borders.

The measure is based on the 2003 U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, or PSI, involving a group of 16 core countries that have agreed to take steps to stop the flow of weapons of mass destruction, including boarding ships for aggressive inspections. Russia is a member of the core group, and more than 80 other nations have signed on.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton, one of the architects of the initiative, said that including such a measure in the North Korea resolution would oblige nations to help with cargo inspections at air and sea ports and border crossings, and that it was consistent with international law. "I see that as a natural evolution," Bolton said.

China, however, said it could not agree to the inspections. "Politically, China will not do it," said the nation's ambassador, Wang Guangya. "I believe that the exercises under PSI will easily lead, whether it is intentional or not, to … escalations of provocations."

Russia called a special session Friday afternoon to discuss objections to the implementation of the sanctions as outlined in the draft.

"We are not there yet," Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said about hopes for the entire Security Council voting in favor of the resolution. "It will be unanimous if and when, when and if, we vote unanimously on this resolution."

The council plans to vote this afternoon after meetings to finalize proposed changes.

"I'm still ready to go for a vote," Bolton said Friday night. "We'll just have to see what instructions are overnight from Russia and China." The two countries, neighbors and major trade partners of North Korea, are considered crucial to the implementation of the tough new sanctions.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice set plans to visit China, South Korea and Japan next week to discuss vigorous enforcement of the proposed sanctions, and to try to show a common front with allies, officials said.

Sean McCormack, the chief State Department spokesman, told reporters that Rice would be talking "about how to actually go about implementing the resolution." Experts have said that the importance of the new resolution will depend largely on how strictly it is enforced.

Rice also plans to talk to leaders more broadly about regional security issues and nonproliferation efforts, McCormack said.

Christopher Hill, U.S. assistant secretary of State for East Asia, said Rice would urge other countries to stringently apply the sanctions.

"A key part of her trip will be to make sure that the resolution, when passed, will really have teeth to it, and will really function properly," Hill said at an event sponsored by Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs and Foreign Policy magazine. "We need to make sure that we have devised something that works" against North Korea, he said.

Meanwhile, tests of air samples collected near North Korea have confirmed the small-magnitude blast Monday was a nuclear explosion, the U.S. government official said.

Results of initial tests, released early Friday, found no evidence of radioactivity in air particles. But subsequent tests on gases collected by a WC-135 "sniffer plane" were positive for radiation, indicating an atomic explosion, the U.S. official said.

The samples were tested at the Air Force Technical Applications Center at Patrick Air Force Base in Florida.

U.S. Finding Indicates Nuclear Test (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Betsy Pisik, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

U.S. intelligence agencies have detected radioactive particles in air samples collected near North Korea's nuclear testing facility, leading analysts to conclude that the blast detected Monday was a nuclear explosion, Bush administration officials said last night.

Meanwhile, at U.N. headquarters in New York, the United States, China and Russia agreed yesterday on sanctions against North Korea for its claimed nuclear test, with Washington backing away from its tough demands of inspections at sea to assuage fears by Beijing and Moscow of a U.S. naval buildup in East Asia.

Diplomats said they expected a vote by the 15-nation U.N. Security Council as early as today.

Washington agreed to accept language ruling out a military response to win backing from China and Russia, which have vetoes in the council.

But differences remained over how far the United Nations could go in authorizing searches of North Korean ships.

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador at the United Nations who had pressed for a "swift and strong" response to Monday's reported nuclear test, said he was pleased with the latest draft.

"I hope that we will have a vote -- expect to have a vote by the 14th of October, five days [after the test]," Mr. Bolton said. "So that is, I think, a sign of the determination of the council in the face of this threat to move quickly."

The detected radioactive particles were picked up by sensors aboard aircraft flying off the coast of North Korea around the time the Oct. 9 blast was detected by seismic sensors northwest of the town of Kilchu.

Processing of the data collected by the WC-135 aircraft, called "sniffers" because of the chemical sensors that can detect particles of radioactive material, has been under way for the past five days.

Analysis of data by a laboratory in Florida is the first indication that nuclear particles were found after the test.

The finding of such particles is significant because it supports other evidence by U.S. intelligence agencies of a test and will likely lead to a more definitive conclusion that the explosion produced a nuclear yield.

One senior intelligence official said the sensor data indicating nuclear particles supports the main theory of intelligence analysts that the underground test was a plutonium device that did not fully detonate.

The blast detected by sensors created a shock wave equivalent to a magnitude 4.2 earthquake and nuclear specialists estimated that the blast was 0.2 kilotons, or the equivalent of 200 tons of TNT.

That size is far smaller than the 4 kilotons that North Korean officials told China prior to the test would be the size of the demonstration shot.

A defense official said it is almost impossible for an underground nuclear test not to produce some venting of radioactive particles because the particles escape through the ground or through the opening of the tunnel.

The U.N. draft document to impose sanctions on North Korea expresses "profound concern that the test claimed by [North Korea] had generated increased tension in the region and beyond, and [determined] therefore that there is a clear threat to international peace and security."

There were conflicting reports yesterday whether radiation had been detected at the test site. But the relatively small size of the explosion indicated that the blast had failed to set off a nuclear chain reaction.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice prepared to head to China, Japan and South Korea early next week to discuss steps to implement the U.N. resolution.

The latest draft:

•Prohibits the transfer of material or technology to Pyongyang that can be used in nuclear, ballistic missile or other weapons of mass destruction-related programs.

•Prohibits sales or transfers of heavy conventional weapons such as tanks, warships and combat aircraft to North Korea.

•Allows travel bans on people involved in North Korean weapons programs and their families.

•Demands Pyongyang immediately return without condition to the six-nation talks about energy and security concerns, and rejoin international nonproliferation agreements.

•Bans sales of luxury goods, such as cognac and gourmet food, to the North.

"The North Korean population's been losing average height and weight over the years, and maybe this will be a little diet for Kim Jong-il," Mr. Bolton said.

He was referring to the North Korean leader, who is said to import vast quantities of lobster, caviar, fine wines and expensive cuts of sushi for himself, his family and close associates.

The sanctions were carefully tailored not to impose additional hardship on North Korea's impoverished population, most of whom are dependent on rations from international donors.

The document also emphasizes regional cooperation, in part to satisfy Chinese fears of a greater U.S. military presence in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0081166

North Korea is likely to take a higher profile at the United Nations, now that it claims to have conducted a nuclear test and is threatening additional testing.

South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, unanimously selected yesterday by the U.N. General Assembly to be the next secretary-general of the world body, has pledged to work for peace and stability in Asia.

Mr. Ban told reporters yesterday evening that he would stress improved communications between nations and North Korea.

"Diplomacy is very important," he said. "Even during military conflicts there needs to be room for dialogue. I have always been saying that we need to take a two-pronged approach. Sometimes we take a stern and strong position, but there is room for dialogue, it is absolutely necessary."

One of the resolution's most ambitious planks is to create an international inspection regime that could, in theory, allow authorities to board ships, planes and trucks going into or out of North Korea.

North Korean neighbors Russia and China sought last-minute changes in the inspection regime, fearing that it would increase the presence of U.S. warships in the region.

The five veto-wielding council members -- the United States, Britain, China, France and Russia -- met late yesterday with Japan, which holds the council presidency this month.

Wang Guangya, China's U.N. ambassador, said negotiations would continue today.

The inspection proposal is modeled on the 2003 Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI).

The United States and 65 other nations have voluntarily agreed to inspections under the PSI, in which members agree to share intelligence and resources to contain weapons of mass destruction. North Korea is not a member.

The U.S. and Bahrain yesterday announced they would practice interdicting nuclear material and equipment at sea on Oct. 31, in the Persian Gulf, off the coast of Iran.

Kuwait, France and Britain are also expected to participate.

U.S., Japan Seek N. Korea Sanctions Vote (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

The U.S. and Japan said they want a vote Saturday by the U.N. Security Council on a resolution imposing punishing sanctions on North Korea for its claimed nuclear test and demanding the elimination of all its nuclear weapons. But last-minute changes sought by Russia and China could delay a vote.

The five permanent council members — the U.S., Russia, China, Britain and France — and Japan were to meet Saturday morning before the full 15-member council convenes to discuss the changes.

"I'm still ready to go for a vote, and we'll just have to see what the instructions are overnight, in particular from Moscow and China," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said late Friday, adding the changes were essentially technical in nature.

He said a vote could still be possible on Saturday.

In an effort by the U.S. and its allies to compromise, the latest draft expressly rules out military action against North Korea, a demand by the Russians and Chinese. The Americans also eliminated a complete ban on the sale of conventional weapons; instead, the draft limits the embargo to major hardware such as tanks, warships, combat aircraft and missiles.

But the resolution would still ban the import or export of material and equipment that could be used to make nuclear weapons or ballistic missiles, and would authorize all countries to inspect cargo leaving and arriving in North Korea to prevent any illegal trafficking.

The accord came as U.S. officials said Friday that an air sampling taken after North Korea's claimed nuclear test detected radioactive debris consistent with an atomic explosion. However, the Bush administration and congressional officials said no final determination had been made about the nature of last weekend's mystery-shrouded blast.

The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information.

Results from another test disclosed Friday — an initial air sampling on Tuesday — showed no evidence of radioactive particles that would be expected from a successful nuclear detonation, a U.S. government intelligence official said.

DOJ_NMG_0081167

Meanwhile, North Korean ships loaded their final cargo of secondhand bicycles and household appliances in the Japanese port city of Sakaiminato after Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's Cabinet agreed to ban trade with the communist state. The unilateral Japanese sanctions also include a six-month ban on travel to Japan by all North Korean government officials.

The U.S. and other nations trying to persuade the North to give up its atomic program continued a flurry of high-level diplomatic visits. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice planned a trip next week to Asia; Russia sent an envoy to Pyongyang; and the presidents of China and South Korea — the North's main sources of trade and aid — met in Beijing to discuss the proposed resolution.

Bolton said earlier Friday that the council's agreement just five days after North Korea's announcement it had detonated a nuclear device was "a sign of the determination of the council in the face of this threat to move quickly."

The U.S.-sponsored draft would declare that Monday's test claimed by North Korea had increased tension in northeast Asia, creating "a clear threat to international peace and security." It would condemn the claimed test in "flagrant disregard" of the council's appeal not to detonate a nuclear device, demand that North Korea not conduct any further test or launch any more ballistic missiles, and authorize a range of economic and diplomatic sanctions.

The draft would also freeze the financial assets of — and impose a travel ban on — individuals and entities with any connection to North Korea's weapons or missile programs. It would also ban countries from selling luxury goods to North Korea.

Asked why, Bolton said, "I think the North Korean population has been losing average height and weight over the years and maybe this will be a little diet for Kim Jong Il," North Korea's leader.

Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya, asked earlier whether Beijing was prepared to go along with the ban, said: "I don't know what luxury goods means, because luxury goods can mean many things for different people ... if they don't have it."

The latest draft resolution still invokes Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which the U.S. views as a necessary enforcement tool because it makes economic and diplomatic sanctions mandatory.

China and Russia normally object to the Chapter 7 provision because it carries the possibility of military enforcement. The Bush administration used the same provision to justify its invasion of Iraq, and Moscow and Beijing worry the U.S. might do the same eventually with North Korea — even though President Bush has said the U.S. has no plans to attack.

But in a compromise also used in July to reach a unanimous vote on a resolution condemning North Korean missile launches, the text added mention of Article 41 of the chapter, which permits only "means not involving the use of military force."

In another key change to gain Chinese and Russian support, the resolution now says the inspection process — which covers shipments by land, air and sea — will be "cooperative" with local authorities. Both China and Russia share borders with North Korea and are uncomfortable with the possibility of the U.S. inderdicting ships near their coasts. At any rate, Bolton said he expected most actions would be performed at ports.

South Korea's Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, who has been a key figure in dealings with North Korea, told reporters soon after the General Assembly voted by acclamation to appoint him the next U.N. secretary-general that he hopes the Security Council will be able to adopt the resolution Saturday and send "a very strong and clear message" to Pyongyang.

The resolution would rely on all countries to implement the sanctions, but it would create a sanctions committee comprising all 15 Security Council nations to monitor implementation and report any violations to the council for possible further action.

Rice's trip to China, South Korea and Japan is the next step in the U.S. diplomatic offensive at the United Nations and with Pyongyang's neighbors. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said "she's going to be talking about the passage of that resolution certainly, but really what comes after."

The trip is meant to present a unified front to North Korea, which will be looking for any cracks in the diplomatic coalition behind the U.N. statement. Coming less than a month before midterm congressional elections, Rice's trip is also an opportunity for the Bush administration to highlight its work countering dangerous regimes and terror threats.

The council's moves coincided with a Russian news agency report that North Korea favors the implementation of a year-old agreement to abandon its nuclear programs in exchange for aid and security guarantees. The ITAR-Tass news agency quoted Russia's Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Alexeyev speaking after consultations in Pyongyang.

The report apparently referred to an agreement reached in September 2005 at six-nation talks involving the two Koreas, the U.S., China, Russia and Japan. Pyongyang has boycotted the talks for the past 13 months to protest financial measures imposed by Washington for alleged counterfeiting and money-laundering.

If the Russian report is confirmed, it could signify a major breakthrough in efforts to curb North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

UN Sets Vote On North Korea As Russia Seeks Changes (Update8) (BLOOM)

By Todd Zeranski

Bloomberg, October 14, 2006

Oct. 13 (Bloomberg) -- The United Nations Security Council scheduled a vote tomorrow on a draft resolution sanctioning North Korea for a suspected nuclear-bomb test as the U.S. attempted late today to iron out differences with Russia on specific penalties.

The Russian government expressed reservations about a list of banned items that could be used in developing nuclear, biological and chemical weapons, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told reporters at the UN. He said the changes Russia sought weren't ``substantial'' and he hoped the vote would go forward.

The U.S. and Japan are trying to win international backing for penalties against the North Korean government of dictator Kim Jong Il to curtail nuclear-weapons development. South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon, who was elected the next secretary-general of the UN today, urged the Security Council to ``send out a very strong, unified and clear message'' to North Korea that would thwart further tests.

The new schedule is for the five veto-wielding members of the Security Council -- Russia, China, the U.S., France and the U.K. -- plus Japan to meet at 10 a.m. after receiving instructions from their capitals, Bolton said. Japan would preside over a full council meeting at noon.

``We do have unanimous agreement'' on the main text of the resolution, Bolton said earlier in the day. North Korea announced Oct. 8 that it had it carried out its first nuclear test, drawing condemnation from around the world. The UN Security Council began emergency consultations the next day.

Concession to China

In a concession to China, the U.S. dropped explicit reference to a part of the UN Charter that would make sanctions militarily enforceable, changing it to Article 41 of Chapter 7, which only authorizes diplomatic and economic sanctions. Agreement on a draft Security Council resolution circulated by the U.S. on North Korea sanctions had been held up because of opposition from China and Russia.

``Realistically there was no military option for the United States, anyway,'' said Derek Mitchell, a special assistant for Asia-Pacific affairs for the secretary of defense during the Clinton administration. ``The important thing is to get a unanimous resolution to demonstrate unity to the North Koreans. That speaks to why the administration is flexible at this point.''

Warships, Tanks

The resolution would bar the sale or transfer of missiles, warships, tanks, attack helicopters and combat aircraft, as well as missile- and nuclear-related goods to the North Korean government. So-called ``luxury goods'' would also be banned, though there hasn't been any specific mention of which items would fall into this category.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Beijing, Seoul and Tokyo Oct. 17-22 to talk about the resolution and ``how to go about actually implementing that resolution,'' State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters today in Washington.

``Such a resolution doesn't meet everything that the Bush administration wanted'' said Adam Ward, an Asia analyst who is in charge of the Washington office of the International Institute for Strategic Studies, a London-based policy study group. ``On the other hand, the administration takes the view that at least now the process is under way, and that there will be follow-on action in the Security Council if the demands of the international community are not met.''

Japanese Sanctions

Japanese Ambassador Kenzo Oshima predicted the measure would be ``very effective." Japan today implements national measures against North Korea in ``three key areas: import ban, ban on ships and a travel ban," he said.

``We felt it very necessary to have some extra measures, a measure to reflect the strong feelings of the government and people of Japan in respect to the nuclear test."

A group similar to the U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, which shares intelligence to combat the spread of weapons of mass destruction, would carry out inspections in seaports, airports and other transit points of cargo headed to or from North Korea, though Bolton said inspections could also take place at sea.

Ships at Sea

The Security Council may still be discussing whether the resolution should allow inspections of ships at sea, an issue on which China disagrees with the U.S., to make sure North Korea isn't sharing nuclear technology with other countries or terrorist groups, Mitchell said.

``The Chinese worry North Korea would see that as an act of war," Mitchell, who is currently a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said.

The resolution demands that North Korea return to the so- called six-party talks, aimed at disarming its weapons program, and eliminate its nuclear and missile programs. Unidentified North Korean officials associated with missile- and nuclear weapons-programs would face a ban on travel.

North Korea is prepared to implement a year-old accord that involves abandoning its nuclear plans in exchange for aid and security guarantees, the Associated Press reported, citing a Russian envoy quoted by the ITAR-Tass news agency. No further details were immediately available.

At the White House, spokesman Tony Snow told reporters that he had seen and couldn't confirm reports that North Korea may be ready for nuclear talks.

``All they have to do is say they're going to return to the six-party talks, and that they're going to put an end to their nuclear program and a lot of good things will happen," Snow said. ``Keep in mind the North Koreans are not above a little gamesmanship a few hours before the United Nations is getting ready to vote on a resolution."

Air Sample

Initial results of an air sample collected Oct. 10 to verify North Korea's claim that it conducted a nuclear test show no signs of radioactive particles, a U.S. intelligence official said. A final analysis of the sample will be completed later today or tomorrow, said the official, who requested anonymity.

The results don't definitively cast doubt on North Korea's assertion that it conducted an underground nuclear test because the bomb's fumes may have been contained initially, the official said. Still, it's difficult to keep some the fumes from eventually venting into the atmosphere, the official said.

White House spokesman Snow earlier today told reporters ``there may not be" a definitive conclusion to questions about the North Korean test.

Preliminary Samples Hint At North Korean Nuclear Test (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

WASHINGTON, Oct. 13 — With the United Nations preparing to vote on whether to impose harsh sanctions on North Korea, American intelligence officials said on Friday evening they had found new evidence that the country detonated a nuclear bomb deep inside a mountain in its desolate northern territory.

An analysis of air samples taken in the region on Wednesday found radioactive material that is “consistent with a North Korean nuclear test,” according to a document sent to lawmakers on Capitol Hill on Friday by the office of John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence.

But a senior intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said that the results were still preliminary and that final analysis of the data would not be completed for several days.

The document was provided to The New York Times on Friday evening.

One day after the blast, the Pentagon dispatched Air Force planes with special radiation detectors into international airspace near North Korea. The official did not say whether the planes had collected the radioactive sample.

One question that remains is whether the explosion that North Korean leaders announced with great fanfare might actually have been a failure or merely a partial success.

Both intelligence officials and independent scientists have said that the detonation was a "sub-kiloton" blast — an explosion far smaller than typical nuclear tests by novice bomb designers. One widely held theory is that the nuclear blast was less powerful than the North Koreans had hoped it would be.

Earlier this week, American officials said the North Koreans had notified the Chinese government that the nuclear test would be in the range of four kilotons.

"Based in very incomplete information, it smells to me like a fizzle," said Sidney Drell, a theoretical physicist and arms control expert at The Hoover Institution at Stanford University.

Given the comparatively small size of the blast, American officials said, it is possible that only a small amount of radioactive material leaked from the subterranean test site.

Because the test was conducted by one of the world's most closed societies, the Pentagon and intelligence agencies have had to construct complicated computer models to try to prove North Korean claims of a nuclear test. They used the models to calculate the times that the Air Force's WC-135 "Constant Phoenix" aircraft would have the best chance to collect samples of radiation from the explosion.

Military officials said earlier in the week that the ability to detect any radiation would depend partly on the uncertainties of nature because the prevailing winds would have to blow east toward the military aircraft patrols.

Professor Drell also said that any radiation leakage would depend on the geology of the test site. The explosion could have blasted new holes in rock formations that would allow radioactive material to seep into the air. But the blast could also have sealed off subterranean passages and reduced the chances for leakage.

"We're in the process now of going through, looking through all the data and all the facts to try to come up with the best possible explanation for what, exactly, happened there," said Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman.

"We don't know yet."

U.S. Detects Signs Of Radiation Consistent With Test (WP)

By Dafna Linzer And Walter Pincus, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Initial environmental samples collected by a U.S. military aircraft detected signs of radiation over the Sea of Japan, possibly confirming North Korea's nuclear test, intelligence officials said yesterday.

Officials said the positive radiation result was consistent with an atomic test and would make it possible to rule out the possibility that Monday's test had been conducted with conventional explosives alone. But intelligence and administration officials were cautious about reaching a conclusion before reviewing all incoming data. "The intelligence community continues to analyze the data," said Frederick Jones, spokesman for the National Security Council. "When the intelligence community has a determination to present, we will make that public."

Earlier detection attempts by the United States, China and South Korea did not pick up any radiation. An intelligence official said additional samples are being collected, and analysts are also taking a harder look at seismic data, satellite photos and communications intercepts.

North Korea, according to U.S. intelligence estimates, has enough plutonium for as many as a dozen nuclear weapons, depending on their level of sophistication. Some analysts have judged Pyongyang's technical capabilities in the nuclear design field to be at a low level. But there are now discussions among top U.S. weapons scientists and analysts whether North Korea may have managed to test a miniaturized warhead or a more sophisticated design than was expected.

"When you look at the rest of their activities, increasing sophistication isn't the first thing you think of, but it hasn't been discarded either," said one nuclear scientist who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of instructions from superiors to avoid talking to reporters about the test.

U.S. intelligence experts say they believe, though cannot prove, that the North Korean blast was the result of a partial implosion of plutonium at the core of the test device. That would mean some of the plutonium failed to implode, but intelligence officials do not claim to know why. The blast yield was less than a kiloton, far smaller than the 20-to-23-kiloton bomb the U.S. military dropped on Japan 60 years ago, and less than the four-kiloton yield the North Koreans told the Chinese to expect in advance of Monday's test.

Several theories about the small yield include the possibility that the device's design was slightly imperfect and thus failed to set off explosive charges simultaneously. Without the simultaneous detonation, the plutonium would fail to fully compress and implode.

If the test was conducted with a miniaturized nuclear device, however, it is possible that the North Koreans were able to conceal any radiation, as they claimed. One analyst suggested that the test may have been conducted in a horizontal tunnel with a vertical drop at the end, thus reducing the chance for radiation to vent into the air.

In an interview with the Hankyoreh, a Seoul-based newspaper, a North Korean diplomat said Tuesday that the test "was smaller than expected, but a small success means a larger success is possible."

He added that the aim was "to possess nuclear weapons," and that it would be possible to take additional measures such as preparing to load nuclear warheads onto missiles.

Even without a definitive conclusion about the test, it set off jitters in neighboring South Korea. A statement signed by 17 former defense ministers and veterans called on the Seoul government to request that the United States redeploy tactical nuclear weapons, which were removed by George H.W. Bush's administration in 1991.

Ironically, it was the initial stationing of U.S. tactical nuclear artillery shells along the demilitarized zone between North and South Korea in the late 1960s that prompted Pyongyang to begin a nuclear program.

The chances of the United States redeploying those weapons are slim; Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday that the goal of U.S. diplomacy is to denuclearize the Korean Peninsula.

U.S.: Test Points To N. Korea Nuke Blast (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns And Anne Gearan, Associated Press Writers

AP, October 14, 2006

An air sampling taken after North Korea's claimed nuclear test detected radioactive debris consistent with an atomic explosion, Bush administration and congressional officials said Friday night. They said no final determination had been made about the nature of last weekend's mystery-shrouded blast.

One U.S. government official said intelligence officials assigned an 80 percent probability that the North Korean explosion was a nuclear detonation, based on the air sample collected Wednesday. The official said it appeared highly unlikely that the sample of radioactive material was produced by any other source, including a nuclear power reactor.

The official also said additional sampling might be conducted, not necessarily by airborne means. He would not elaborate, citing security concerns.

A senior administration official suggested that the North Korean test was a dud. "The betting is that this was an attempt at a nuclear test that failed," the official said. "We don't think they were trying to fake a nuclear test, but it may have been a nuclear fizzle."

The officials who described the results spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information.

North Korea's claim of a successful nuclear test Monday sent shock waves throughout Asia and around the world. President Bush has called for stiff United Nations sanctions on North Korea, while refusing appeals by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and others to take part in one-one-one talks with the reclusive communist regime.

Since North Korea's announcement, the United States and other nations have been conducting scientific tests to determine whether a nuclear explosion had occurred.

The administration briefed key members of Congress about the preliminary test results of an air sample an official said was collected above Qunggye, near the area of the claimed nuclear test.

Results from another test disclosed Friday — an initial air sampling on Tuesday — showed no evidence of radioactive particles that would be expected from a successful nuclear detonation, a U.S. government intelligence official said.

The contradictory readings reinforced uncertainty about the size and success of Monday's underground explosion, which North Korea has trumpeted as a nuclear test. Data from seismic sensors have already indicated the explosion was smaller than expected.

The Chinese and Japanese governments have done their own air sampling and found no trace of radioactive material, officials from both countries said Friday. A Japanese government official said his country sampled air over the Sea of Japan, as well as rainfall and ground-level air on Japanese territory and found nothing.

A spokesman for National Intelligence Director John Negroponte declined to comment on any findings from U.S. spy agencies.

One Republican lawmaker, citing the release of "intelligence reports appearing to confirm the likelihood of a North Korean nuclear test," backed Bush's call for a return to international talks. But the lawmaker, Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., also parted company with the president, saying that if a "prominent American delegation — preferably a bipartisan one — get North Korea to walk back from the ledge, we should do so."

The State Department, meanwhile, announced that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to China, South Korea and Japan next week to discuss steps to pressure North Korea to drop its nuclear efforts and to assess the region's security situation.

Members of the U.N. Security Council agreed Friday on wording of a resolution that would clamp sanctions on the communist country. The draft, scheduled for a Saturday vote, would authorize nonmilitary sanctions against the North, and says that any further action the council might want to take would require another U.N. resolution.

It also eliminates a blanket arms embargo from a tougher, previous draft, instead targeting specific equipment for sanctions including missiles, tanks, warships and combat aircraft.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said that on Rice's trip, "she's going to be talking about the passage of that resolution certainly, but really what comes after."

Rice's trip is meant to present a unified front to North Korea, which will be looking for any cracks in the diplomatic coalition behind the U.N. statement. Coming less than a month before midterm congressional elections, Rice's trip is also an opportunity for the Bush administration to highlight its work countering dangerous regimes and terror threats.

Beyond the threat to Asian neighbors and perhaps other nations posed by a nuclear North Korea, the administration is worried that Pyongyang could sell its nuclear know-how to terrorists or other potential U.S. enemies, including Iran.

"Now is the time really to be very firm — to be calm, but firm — and to make clear to the North Koreans that no one is going to accept them as a nuclear weapons state," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Friday at the National Press Club.

Analysts and government officials have said it may take weeks or longer to determine with confidence whether the North Korean explosion was nuclear.

The negative air sample was taken Tuesday by a specialized aircraft, the WC-135, flying from Kadena air base in Okinawa, Japan. It apparently took the sample over the Sea of Japan, between the Korean mainland and Japan.

In Beijing, a government official said Friday that Chinese monitoring also has found no evidence of airborne radiation from the test-explosion. The official with the State Environmental Protection Administration said China has been monitoring air samples since Monday.

The U.S., which has sought tough steps in the United Nations that could leave the door open to a blockade or other military action, has had to give ground to gain support from China and Russia. Those countries, along with South Korea, have been reluctant to abandon diplomatic efforts to resolve the standoff.

North Korea Spawns New Fears As Member Of Nuclear Club (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

BEIJING - It's been called an "evil state," a "psycho state" and even a "Soprano state" that survives on crime, like the fictional television mob family.

Its leader, Kim Jong Il, once a movie director, has come up with an extraordinary plot line: Steer a totalitarian, bankrupt regime to develop nuclear weapons, then use cunning to ride out international sanctions and keep a firm grip on the nukes.

The final episodes have yet to unfold: Will the protagonist dare to put a bomb atop a missile and fire it? Will he try "nuclear blackmail" to extort billions from his neighbors?

North Korea's missile sales and illicit activity, its involvement in terrorism and its ability to seal off its people from the outside world and to hide the doings of its leaders all make it a nuclear nation worth fearing.

But the whispers in the West that the secretive Kim is crazy are simply wrong, experts say.

"Here's a guy who is leader of a failed state with a failed ideology having survived with his father for the last 50 years pitting the major powers against each other," said Ralph Cossa, the head of the Honolulu-based Center for Strategic and International Studies' Pacific Forum.

"For a crazy man, he's pretty successful."

His latest triumph came at 10:36 a.m. Monday in a shaft about 1,180 feet under a mountain at the Hwadaeri testing facility near North Korea's northeastern border with Russia. There, North Korea set off an explosion that experts say probably was a nuclear test, though no test debris has been detected in the atmosphere. The relatively small size of the blast indicates that it might have been a fizzle.

But the shock value unnerved Western policymakers.

After all, North Korean intelligence agents killed 18 South Korean officials in Burma in 1983, and bombed an airliner out of the sky in 1987, killing 115 people.

In more recent years, the cash-strapped regime has turned to moneymaking endeavors such as peddling narcotics and fake Viagra, smuggling bogus Marlboro cigarettes and printing fake American $100 bills. It sells missile and weapons technology abroad, largely in the Middle East.

A profound mistrust between North Korea and the United States adds a hair-trigger feel to the crisis. North Korea believes that Washington is bent on its destruction.

"We are under extreme threat (from the) United States of nuclear war," North Korea's ambassador to Australia, Chon Jae Hong, said after the nuclear test. North Korean propaganda routinely is laden with threats against the United States.

North Korea is more isolated than any other nation on Earth. For half a century, its million citizens have lived in a cocoon, sealed off from the world, knowing only "juche," or self-reliance, first under the leadership of Kim Il Sung, the "Great Leader," then under his son, Kim Jong Il, the "Dear Leader."

The once-industrialized country has seen its factories deteriorate and stand empty from lack of electricity. Floods and poor management produced starvation beginning in the mid-1990s, and, though estimates are difficult, the toll is thought to have reached up to 2 million people. The economy took a turn for the better beginning in 2000 and agriculture improved, helped largely by fertilizer sent from South Korea.

Few tourists are permitted. Those who go must leave behind video cameras, cell phones and binoculars. Minders severely restrict what tourists can photograph.

Photos that get out reveal woeful poverty. Pictures at a Web site set up by Russian travelers to North Korea in July (http://www.fishmonger.ru/06-07-27) show peasants using rickety wooden carts with no tires on their wheels; they roll on metal rims.

Ordinary people have no access to newspapers or the Internet. TVs and radios are sealed so that they get only official broadcasts.

"All radios have fixed tuning that only allow three or four official channels," said Andrei N. Lankov, an expert on North Korea at Kookmin University in Seoul. Defectors tell of North Koreans huddling alone under thick blankets to listen to radios smuggled in from China or North Korean ones they've tinkered with to get South Korean or international broadcasts, said Betsy Henderson of Radio Free Asia in Washington.

A huge army burdens the militarized nation's paltry economy.

"A majority of men aged 17 to 30 are soldiers. Think about it. One million soldiers. The whole population is just 22 million people. You hardly see any young males in the countryside or the cities," said Cui Yingjiu, a scholar on North Korea retired from Beijing University.

Cui knows North Korea as well as anyone. He was a university classmate of Kim Jong Il in 1961-64 in Pyongyang and visits the country about once a year.

Cui described Kim as charismatic and strong-willed, popular with students, fluent in Russian and displaying a strong affection for Hollywood films.

"He had a big collection of movies even then," Cui recalled.

Kim's short, paunchy stature and upswept hair didn't stop him on the social front.

"He's not timid. He's quite manly. ... Girls regarded him as attractive," Cui said.

When Kim took over power from his father, who died in 1994, North Korea was mired in crisis, struggling with the collapse of its benefactor, the Soviet Union. Kim steered the nation into criminal endeavors, allowing regime agents to ply the seams of global lawlessness.

U.S. officials say they've documented 50 incidents in 20 countries linking North Koreans, often diplomats, to drug trafficking.

Cases include the 2003 seizure in Australia of the North Korean ship Pong Su with 275 pounds of heroin worth $150 million aboard. In June 2004, Egypt detained North Korean diplomats smuggling vast quantities of an anti-anxiety drug. Six months later, Turkey arrested two diplomats with $7 million of a synthetic aphrodisiac.

More troubling, North Korea turned itself into a global "Missiles `R' Us," shipping entire advanced missiles or technology to anyone with a fat wallet.

Iran, Syria, Yemen, Libya and Pakistan were beneficiaries, and U.S. officials labeled North Korea the world's No. 1 missile proliferator.

Some of the earnings went into North Korea's nuclear program, which it agreed with Washington to suspend in 1994 in exchange for vast energy assistance. North Korea stopped its plutonium production and put it under the watch of the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency, and halted work on two larger reactors. It resumed reprocessing plutonium in 2003, shortly after U.S. officials said North Korea had admitted that it had a secret program to create highly enriched uranium, another fuel for nuclear weapons.

Kim's worries increased when President Bush declared in early 2002 that North Korea was part of an "axis of evil" that included Iraq and Iran.

"North Korea saw how the U.S. invaded Iraq. Now Iran is under great pressure," Cui said. Many in the regime believe that "after Iran's collapse, it's going to be our turn."

As global tensions over Pyongyang rose, Beijing nudged Kim to loosen the reins on North Korea's economy and open to the world as China had done decades earlier. In 2001 and again early this year, Kim and a large entourage toured some of China's most modern regions.

To a limited degree, the tactic worked. Kim allowed farmers to sell their excess harvests and freed factory managers to do the same. He permitted some open markets and relaxed a hold on state banks. Foreign aid workers noticed less hunger and better conditions.

Yet power shortages remain constant, and the reforms triggered some social frictions as the government began to charge for housing and electricity. Some of the economic reforms were rolled back in 2005.

Kim now sees himself as locked in a chess match with Bush, two leaders with a propensity for strident language and a stubborn, determined view of the world, Cui said.

"Bush doesn't listen to the United Nations. Kim is the same. He doesn't listen to what Russia says, what China says, what the U.S. says. Don't you think the two men are similar?" he asked.

DOJ_NMG_0081175

If Kim is backed into a corner, Cui said, his regime is capable of selling one of his nuclear weapons to a terrorist group or sparking a calamitous war by bombing Japan. Many North Koreans, weary of their plight, wouldn't object.

"They feel it's better to go to war than to continue suffering," he said.

North Korea: Joining The Nuclear Club? (WSJ)

Since 1963, the global nuclear stockpile has been reduced to about 27,000 warheads, down from a peak of 70,000 in 1986, according to the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. A handful of countries have voluntarily abandoned nuclear-weapons programs, including Libya, Argentina, Brazil and South Africa.

But the picture is complicated. Pakistan and India refrained from signing the nonproliferation treaty, claiming in part that it is unfair. Instead, they embarked on their own weapons programs. While that initially drew rebuke from the international community, the U.S. this year opened negotiations with India, saying it would be willing to overlook the nuclear transgression and send the country nuclear technology. Some nonproliferation experts claim this creates a double standard that could provide an incentive for countries to acquire nuclear weapons.

Another sticking point: Many of the five original nuclear countries continue to fund their nuclear-weapons programs, even though they agreed in the nonproliferation treaty to eventually disarm.

Is North Korea likely to use a nuclear weapon? Experts say it is highly unlikely North Korea would drop a nuclear bomb, mainly because its delivery systems aren't thought to be sophisticated enough to attach a nuclear warhead to a ballistic missile. Also North Korea is likely deterred by knowing that other nuclear nations would retaliate.

The bigger concern is that North Korea will help Iran proceed with a nuclear-weapons program by sending it technology and supplies, or that it becomes a nuclear-weapons supplier to terrorists who might not be deterred by retaliation since they don't reside in any one nation state.

FACTS

In 1998 Pakistan became the seventh nation to test a nuclear bomb. India -- the sixth nation to test a nuclear weapon in 1974 -- named its blast the Smiling Buddha. The test was conducted in May, the month when the Buddha's birth is celebrated.

There have been 2,051 nuclear tests conducted world-wide since 1945. Of all the tests, the U.S. accounts for half. Russia accounts for 35%. The world's largest nuclear test -- named Tsar Bomba -- was conducted by Russia in 1961 on an island in the Arctic Sea.

Under Operation Plowshare -- named after a Bible passage -- the U.S. tested so-called peaceful nuclear explosions for building canals and roads. One 1962 test, Operation Sedan, displaced 12 million tons of earth, creating a crater 1,280 feet in diameter.

The recent North Korean blast was equal to the force of 550 tons of TNT, according to South Korean geologists. That is about 4% of the force of the Hiroshima atomic bomb.

The first atomic bomb was detonated in the U.S. at 5:29 a.m. on July 16, 1945, in a New Mexico desert called Jornada del Muerto or Journey of Death. It led one witness to say "everything suddenly got brighter than daylight."

The largest U.S. nuclear weapon ever tested was in Bikini Atoll in 1954. The U.S. government paid $150 million to Bikinians for damages caused by the tests, and in 1996 reported that eating fruit on the island "could add significant radioactivity to the body."

POINTS OF VIEW

"If the U.S. keeps pestering us and increases pressure, we will regard it as a declaration of war and will take a series of physical corresponding measures."

-- North Korean government

"The United States remains committed to diplomacy. The United States also reserves all options to defend our friends and our interests in the region against the threats from North Korea."

--President Bush

DOJ_NMG_0081176

"The North Korea test is certainly a major blow and challenge to nonproliferation, but people who are looking out and saying the sky is falling or the mushroom cloud is descending...are mistaken."

--George Perkovich, The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

"The treaty is unraveling. And unfortunately, the U.S. has lost the moral high ground because we're going after countries like North Korea and Iran saying they can't have nuclear weapons, otherwise, we'll nuke you."

Embargo Halts Families' Care Packages From Japan To North Korea (MCT)

By Emi Doi

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

TOKYO - Japan's decision to ban all shipping to North Korea starting Saturday in response to the North's apparent nuclear test this week will cut off care packages from ethnic Koreans who have lived in Japan for decades.

Among them is the divided family of ethnic Korean filmmaker Yang Yonghi, who lives in Japan.

Yang made the documentary film "Dear Pyongyang" based on her visits to her brothers in North Korea over the past decade. Her father, an ethnic North Korean immigrant to Japan, sent his three sons back to North Korea to live in 1971. Yang, who was 6 at the time, said her brothers were all born in Japan.

For more than 30 years, they've not been allowed to return. Japan, like the United States, does not have diplomatic relations with North Korea.

Japan has a large Korean community because before World War II, when Japan colonized the Korean peninsula, Japanese officials forced several hundred thousand Koreans to move to Japan to work. These people and their descendants reside in Japan but don't have Japanese citizenship unless they ask for it.

In the film, Yang asked her father why he sent his sons to North Korea.

"I didn't have to send my sons back," he murmured. "The situation has changed so badly."

The filmmaker's mother for many years sent six or seven boxes full of school supplies, clothes and other goods to the sons and their families. She sent portable body warmers to her grandchildren when she heard they had suffered frostbite on their feet.

With the new shipping ban, she no longer knows what to do to help them.

"Dear Pyongyang" won the NETPAC Asian award at the Berlin International Film Festival and the special jury prize at the Sundance Film Festival this year.

Behind Enemy Reactors (NYT)

By Jon B. Wolfsthal

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

Washington

I CELEBRATED New Year's in 1996 by drinking cheap sparkling wine at the Yongbyon nuclear center, where North Korea produced the plutonium for its first nuclear test. Like dozens of dedicated civil servants, I served as an "on-site monitor" under the 1994 United States-North Korean nuclear agreement known as the Agreed Framework.

Those of us who served as monitors are proud of what we accomplished. I am not alone in being concerned that many commentators and government officials are trying to lay the blame for at least some of the current nuclear crisis at the feet of the previous administration's efforts to end North Korea's nuclear program. These allegations have little bearing on the facts and minimize the contribution of the Americans who served their country in dangerous circumstances.

In 1994, the situation with North Korea had become so fraught that the Clinton administration was considering military strikes to prevent North Korea from extracting plutonium from spent nuclear fuel at Yongbyon. At the time, North Korea might have had enough plutonium, produced in 1989, to build one or two nuclear devices. The fuel being discharged contained enough plutonium for five to six additional weapons.

Last-ditch talks between former President Jimmy Carter and President Kim Il-sung of North Korea defused the crisis and led to the framework. The deal, which helped us avoid a military conflict that could have destroyed Seoul, froze Pyongyang's plutonium program; eventually, it could have led to North Korea abandoning its nuclear efforts in exchange for diplomatic recognition by the United States and economic incentives.

In 2002, however, American intelligence agencies confirmed that North Korea was trying to acquire a uranium enrichment program in violation of the deal. But instead of working within the framework to get North Korea to abandon its nuclear efforts, the Bush administration terminated the agreement altogether. It also began arguing for regime change.

In jettisoning the framework, the administration jettisoned something of great diplomatic value. A key part of the agreement was the willingness of North Korea to let Americans — with whom they were legally at war — into their nuclear center to secure plutonium-bearing fuel rods for internationally monitored storage. In other words, the framework put Americans behind enemy lines.

As you might imagine, the daily circumstances were nothing short of insane. Assigned to North Korea for a month or so at a time, we were put up in a hastily constructed cement "guest house" a half-mile from the most secret nuclear site in North Korea. The 10 people on each rotation were watched by armed guards; our rooms were monitored at all times. No phone calls home or outside communication was possible. When I was there in the winter of 1996, temperatures at night hit 30 below. To get to work every day, we would pass through no fewer than four police and military checkpoints, some with machine-gun nests. The site itself was highly unsafe and radioactive and would have been shut down by safety officials in seconds had it operated in the United States.

Those who took the assignment left families and friends behind and bounced between acute stress and extreme boredom. Some read to escape the monotony, some played cards. I "borrowed" an International Atomic Energy Agency VCR to watch movies. We all knew that at any moment, should the political winds change, we would be hostages deep in hostile territory with no American embassy to protect us. But we took the job to make our country more secure and to pursue an end to North Korea's nuclear program.

Now that North Korea claims to have tested a nuclear device, administration supporters and commentators are seeking to blame the framework for all our problems.

They should look elsewhere. Without the framework's freeze, North Korea would have immediately acquired enough plutonium to produce more nuclear weapons and would have completed construction of two much larger weapon production reactors. By now, North Korea would have been capable of producing 20 nuclear weapons per year.

The prolonged freeze on North Korea's production and nuclear construction delayed the acquisition of nuclear materials — and it appears to have prevented North Korea from completing the larger reactors. The testing of a nuclear device by Pyongyang was pushed back at least a decade.

Those of us who served in North Korea risked our personal safety and comfort for our country. We protected America from danger and our efforts delayed the onset of the nuclear crisis we now face. To argue otherwise is to play politics with history.

North Korea's apparent test of a nuclear weapon has once more put the international arms control system in the hot seat. This week the U.N. Security Council did muster 13 votes condemning the test, whatever that means, and today it is expected to vote on new nonmilitary sanctions against Pyongyang.

This is better than nothing, though how much better depends on the fine print and the political will to enforce it. China and Russia objected at first to the sternest punishment, especially to inspections of North Korean cargo ships and tough financial sanctions. But according to reports yesterday, the U.N. resolution will allow at least some of these searches.

The good news here is that at long last the U.N. is attempting to enforce its own nonproliferation regime. Before the multilateralists get too pleased, however, it's worth recalling that it took an actual nuclear blast following a long-range missile test this summer to motivate the Security Council to take even these modest actions. Years of North Korean cheating on its treaty commitments hadn't been enough.

We mention this because the cases of North Korea and Iran are revealing the limits of arms control treaties in restraining rogue states bent on gaining nuclear weapons and other WMD. In the wake of Korea's nuclear test, we are hearing renewed calls for "direct" talks between the U.S. and North Korea akin to those that took place in the 1990s. The idea is to get North Korea to sign another agreement promising to give up its nukes. But one reason we're at the current pass is because Kim Jong Il violated the many commitments he made to the Clinton Administration.

Even as it allowed inspectors at its Yongban nuclear facility, Pyongyang was pursuing a separate and secret bomb-building effort. When the world objected once that effort was exposed, North Korea responded by shutting off the U.N. cameras at Yongban, expelling the inspectors and withdrawing from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT). Meanwhile, because the 1994 Agreed Framework had allowed North Korea to keep its plutonium under U.N. "safeguards," Pyongyang was then free to make a bomb with that nuclear fuel. Now it apparently has done so, unless this too turns out to be another lie.

The case of Iran has followed a similar arc of deception and U.N. failure. Tehran also signed the NPT, only to pursue its own secret bomb-building effort. The U.N. inspectors working inside Iran didn't discover any of this until they were tipped off by an Iranian opposition group that clearly had better intelligence than the U.N. The International Atomic Energy Agency has since produced report after report documenting Iran's violation and deception, and, under the explicit terms of the NPT, Tehran should have been referred immediately to the Security Council.

Yet the IAEA declined to do so for years. And only this summer, after Iran repeatedly rejected European entreaties to stop enriching uranium, did the Security Council finally agree to cite Iran for its arms-control violations. That resolution set an August 31 deadline for Iran to stop enriching uranium, promising dire consequences. But Iran keeps enriching, and so far the U.N. keeps begging it to cooperate. If neither Tehran nor Pyongyang takes these U.N. warnings seriously, this is why.

The latest U.N. excuse for doing little is fear that Iran will withdraw from the NPT, as North Korea did -- and then where would we be? But at least then Iran would have been forced to brand itself an international rogue, instead of using the NPT as a fig leaf to buy more time to fulfill its obvious nuclear ambitions.

If arms control won't stop rogue bomb makers, what can? Well, regime change for one. Saddam Hussein is no longer a potential nuclear threat to anyone because he no longer runs Iraq. But short of deposing a regime, the most successful policy has been the Bush Administration's Proliferation Security Initiative.

Operated out of the Pentagon on a "coalition of the willing" basis, PSI helped blow the whistle on Libya's clandestine nuclear program, rolled up A.Q. Khan's nuclear black market and has interdicted North Korean weapons shipments. The difference between this and the NPT is that the PSI doesn't give the feckless or evil a veto over what it does. It is a coalition of countries with a shared sense of purpose, and above all the willingness to act.

The world will need more such cooperation and creative thinking to contain a proliferation threat that is only going to grow. But the beginning of wisdom is to realize that the threat hasn't ended merely because a rogue regime signs an arms-control treaty.

Let Them Go (WSJ)

By Melanie Kirkpatrick

If China is to assume what it considers to be its rightful place as a great power, now is the moment. The world is looking to Beijing as the only government with a measure of influence over its lunatic nuclear ward in the Hermit Kingdom. The question is, will it use it?

China says it favors "punitive" actions on Pyongyang for its apparent nuclear test this week, and there's talk -- so far desultory -- of sanctions. But no one is speaking publicly about Beijing's biggest source of influence: the 900-mile border it shares with North Korea. Opening the frontier to refugees would put pressure on Kim Jong Il to give up his nukes or watch his regime implode. As Mark Palmer, U.S. ambassador to Hungary in 1989, has noted, the East German refugees who passed through that country en route to West Germany sped the collapse of the Soviet Union.

The plight of North Korean refugees hiding in northeastern China is a humanitarian crisis that has received scant global notice. No one knows how many are in hiding or how many Beijing has deported back to North Korea in violation of its obligations under the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees. China refuses to let the United Nations or other countries help the North Koreans.

Now, three official Chinese government documents -- obtained privately and smuggled out of the country -- show that the humanitarian crisis may be more dire than widely believed and the burden on China heavier. Two of the documents are from the Public Security Bureau -- one from the Border Police and the other from a police station along the border. The third is from the Finance Bureau of the Yanbian Korean Autonomous Prefecture in Jilin Province, home to many ethnic Koreans.

The documents were obtained by a U.S.-South Korean group that helps North Korean refugees navigate the underground railroad to safety out of China. The group prefers to remain anonymous for fear that its work could be endangered. They have been vouched for to me by two other sources, one on Capitol Hill and another at an international human-rights organization.

The Border Police document, dated Jan. 10, 2005, begins blandly enough: "From the start of illegal border crossings in 1983," it says, "the number of illegal immigrants from North Korea that have stayed in China has increased every year." It adds, "Public Security and Armed Police departments have strengthened preventative and deportation efforts."

The numbers it reports are newsworthy -- and staggering: "To date, almost 400,000 North Korean illegal immigrants have entered China and large numbers continue to cross the border illegally." And, "As of the end of December 2004, 133,009 North Korean illegal immigrants have been deported." While Chinese authorities obviously know how many refugees they have deported, by definition they can't know how many are in hiding. The estimate of 400,000 is sure to be low.

The Yanbian Finance Bureau document, dated Oct. 19, 2004, provides further evidence of the extent of the crisis. It is a letter to provincial authorities requesting more money to help with deportation efforts. "According to statistics from the Public Security, border police and civil administration, more than 93,000 refugees are still living in Yanbian Prefecture." The letter goes on to say that although the Border Police Bureau has established "six new refugee-deportation and detention centers," it does not have sufficient funds to do the job. Yanbian requests 30 million yuan ($3.8 million) a year "to solve this financial problem."

It's the third document, though, that puts this "financial problem" in human terms. It's a report, dated Oct. 7, 2003, from a police station in Badaogou Precinct, near Baishan City, in Zhangbai Korean Autonomous County, also in Jilin Province.

"At 7 a.m. on Oct. 3, 2003," Case Report No. 055 begins, "a report was received from the public of several corpses floating in the Yalu River. Officers from the Precinct immediately responded and organized personnel and by 10 a.m. 53 corpses had been recovered.

"At 5 a.m. on Oct. 4 an additional three corpses were recovered for a total of 56 corpses. There were 36 males and 20 females, including seven children (five male and two female). After examination of the personal effects it was determined that the dead were citizens of the DPRK [North Korea]. Autopsies confirmed that all 56 had been shot to death. It is estimated that the dead were shot by Korean border guards while attempting to cross into China."

While Pyongyang bears ultimate responsibility for the abuse of its citizens, China is complicit. Its policy of tracking down and repatriating refugees amounts to a death sentence for many returnees. It's a crime to leave the workers' paradise, and North Koreans who are caught and deported are shipped off to internment camps or worse.

If Beijing wants to send a message to Pyongyang about its nuclear program, it could announce that, effective immediately, it is taking several steps: It will stop deporting North Koreans, allow the United Nations to set up refugee camps, and permit the resettlement of refugees in third countries, from which they could go to South Korea, whose constitution codifies its moral responsibility to accept its Northern cousins, or to other countries willing to take them in. The U.S., which so far has accepted a mere eight North Koreans, could step up to the plate here.

The Border Police document notes that since the early 1980s there have been six instances of mass migrations that have coincided with North Korea's famines. Now, winter is coming, and there are already reports of food shortages. Allowing the world to help the North Korean refugees in China would help Beijing deal with a problem that is likely to get worse.

Making An Atomic Bomb Requires Skill, Guts (MCT)

By Robert S. Boyd

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - Making an atomic bomb isn't for dummies - or for sissies. It takes a wide set of technical capabilities and a willingness to risk death or injury to join the club of nuclear nations.

DOJ_NMG_0081180

"It's not done in your basement or bathtub," said Robert Norris, a nuclear weapons expert at the Natural Resources Defense Council, an environmental group in Washington. "You need physicists, chemists, engineers, metallurgists - a whole stable of people with skills and central direction - to make a successful bomb."

There are difficulties each step of the way, from designing the weapon to assembling the dangerous radioactive materials to manufacturing a complicated, high-precision device, delivering it to its target and setting it off at the right time and place.

A modern atomic bomb has to be small and light enough to fit on a missile or in an artillery shell or a suitcase. It can't be as massive as the 5-ton "Fat Man," which an Air Force B-29 bomber dropped on Nagasaki, Japan, in 1945.

Safety is also a concern. Powerful chemical explosives are needed to detonate a nuclear bomb. Weapons-grade plutonium and highly enriched uranium are lethally radioactive.

"This high explosive stuff is dangerous to make," Norris said. "If it's ignited before it's supposed to, it can spread plutonium all over the place. There have been serious nuclear-weapons accidents in the United States."

The easiest bomb to make uses nuclear fission, which splits a mass of uranium or plutonium atoms to release enormous amounts of heat and energy. It's much harder to construct a fusion, or hydrogen, bomb, which fuses atoms together as happens inside the sun.

North Korea, and possibly Iran, is working on fission weapons. North Korea is farther along the learning curve than Iran, as shown by what may have been a partially successful bomb test Monday. Iran would still need to produce enough enriched uranium for a nuclear bomb.

Both countries already have passed the first hurdle: They reportedly have obtained detailed bomb designs from Pakistan's rogue nuclear-weapons expert, Abdul Qadeer Khan.

The next crucial step is to acquire a sufficient stock of nuclear fuel. At least 2 pounds of weapons-grade plutonium or 4 pounds of highly enriched uranium are needed to set off a single fission bomb, according to the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists.

The form of uranium found in nature, known as U-238, is plentiful, but less than 1 percent of it is U-235, the highly radioactive form needed for a bomb. An elaborate process is required to extract U-235 from U-238.

First, uranium ore, or "yellowcake," is dissolved in nitric acid and converted to a toxic gas known as hexafluoride. The gas is spun in a centrifuge to separate the heavier U-238 from the lighter U-235. The fuel must be enriched until it's at least 90 percent pure. The process takes thousands of centrifuges spinning for months, as North Korea did in the 1990s and Iran reportedly is doing now.

"A few thousand is what you need for one bomb per year," Princeton University nuclear expert Frank von Hippel told the journal Science.

A different procedure is used to make weapons-grade plutonium. Some uranium fuel in a nuclear-power reactor absorbs extra neutrons and gradually turns into plutonium-239. Acids dissolve the uranium in the spent fuel rods and separate out the plutonium.

The most difficult task probably is constructing the bomb itself. It typically consists of a hollow sphere or cylinder in which the explosive fuel is surrounded by a dense material, usually U-238.

The fissionable fuel is very unstable and must be divided into separate "subcritical" masses so it won't blow up prematurely. Two or more of these masses must be rapidly smashed together to sustain a fission chain reaction.

One way to do this in a uranium-fueled bomb is to shoot a small lump of U-235 into a larger piece. This raises the fuel to a critical mass, touching off a spontaneous chain reaction.

Another technique, called "implosion," is used to detonate a plutonium-fueled bomb. A core of plutonium is surrounded by a sphere of little wedge-shaped chemical explosives. When the explosives are ignited they create a shock wave and squeeze the mass until it detonates.

"It's quite complex to fabricate one of these things," Norris said. "You have to get the angles right. It's also dangerous to cut and shape high explosives, which might go off."

Extremely fine-precision machining and complicated electronics are required to make implosion work.

DOJ_NMG_0081181

To set off the bomb, the explosive wedges, typically numbering 32 or 64, must all go off at the same instant. Tiny wires leading from each wedge to a central electronic trigger must be exactly the right length to produce a simultaneous explosion. Otherwise the bomb will fizzle, as may have happened in the North Korean test.

"If the plutonium is not squeezed precisely evenly, you get a squirt out of one side and have little or no yield," said Hans Kristensen, the director of the Nuclear Information Project at the Federation of American Scientists.

Diplomacy How Bush Aims To Lasso U.N. Sanctions (WSJ)

By Gerald F. Seib

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

Now may be the time to shelve for good the image of George W. Bush as a unilateralist, go-it-alone cowboy.

The Bush team is embarking in coming days on an exceptionally complex set of diplomatic maneuvers to try to contain, simultaneously, the nuclear threats from North Korea and Iran. The heavy lifting all involves persuading other nations to cooperate, and success is defined as America not being left to stand alone.

That, of course, defies the earlier stereotypes of both the president and his United Nations ambassador, John Bolton, both of whom were portrayed as champions of a diplomacy that worried little or not at all about other nations or the U.N. machinery.

It's hard to say whether the stereotype was wrong, or whether an unfriendly world forced a change. But in either case, the diplomatic offensive now unfolding begins this weekend with the final work on a U.N. Security Council resolution slapping sanctions on North Korea as punishment for its claimed nuclear-weapons test last week.

To get within striking distance of that resolution, the Bush administration has been willing in recent days to pull back from its original goals. It has softened its insistence that the U.N. endorse the halting and searching of ships heading to North Korea to find contraband material that could help either its military or nuclear programs. Beyond that, the U.S. had to ease jangled nerves in China and Russia by making clear that it wouldn't use a resolution on economic sanctions as a pretext for military action.

Put another way, the U.S. now is doing precisely what critics said it refused to do on Iraq: making compromises to win international unity.

That doesn't mean the Bush administration will stop with whatever it ekes out of the U.N. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice next week begins step two of the diplomatic game plan when she sets off on a trip to Japan, China and South Korea to build on the resolution. One subject she may discuss: getting the Japanese and South Koreans to do more under the administration's existing Proliferation Security Initiative, which calls for interdicting weapons shipments into and out of both North Korea and Iran.

The third step in the diplomatic minuet comes later next week, when the U.S. tries to get the Security Council to turn from North Korea to Iran. The goal is to compose another sanctions resolution to punish Iran for refusing to give up its uranium-enrichment program. That won't be simple; hard as it is to agree with China on a plan to punish its North Korean friends, it may be even tougher to win agreement from Russia on a plan to punish its Iranian friends.

But the stakes are huge. Iran will be watching intently to see whether the U.S. actually can organize a meaningful world response to North Korea's provocation. It's entirely possible that only a truly united response will give the Iranians pause -- which is the real test of the Bush team's newfound fondness for multilateral diplomacy.

A Feared Force Roils Business In Iran (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

As Hard-Liners Rise, Shadowy Revolutionary Guard Muscles In on Airport And Nabs Energy Deals Dawn Clash Over a Drilling Rig in The Persian Gulf

Early one morning in August, a pair of Iranian military vessels pulled up alongside the Orizont, a Romanian oil rig working in waters off the coast of Iran. Armed men jumped out and clambered up one leg of the drilling platform.

Viorel Petcu, the rig's chief, phoned his boss in Romania to report that the Iranians had started shooting. The line then went dead as the Iranians commandeered the communications room and herded 19 Romanian workers onto the helicopter pad. No one was hurt, recalled Mr. Petcu, speaking later from the still-occupied rig, but "it was like something you only see only on television." Iran denies opening fire.

The rig matter ostensibly was just a lease dispute between partners. But it exposed the potent political forces that roil Iranian business, including the heavy hand of elements close to Iran's hard-line president. Prominent among those forces in business today is a group the West knows mainly for its fervor in enforcing religious rectitude: the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps.

The secretive paramilitary group, according to the U.S., arms both violent Shiite militias in Iraq and Hezbollah, the Lebanese group that fought a war with Israel this summer. It runs feared prisons inside Iran. The Revolutionary Guard also has a big role that is less understood in the West: an active player in business.

It builds highways and tunnels. Two years ago it muscled aside a Turkish firm that had a contract to run a new Tehran airport. Now the Revolutionary Guard is making an aggressive push into the backbone of Iran's economy, its oil and gas fields, one of the world's richest troves of fossil fuel.

In June, a Revolutionary Guard engineering group won a $2.3 billion contract to develop part of a big gas field in Iran's part of the Persian Gulf. That group also won a $1.3 billion deal to build a pipeline across Iran toward Pakistan.

Who exactly ordered the raid on the Romanian drilling rig isn't clear. Iran's government says it was carried out by the police. Romanians still aboard the rig -- now lying paralyzed in the Gulf -- say one of the five Iranians currently occupying and controlling it is a Revolutionary Guard officer. In any case, the Guard now is among those negotiating to take over an Iranian firm, Oriental Oil Co., that holds the lease to this rig and two other disputed platforms from Romania.

The struggle for the leases and drilling rigs reveals an unintended consequence of U.S. foreign policy. In this case, instead of weakening Iran, America's efforts to squeeze the country ended up boosting the very hard-line forces there that the U.S. wants to curb.

Washington urged European banks not to do business with Iranian banks. But when one of them stopped doing so, it put Oriental Oil, the holder of the rig lease, in a bind. This and other problems prompted Oriental to put itself up for sale, creating an opening for Iranian hard-liners to try to grab the business.

The Revolutionary Guard has long been a major force in Iran's politics. It has its own ground, air and naval units, which operate in parallel to Iran's regular military. Former guardsmen -- including President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad -- are scattered throughout the government and security apparatus. While some Guard veterans have become reformers, the organization has a fearsome reputation inside Iran as a brutal defender of revolutionary orthodoxy.

It runs its own intelligence service and has played a big role in crushing dissent, most recently in 1999 during a wave of student-led protests. The Guard also controls a feared outfit called the Basij, composed of youthful zealots who prowl the streets hunting for insufficiently veiled women and others who violate strict Islamic norms. The Basij claims millions of members.

The Guard has a long history of activity abroad, having helped set up Lebanon's Hezbollah militia in the early 1980s. More recently it has reached into neighboring Iraq. There, according to a senior Israeli security official, its quest for influence is spearheaded by a special unit of the Guard called the Ramadan Headquarters, which trains and funds Iraq Shiite fighters.

The Guard's business activities include engineering, media, trading and energy. "They are taking positions everywhere," says Mohsen Sazegara, a former aide to the late Ayatollah Khomeini and a founder of the paramilitary force in 1979. The Guard, says Mr. Sazegara, who broke with Iran's regime a few years ago and now lives in the U.S., is a "unique organization in the world: a political body, a military force and big, complex company."

The Guard got its start in business after Iran's 1980-88 war with Saddam Hussein's Iraq, in which it fought and suffered horrendous losses. Its engineering unit, called Khatam al-Anbiya Construction Headquarters, then shifted from building fortifications to projects such as roads, dams and tunnels. (The unit's name derives from a phrase meaning "the final prophet," i.e., the Prophet Mohammed.) Presenting itself as an ordinary company, Khatam set up a Web site and published an in-house journal called Road and Tunnel Magazine. It established headquarters in a nondescript building in northern Tehran. Its chief is a former oil engineer.

Throughout, though, Khatam has remained an essentially military operation. "I'm not allowed to tell you anything," says Mohammadreza Rajabalinejad, a civil engineer who used to edit its magazine. A senior Guard official recently told the Iranian press 70% of Khatam's work is military-related. Khatam declined to comment.

The Guard's initial reason for getting into business was both economic and political: newly demobilized and often bitter soldiers needed jobs, and the government, fearful of unrest, wanted to keep them occupied. As Khatam and other Guard ventures grew, they helped generate funds for the Guard and allowed regime loyalists to enrich themselves free from scrutiny by parliament or other state bodies.

The Guard reports not to the government but to Iran's supreme authority, the cleric Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Its business units publish no accounts. Its budget is secret.

Though focused on work inside Iran, Khatam and other Guard ventures have done jobs abroad. They helped build a road in western Afghanistan after the fall of the Taliban, when the U.S.-backed government of Hamid Karzai pleaded for foreign help. Mr. Sazegara says the Guard is deeply involved in smuggling foreign goods into Iran.

The Guard made its first splashy display of hardball business tactics in May 2004. That month, it ousted a Turkish company that had a contract to run Iran's new Imam Khomeini International Airport. Troops and armored cars crashed a grand opening, blocking the runway. A plane that was about to land was turned away and all further flights were canceled.

The Turks fled. "It was a horrible, fantastical day," says Erken Ozber, a manager for the Turkish company, Tepe-Akfen-Vie. Months later, the airport reopened under management of the Revolutionary Guard and Iranian state organizations.

The debacle didn't dim the enthusiasm of foreign companies scouting for prospects in Iran's energy sector. Iran has the biggest natural-gas reserves after Russia and, according to the BP Statistical Review, its oil deposits are second only to Saudi Arabia's.

Among those looking for prospects was a Norwegian company called Aker Kvaerner. It led a consortium in 2004 that, Iranian officials say, included Khatam, the Revolutionary Guard unit. In early 2005, the consortium won a deal to help develop Iran's giant South Pars gas field in the Persian Gulf.

The Norwegians ran into flak at home for associating with the Guard, whose harsh prison network in Iran is notorious. "In Alliance with the Army of Torture," read a headline in an Oslo paper. The company's chief executive wrote a letter defending its Iran business. In any case, the deal soured before final terms could be worked out. The Norwegian company won't specify what went wrong.

Oriental Oil, the company currently at the center of the rig affair, also wanted into the big gas field. One of its sister companies formed a bidding partnership with a unit of Halliburton Co. of Houston. Although Washington tightly restricts U.S. companies and citizens from doing business in Iran, the rules don't bar non-U.S. citizens working for foreign-registered subsidiaries, as was the case with this Halliburton unit.

Oriental Oil, with offices in Dubai and Tehran, certainly looked like a good bet at the time, 2004. Its majority owner, Mehrdad Akbar Safdari, was a veteran of Iran's war with Iraq. People who know him say he had close ties both to the Guard and to more moderate political forces then running Iran. Also well connected was a partner of his, Cyrus Nasseri, an urbane former Iranian ambassador to the United Nations in Geneva who had studied for a time in Kentucky and spoke both English and French. He had won the trust of Iran's governing elite by helping negotiate the end of the Iran-Iraq war in 1988.

Oriental also got into the offshore-rig business. It rented foreign drilling rigs with the intent of re-leasing them, at a markup, to Iran's national oil company.

Oriental leased two rigs, first from Romania's state oil company and later from a private Romanian company that bought the rigs from the state company. The price, a fixed $40,000 a day, now is a bargain, because rates have since roughly tripled. The private Romanian company also then agreed to rent a third platform to Oriental.

To handle details, Oriental set up a letter of credit through an Iranian state-owned bank, Bank Saderat. Credit Suisse Group in Europe agreed to work with that bank to process the lease payments.

Things started to pay off for Oriental and Halliburton in late 2004. Oriental won a $307 million contract to develop two phases of the gas field. It was "a very happy time," recalls Oriental's general manager in Dubai, Khosrow Arabi.

But political winds in Tehran were shifting. Conservatives had just won parliamentary elections. Then in June of 2005, Iran elected as president Mr. Ahmadinejad, himself a former Revolutionary Guardsman. He had campaigned on a pledge to curb what he called Iran's "oil mafia."

As president, he moved against businesses close to his more moderate predecessor. News media linked to the Guard and other hard-liners began to denounce Oriental Oil, and particularly its minority owner, the diplomat Mr. Nasseri. Fars News Agency complained that Mr. Nasseri "had access to the country's most secret information as a member of Iran's nuclear negotiating team and at the same time was dealing directly with the American company Halliburton, which once was run by Dick Cheney." Some griped about a since-aborted deal he had helped negotiate under which Iran agreed to suspend uranium enrichment. Asked about this, Mr. Nasseri says he won't discuss "lies and rumor."

In short order, Iran announced it was investigating Oriental Oil for corruption. The state oil company, alleging bribery, canceled Oriental Oil's winning bid for work in the South Pars gas field.

At that point, Halliburton dropped all contact with Oriental. Halliburton says they had never signed a final contract. Mr. Arabi, Oriental's manager in Dubai, recalls that "we were fighting with everyone. We had headaches everywhere."

Oriental, however, still had something Iran needed: lease contracts for several foreign offshore drilling rigs, including the three Romanian ones.

A shortage of drilling rigs has long bedeviled Iran, hurting its efforts to increase oil production, which remains far below the level before the 1979 revolution. U.S. law keeps out American drillers, the biggest players in the business.

Stripped of its biggest projects, Oriental Oil now clung to the drilling rigs as a lifeline. Its grip quickly began to slip.

In February, Credit Suisse said it was suspending its role handling the lease payments in cooperation with Iran's Bank Saderat. This followed U.S. pressure on big European banks to curtail business with the Iranian bank. A Credit Suisse spokesman declined to comment on the spat but said the bank was doing a "controlled withdrawal" from work with Iran-related corporate clients and decided late last year to refuse new Iran business. He cited an "increase in political and financial risks" and a desire to "safeguard our reputation."

The U.S. Treasury Department, ramping up its campaign to squeeze Iran, last month announced it was excluding Bank Saderat from both direct and indirect access to the U.S. financial system. The Treasury claimed Iran had used the bank to funnel $50 million to a group controlled by Hezbollah.

In this case, the U.S. campaign, because of the squeeze it created for Oriental Oil, may have ended up helping what is believed to be Hezbollah's principal sponsor -- the Revolutionary Guard.

The Romanian owner of the drilling rigs, Grup Servicii Petroliere SA, said it couldn't continue to lease the rigs to Oriental now that Credit Suisse had pulled out. Gabriel Comanescu, the Romanian company's president, also complained about a heap of unpaid bills. In April, he terminated the lease contracts and demanded his rigs back. Oriental, saying it could find a replacement bank, made clear that it had no intention of giving up the rigs. The two sides' claims and counterclaims are now before an arbitration panel in Paris.

Oriental, beset both by political problems at home and by banking woes abroad, decided its only option was to sell out, says its Mr. Arabi. "They are the winners," he said, referring to hard-line Iranian politicians and news media who he said were behind the campaign against Oriental. Iran suddenly dropped its corruption case against the company.

The Revolutionary Guard, meanwhile, was on a roll. Iran's new government had given it the lead role in developing two phases of the gas field -- the same project previously assigned to the Norwegian-led consortium. The Guard also won a gas pipeline deal, plus a contract to expand Tehran's subway system.

Its advances haven't come without push-back, reflecting the rival power centers that mark Iran today. Reformist members of parliament wrote to President Ahmadinejad complaining about no-bid contracts and below-market-rate loans given to the Guard. And parliament blocked Mr. Ahmadinejad's attempt to name a Guard veteran as oil minister.

Still, when Oriental Oil gave up and decided to sell itself, the Guard's engineering unit quickly became a top contender to buy it, in competition with an affiliate of the state oil company and others.

The U.S. is deeply wary of the Revolutionary Guard but believes that the trials of Iranian firms squeezed by foreign banks may in the future undermine hard-line elements. "While those who are currently benefitting from Iranian integration into the global economy are the ones who will feel this isolation the most, they are also in the best position to persuade the regime that its current track will undermine the future of the Iranian people," said Stuart Levey, Under Treasury Secretary for Terrorism and Financial Intelligence.

In Romania, Mr. Comanescu, having canceled the drilling-rig leases when the bank system for handling lease payments collapsed, laid plans to get the three rigs back. One was outside Iran for repairs, so reclaiming it wasn't hard. But two were moored in Iranian waters in the Persian Gulf.

In June, Mr. Comanescu hired three tugboats to drag off one of them, the Orizont. But the tugs turned back after Iran's state oil company ordered them to.

In August, he tried again, this time with the other rig, and had more success. Tugs towed it from Iranian waters to the United Arab Emirates. Iran branded the move a hijacking and said state oil officials had been roughed up and held hostage. Ian Bahn, a Briton who supervised the move, called that charge nonsense, saying the men allegedly held hostage were "smiling, laughing and joking with us."

This left just one Romanian drilling rig, the Orizont, still in Iranian waters. An Iranian court ordered that it stay put.

On Aug. 22, vessels again approached the rig, but this time they weren't tugboats. They were Iranian boats, and their occupants had guns, says the rig's chief, Mr. Petcu. He says the Iranians forced their way aboard.

Mr. Petcu says that after the Iranian forces herded him and the other Romanians onto the helicopter pad, the intruders began hunting for documents, looking in computers, cabinets and even the refrigerator.

Photos taken by the Romanians show two Iranian vessels. There was a large patrol boat of the type Iran's navy uses and a smaller unmarked craft that, naval experts say, appeared to belong to the Revolutionary Guard.

Iran's government, which had earlier accused Oriental Oil of corruption, now rallied to defend the sanctity of its rig contracts. The Foreign Ministry said police had boarded the Orizont to prevent the rig from being moved illegally, and thus to foil "a second robbery." After a day of heated exchanges between Tehran and Bucharest, President Ahmadinejad telephoned Romania's president to assure him that Iran had no hostile intent, merely commercial interests.

Today, Mr. Nasseri, the diplomat who was a target of the campaign against Oriental, says he has sold his 10% stake in Oriental. He won't say to whom. "I'm tired," he says. "I just want to lead a normal, comfortable life."

Eight weeks after the rig raid, with the platform in limbo in the Persian Gulf, Iran has withdrawn most of its armed men but still occupies the rig. Mr. Comanescu, the Romanian executive, says his staff aboard the platform has been able to identify the five Iranians still there. He says two are armed police, one is a representative of Oriental Oil, one is an envoy from Iran's state oil company and the last is an armed intelligence officer of the Revolutionary Guard. "We are caught in the middle of a big Iranian fight. This is our tragedy," he says.

"I wouldn't wish my biggest enemy to be in the situation I'm in," the Romanian executive adds. "Do you think the Revolutionary Guards went to...the Harvard Business School?"

Norway's Statoil Is Fined By SEC Over Iran Affair (WSJ)

By Ian Talley

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department levied a $21 million fine against Norwegian oil company Statoil ASA for a payment it made in 2002 to win development of a critical Iranian petroleum project.

State-controlled Statoil has already paid Norwegian authorities $3 million for the affair, which involved a $15.2 million consultancy contract with Horton Investment Ltd. -- a consultancy that also had links to the state-owned National Iranian Oil Co. -- and led to the ouster of several top executives.

Norwegian investigators said the deal was illegal and meant to influence officials for entry into the South Pars project petroleum project in Iran. In October 2002, Statoil was awarded the development contract.

Statoil acknowledged making the payment and said it would accept the penalties. Statoil Chairman Jannik Lindbaek said the incident occurred under the company's previous management and that the company has "long deplored" it.

The sanction is among the largest under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, a 1970s law that prohibits bribes to foreign officials. In the largest fine under the act, Titan Corp. last year agreed to pay $28.5 million to settle SEC allegations it covered up payments in six countries.

The SEC, which has been ratcheting up pressure on U.S. corporations to disclose any questionable payments they may have made overseas, said it wanted to make the Statoil fine high to send a clear signal to other companies.

"It was important for us to not just make this violation just another cost of doing business for the company," said Helene T. Glotzer, SEC associate regional director.

The SEC said it would require Statoil to pay $10.5 million of any future profit from the Iranian project currently under construction. The Justice Department said it would accept the $3 million penalty levied against Statoil by Norwegian authorities as part of its $10.5 million penalty.

An official Iranian investigation last year found there had been no wrongdoing by any Iranian officials or companies.

In January, Statoil wrote down the South Pars project by $335 million following three years of delays, poor pre-engineering plans and higher commodity prices.

Separately, Norwegian safety officials upheld an order to shut down two offshore oil platforms, owned by Statoil and Norske Shell ASA, the Norwegian branch of Royal Dutch Shell PLC, because of defects in their lifeboat systems. The order will delay production of about 280,000 barrels per day of oil, or some 10% of the production that makes Norway the world's third-largest oil exporter after Saudi Arabia and Russia.

South Korean Is Appointed Secretary General Of U.N. (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 13 — Ban Ki-moon, the foreign minister of South Korea, was appointed Friday by the General Assembly as the next secretary general of the United Nations, succeeding Kofi Annan.

Mr. Ban was approved by acclamation of the 192-member body and greeted by sustained applause as he walked onto the rostrum to make his acceptance speech.

He is to take the oath of office in mid-December and assume the job on Jan. 1, the day after Mr. Annan completes his two five-year terms. In his foreign service career, Mr. Ban has taken part in negotiations with North Korea, and said this month that he would like to go there once he becomes secretary general.

Mr. Ban, 62, will become the eighth secretary general in the 60-year history of the United Nations and the first Asian occupant of the office since U Thant of Burma stepped down in 1971.

Mr. Annan, 68, hailed his successor as “a man with a truly global mind at the helm of the world’s only universal organization.”

He recalled that the first man to hold the position, Trygve Lie, told his successor, Dag Hammarskjold, “You are about to take over the most impossible job on earth.”

Mr. Annan said, “While that may be true, I would say, ‘This is also the best possible job on earth.’ ”

Mr. Ban said he had appreciated the United Nations from his youth for the role the organization played in creating and rebuilding his war-torn country.

He also said he had been “pained by scenes of its failures” in his travels in recent years. “In too many places could I feel the dismay over inaction of the U.N., or action that was too little or came too late.”

He pledged, “I am determined to dispel the disillusionment.”

He listed his priorities as reforming the United Nations, meeting development goals established in 2000, establishing human rights, confronting threats posed by terrorism and weapons of mass destruction, slowing environmental degradation and curbing the spread of AIDS.

Under the United Nations Charter, the name of the new secretary general is chosen by the Security Council and sent to the General Assembly for appointment.

Mr. Ban defeated six other candidates for the job in four informal polls of the Council and was officially elected by the 15-member panel on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0081187

A veteran of three decades in his country's foreign service, Mr. Ban is familiar with the United Nations, where he served as first secretary of the South Korean mission in the 1970's and was chief assistant to Han Seung-soo, president of the General Assembly, in 2001.

He is a more retiring personality than Mr. Annan, who traveled the world as a global diplomat and made high-profile statements on the rule of international law.

In his speech, he asked that people understand his modest manner as a cultural attribute and not misread it as lack of decisiveness or passion.

"Asia is a region where modesty is a virtue," he said.

"But the modest is about demeanor," he said, "not about vision and goals. It does not mean the lack of commitment or leadership. Rather it is quiet determination in action to get things done without so much fanfare."

South Korean Approved As U.N. Secretary General (WP)

From News Services

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 13 -- The U.N. General Assembly overwhelmingly approved South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon on Friday as the next U.N. secretary general.

The Security Council's choice of Ban, 62, to succeed Kofi Annan was ratified by acclamation at the General Assembly, consisting of all 192 U.N. member governments.

Hundreds of diplomats and U.N. staffers broke into loud applause when the General Assembly president, Sheikha Haya Rashed al-Khalifa of Bahrain, asked the assembly to adopt the resolution by acclamation. She then banged the gavel and said, "It is so decided."

Ban will become the eighth secretary general in the United Nations' 60-year history on Jan. 1, when Annan's second five-year term expires. The last Asian to run the world body was U Thant of Burma, who held the post from 1961 to 1971.

"It has been a long journey from my youth in war-torn and destitute Korea to this rostrum and these awesome responsibilities," Ban said in accepting the post, in both English and French.

"I could make the journey because the U.N. was with my people in our darkest days," he said. "It gave us hope and sustenance, security and dignity. It showed us a better way. So I feel at home today."

Ban will oversee an organization with 92,000 peacekeepers around the world and a $5 billion annual budget. The United Nations' reputation has been tarnished by corruption scandals, and its outdated practices need reform to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

Annan hailed Ban as "exceptionally attuned to the sensitivities of countries and constituencies in every continent."

The choice of Ban for the top job coincides with increased U.N. involvement in the effort to thwart North Korea's nuclear weapon development program. Ban has said that he would like to help mediate the dispute with the communist government in North Korea.

Ban Named Next U.N. Secretary-general (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, October 14, 2006

The U.N. General Assembly appointed South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon as the next U.N. secretary-general Friday, and the veteran diplomat who grew up during a war that divided his country pledged to make peace with North Korea a top priority.

The assembly's action on Ban capped the remarkable rise of a man who was little known outside Asia before launching his campaign to succeed Kofi Annan. It also marked a milestone for South Korea, which only joined the United Nations in 1991 and still has U.N. troops on the tense border with the North.

Ban has been in the forefront of South Korea's nuclear negotiations with Pyongyang and has said he plans to travel to North Korea as secretary-general, something Annan never did. He said last month he would use the authority of the U.N. position to promote peace and reconciliation on the Korean peninsula "and a peaceful resolution of the North Korean nuclear issue."

The U.S. and Japan were pushing for a vote by the Security Council Saturday on a resolution imposing punishing sanctions on the North for its claimed nuclear test earlier this week. The test prompted worldwide outrage and demands from the U.S. and its allies for the isolated communist regime to return to six-party talks aimed at persuading the North to abandon its nuclear program.

Ban told a press conference soon after his selection that he hopes the Security Council "quickly adopts a clear and strong resolution" to show North Korea that the international community is united against its claimed nuclear test.

In a speech to hundreds of diplomats and U.N. staff Friday, Ban laid out his vision for the United Nations whose reputation has been tarnished by corruption scandals and whose outdated practices still need major reform to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

"My tenure will be marked by ceaseless efforts to build bridges and close divides," he said. "Leadership of harmony not division, by example not instruction, has served me well so far. I intend to stay the course as secretary-general."

During a nearly 40-year career as a diplomat, Ban said, "I have been elated by the successes of the U.N. in making life better for countless people. I have also been pained by scenes of its failures. In too many places could I feel the dismay over inaction of the U.N., or action that was too little or came too late."

"I am determined to dispel the disillusionment," he said.

Ban, 62, will become the eighth secretary-general in the U.N.'s 60-year history on Jan. 1 when Annan's second five-year term expires. He was one of seven candidates vying to be the U.N. chief and topped all four informal polls in the Security Council.

He said he was proud to be the second Asian chosen to serve as secretary-general. The last secretary-general from the continent was Burma's U Thant, who served from 1961-71.

By tradition, the post of secretary-general rotates among the regions of the world and most countries agreed that this time it was Asia's turn.

Hundreds of diplomats and U.N. staff in the chamber broke into loud applause when assembly president Sheikha Haya Rashed Al Khalifa asked the 192-nation world body to adopt the resolution appointing Ban by acclamation. She then banged the gavel and said, "It is so decided."

Annan hailed Ban as "a future secretary-general who is exceptionally attuned to the sensitivities of countries and constituencies in every continent" and said he would be "a man with a truly global mind at the helm of the world's only universal organization."

Annan recalled that the first U.N. secretary-general, Trygvie Lie, told his successor, Dag Hammarskjold, "You are about to take over the most impossible job on Earth."

"While that may be true," Annan said, "I would say: This is also the best possible job on Earth."

He said he had only one piece of advice for his successor when he takes over — "try to make full use of the unparalleled resource you will find in the staff of the organization. Their commitment is the U.N.'s greatest asset."

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said Ban is "the right person to lead the United Nations at this decisive movement in its history, particularly as the U.N. struggles to fulfill the terms of the reform agenda that world leaders agreed to last fall."

Ban has been South Korea's foreign minister for more than 2 1/2 years and served as national security adviser to two presidents — jobs that focused on relations with North Korea. During his diplomatic career, he was posted in India, Austria, Washington and at the United Nations.

Ban received a degree in international relations from Seoul National University in 1970, and earned a master's degree in public administration from Harvard University in 1985.

An early influence for him came from a White House visit with President John F. Kennedy as part of a program organized by the American Red Cross when he was an 18-year-old student. His visit is captured in a black-and-white photo that shows Ban smiling among students from other countries as the president spoke.

Ban on Friday harkened back to his childhood, saying the United Nations stood by South Korea in its impoverished postwar days.

"It has been a long journey from my youth in war-torn and desperate Korea to this rostrum and these awesome responsibilities," he said. "I could make this journey because the U.N. was with my people in our darkest days. It gave us hope and sustenance, security and dignity. It showed us a better way."

He said he hopes to head a United Nations like the one he remembered from his boyhood.

"I am an optimist, and I am full of hope about the future of our global organization. Let us work together for a U.N. that can deliver more and better."

Seismic Task For Korean Assuming U.N. Mantle (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

NEW YORK

A Polish pope, with a little help from his compatriots, prized open the prison of Central Europe. Can a South Korean secretary general of the United Nations do the same for the 23 million hapless people locked in the hermit state of a nuclear-armed North Korea?

Ban Ki Moon, the South Korean foreign minister, who will succeed Kofi Annan at the end of the year, is short on the charisma that made Pope John Paul II a force. But the unanimity he engineered for his nomination testifies to his powers, and sitting atop the UN confers access, authority and agenda-setting discretion not granted by national office.

The Korean question will inevitably top his agenda because it's the world's greatest strategic anomaly: a frozen "temporary" border that is the Cold War's strangest relic, separating a nation caught in a Stalinist time warp from another, Ban's, that is a vibrant emblem of the world's most dynamic region.

Following North Korea's announcement that it had tested a small nuclear device, the threat posed by this anomaly is clear. As David Sanger of The New York Times has noted, Kim Jong Il's bizarre regime has "never developed a weapons system it did not sell on the world market." We know all too well who the many clients are for loose nukes.

Since the "seismic event," the term favored by the U.S. administration for Kim's explosion, President George W. Bush has warned that the ever shifting "red line" for Pyongyang now stands at selling nuclear material. That, Bush said, would constitute a "grave threat" for which Kim would be held "fully accountable." Kim's not suicidal, so he may listen to that, at least for now.

This warning aside, Bush's favorite word of late has been "diplomacy." It courses through his parlance with the readiness once reserved for with-us- or-against-us rabble-rousing. You don't have to look any further than Baghdad for the explanation. America is stretched thin with little taste for further military confrontation.

"My answer is that I believe the commander-in-chief must try all diplomatic measures before we commit our military," Bush opined the other day, adding, "We're making progress when we've got others at the table."

So here, it seems, is a chastened U.S. commander-in-chief turning to diplomacy, which is to say the United Nations, at the same time as the organization prepares to greet a new leader for whom the intricacies of the Korean Peninsula are everyday fare. On the face of it, that's a situation with potential.

The potential may be greater because the North Korean bomb has been "seismic" in more than one sense. It has shifted the political terrain in Asia. Shinzo Abe, the new Japanese prime minister, chose to make conciliatory visits to Beijing and Seoul his first diplomatic moves.

That immediately endeared Abe to the United States.

"What has been the weakness of the American strategic position in Asia over the last several years and, indeed what has been the weakness in dealing with North Korea?" Nicholas Burns, an under secretary of state, asked at the Council on Foreign Relations this week. "You've had this very difficult relationship between China and Japan. You've had an equally difficult relationship between Japan and South Korea."

Burns gave part of the answer to why the six-party talks with Pyongyang have failed: those pressing Kim were divided among themselves. If Abe proves attuned to Chinese and South Korean World War II grievances, the principal source of friction, fissures may narrow and pressure on Pyongyang intensify.

But fundamental problems remain, not least that while the United States would be happy enough to see Kim fall and his regime implode, China has no interest in that outcome. South Korea, more intent on the peninsula's stability than its freedom, and marked by strong pockets of anti-American sentiment, is also deeply ambivalent.

A coalition is only as strong as its weakest partner. Already, anger at North Korea from China and Russia has given way to exhortations to proceed with prudence, the sort of mealy-mouthed talk for which Kim showed such contempt with his little bomb.

The Bush administration's quest for a strongly worded UN Security Council Resolution, backed by a possible threat of military force under Chapter 7 of the UN Charter, is facing resistance.

That's par for the course. Whether the issue is North Korea or Iran, China and Russia will seek little ways to chip away at American power. Given Bush's international standing, they will not be isolated. But in diplomacy, as life, you must be careful what you wish for: North Korean nukes should focus minds on what the costs of a divided, dithering and leaderless world can be.

Which brings us back to Ban. When I interviewed him in Seoul last year, he was a study in prudence. Unification, he said, was "an ardent aspiration of all 70 million Korean people," but "now our priority should be the maintenance of peace and stability." He noted that South Korea would face an "enormously heavy burden from a sudden collapse of the North" and dismissed the notion of unification within a decade.

Pressure and sanctions are fine, and better if delivered with unanimity. But, as Pope John Paul II showed, moral suasion can be the most powerful force of all. North Korea is a squalid, corrupt, ruthless little family dynasty with a big army and no food; it should be history by now. Somebody needs to find ways to make that clear.

Ban, in his new position, will carry the world's moral authority. As a Korean, he has a moral obligation. Office can transform the stature of man; age tends to accentuate the urge to leave a lasting mark. Who better to speak for Korean freedom than he?

The incoming secretary general has already said he's ready to go to Pyongyang. That's a good start. If he leaves office with the Korean Peninsula still divided, and 23 million North Koreans still bowing and scraping to Kim, history may prove severe in its judgment.

5 Die As Palestinians Clash With Israelis And Each Other (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 13 — Four Palestinians, including three Hamas militants, were killed Friday in a second day of deadly clashes with Israeli forces in the Gaza Strip.

In a separate confrontation, Palestinian gunmen from the two main factions, Hamas and Fatah, battled each other overnight and during the day on Friday, leaving a teenager dead and nearly 50 people wounded in the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahiya, the Palestinians said.

Both developments illustrated the relentless turmoil that has gripped Gaza since militants seized an Israeli soldier and took him to the territory on June 25. Since then, Israeli forces have re-entered Gaza, carrying out ground raids and frequent airstrikes, and tensions between Hamas and Fatah have often boiled over into street fighting.

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, tried to calm the atmosphere during a midday speech on Friday at a mosque in the southern Gaza town of Khan Yunis. “We are committed to not getting dragged into internal strife or into the so-called civil war,” Mr. Haniya said.

Despite such pleas by Mr. Haniya and the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, the internecine fighting has grown worse in recent weeks, and talks on a Palestinian unity government are deadlocked.

One of the key sticking points in the talks has been Hamas’s refusal to recognize Israel, as demanded by Western countries. Mr. Haniya reiterated Hamas’s position on Friday.

“Israel might have secured the recognition of some of our people, and some in the Arab world and in the international community,” Mr. Haniya said. “It is now seeking another recognition, Islamic recognition. I say we will not give it this card.”

In Friday's deadliest episode, the Israeli Air Force bombed a vehicle in northern Gaza, killing three Hamas militants inside, and wounding several passers-by on the street.

The Israeli military said the Hamas men were planning to launch rockets at southern Israel, and that the same Hamas cell was involved in rocket fire a day earlier.

Also on Friday, a Palestinian woman was shot dead near her house in Khan Yunis, according to residents and medical workers. Palestinians said she was hit by Israeli gunfire. The Israeli military said it was searching for tunnels in the area and shot two gunmen, but was not aware of having hit a woman.

A day earlier, the Israeli military killed eight Palestinians in Gaza, including militants and civilians, and a ninth Palestinian died of his wounds on Friday.

In another development, the Israeli security forces clashed with hundreds of Palestinians from the West Bank who tried to enter Jerusalem on Friday to pray at the Aksa Mosque compound, one of the holiest sites in Islam.

The Palestinians, who tried to enter the city at several checkpoints, threw stones and bottles at the security forces, who responded with tear gas, rubber bullets and stun grenades. No serious injuries were reported.

An estimated 160,000 Muslims took part in the midday prayers at the mosque compound in Jerusalem's Old City, and such huge crowds are the norm during the holy month of Ramadan. However, Israel has not been allowing Muslim men under 40 to attend the services and has barred most Palestinians from the West Bank, citing security concerns.

The latest round of internal Palestinian fighting began on Thursday, with the fatal shooting of a member of the intelligence service, a branch of the security forces considered loyal to Mr. Abbas.

On Thursday night, a local Hamas leader was gunned down in Beit Lahiya. Shortly afterward, Hamas and Fatah gunmen there began exchanging fire. The shooting lasted through the night and during much of the day on Friday. A teenage bystander was killed.

9 Slain As Gaza Clashes Continue (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

At least 18 Palestinians have been killed since Thursday in actions by the Israeli military. Violence between Fatah and Hamas also persists.

JERUSALEM — Israeli forces killed at least nine Palestinians in the Gaza Strip on Friday and early today in clashes that mark the deadliest flare-up in weeks.

At least 18 people have died in military actions since Thursday morning, several of them civilians, Palestinian officials said.

Early today, Israeli aircraft fired missiles at Hamas fighters east of Gaza City, killing five. The Israeli military said gunmen had fired antitank missiles at troops that had moved into the area.

Three Hamas militants were killed Friday near Beit Lahiya when an Israeli aircraft fired a missile at the car in which they were riding.

The Israeli military said the car was loaded with homemade Kassam rockets the men planned to fire into Israel. Militants launched six Kassams a day earlier after an Israeli raid killed six people near the town of Khan Yunis, in southern Gaza.

Earlier Friday, Palestinian officials said a 32-year-old woman died after being hit by gunfire outside her home in Abasan, a village near Khan Yunis where Israeli forces have operated since Thursday. Israeli army officials said they were unaware of any shots hitting civilians. A military spokeswoman said soldiers had fired at two gunmen who approached, hitting both fighters and killing one.

Meanwhile, a 38-year-old man died of wounds suffered a night earlier during an Israeli missile strike on a house in the Shajaiyeh neighborhood of Gaza City. The strike targeted Ashraf Farwana, a senior Hamas militant, but he was not home.

Killed instead were his brother, Ayman, and an 8-year-old girl in an adjoining house.

Israel renewed military operations in Gaza after the June 25 capture of an Israeli soldier by Palestinian militants. The latest fighting has added to the turmoil in the impoverished coastal enclave, where factional clashes between the ruling Hamas movement and its main rival, Fatah, also are occurring.

At least 10 people were injured early Friday during a shootout between the rival groups in Beit Lahiya.

The encounter was apparently triggered by the fatal shooting of a Hamas militant the previous night by gunmen who appeared at his home. That shooting followed the slaying of a 30-year-old officer of the Palestinian intelligence service, which is loyal to Fatah.

Also Friday, a mob burned down a Gaza radio station affiliated with Fatah. The owner said the attackers were members of Hamas.

The two groups have been locked in a power struggle since Hamas won control of the government by defeating Fatah in parliamentary elections in January.

Talks aimed at forging a unity government have deadlocked over Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, announced a tentative agreement last month but it fell apart almost immediately.

Officials in both factions hoped a new government lineup could help break a months-long international aid embargo against Hamas, which much of the West classifies as a terrorist group.

In other developments, Palestinians clashed with Israeli police at checkpoints leading to Jerusalem as they protested restrictions on Muslim prayers at the Al Aqsa mosque in the walled Old City. Officers fired stun grenades to disperse the crowd after youths hurled rocks, police spokesman Micky Rosenfeld said.

Israel has barred men younger than 40 from attending Friday prayers at the mosque during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, citing security concerns. Arab leaders have decried the restrictions as a violation of religious freedom.

More than 150,000 worshipers attended Friday's prayers.

Bush Strengthens Sanctions On Sudan (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

President Bush signed an executive order Friday that stiffens sanctions on Sudan and its oil industry in an effort to persuade the government to accept U.N. peacekeepers and stop killings of civilians in Darfur.

The president signed the Darfur Peace and Accountability Act to address the crisis in the western region of Sudan where at least 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million people have been displaced in three years of fighting.

The act imposes sanctions against those responsible for genocide, backs measures to protect civilians and humanitarian operations and supports peace efforts in the war-torn land, according to the order issued by the White House Friday on evening. The order continues a countrywide blocking of the Sudan government's property, and prohibits transactions related to Sudan's oil sector.

"The government of Sudan continues to implement policies and actions that violate human rights, in particular with respect to the conflict in Darfur," Bush said in his order.

"The pervasive role played by the government of Sudan in Sudan's petroleum and petrochemical industries threatens U.S. national security and foreign policy interests."

Bush's executive action expands on an earlier executive order issued by President Clinton in 1997.

The action taken Friday maintains robust U.S. sanctions on Sudan while facilitating U.S. assistance and investment in the development and reconstruction of Southern Sudan.

United Nations investigators and rights groups have blamed the bulk of the atrocities on the janjaweed, a pro-government militia that is widely accused of killing villagers and setting fire to their homes. The government denies supporting the janjaweed.

Despite a May peace agreement, aid workers and rights organizations agree with the Crisis Group's assessment that violence has increased in recent months.

The U.N. Security Council voted in August to replace the weak African Union peacekeeping mission with a much bigger U.N. force. But Sudan President Omar al-Bashir and his ruling National Congress Party have refused to let the U.N. peacekeepers deploy, claiming they would breach Sudan's sovereignty.

'Perfect Storm' Brewing In Georgia (WT)

By David R. Sands, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

The bitter dispute that erupted last month between Russia and Georgia is a "perfect storm" of mutual suspicion and hostility in which both sides have their reasons for escalating the tension, regional security analysts say.

Russia-Georgia relations, never good in the best of times, have plummeted after Moscow's harsh reaction to the Sept. 27 arrest and expulsion of four Russian soldiers in Tbilisi on espionage charges.

Russia cut mail and transportation links to Georgia and deported scores of Georgians for purported immigration-law violations. There also have been reports of intimidation of Georgian nationals and businesses in Moscow.

The European Union and the U.N. Security Council have appealed for calm, but both Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili and Russian President Vladimir Putin could benefit from the clash, said Charles King, an Eastern European specialist who teaches at Georgetown University.

"The crisis is a perfect storm that serves the interests of both Russia and Georgia to continually up the ante," Mr. King said. "They may not want war, but they could take all the steps up to war."

Bruce Jackson, president of the Washington-based Project on Transitional Democracies, said both leaders are playing for stakes that are larger than the fate of a few spies.

"Both Putin and Saakashvili think they can derive benefits from escalation," said Mr. Jackson, who said this week that it was "more likely than not" that there will be further deportations and violence before the crisis eased.

Mr. King said the pro-Western Mr. Saakashvili was banking on a Russian "overreaction" to boost his popularity at home and to attract U.S. and European support for Georgia's long-term hopes to break away from Moscow's influence and join such Western institutions as NATO and the European Union.

Tbilisi has also tried to raise international opposition to Russia's backing of separatist movements in Georgia's South Ossetia and Abkhazia enclaves, which have resisted central control since Georgia gained independence from the collapsing Soviet Union in April 1991. Mr. Saakashvili's strong stand on the so-called "frozen conflicts" has helped reverse a decline in his political popularity in the three years since he led Georgia's democratic Rose Revolution.

In an opinion piece in the Wall Street Journal on Thursday, Mr. Saakashvili slammed what he called Russia's "unprovoked onslaught" and accused Russian leaders of trying to "smite the success story to the south."

Mr. Saakashvili's real audience, Mr. King said, is Washington.

"A fight with Russia keeps Georgia on the U.S. agenda," he said. "Brinksmanship can be played with one's friends as well as one's enemies."

The Georgian leader said his country "will do all that is necessary to ease the current tensions," but on the same day, his government announced that it was postponing indefinitely talks on a deal that would allow Russia to enter the World Trade Organization.

Mr. King said Russia and Mr. Putin are equally keen to slap down Georgia, in part to punish Tbilisi for its desire to ally with the European Union and United States and in part to show Ukraine and other former Soviet states on its border the costs of pulling away from Moscow in favor of the West.

With Mr. Putin set to step down as president in 2008, his potential successors are also competing to see who can take the harder line in defense of Russian national interests in the Georgian standoff.

But Russia's hard line is expected to come under fire when EU leaders meet with Mr. Putin next week at a summit in Finland. A draft summit statement being considered by EU foreign ministers expresses "grave concern" over Russia's recent actions against Georgia, according to press reports.

London And Dublin Offer Northern Ireland A Compromise (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

DOJ_NMG_0081194

ST. ANDREWS, Scotland, Oct. 13 — After three days of closed-door negotiations, Britain and Ireland on Friday offered a compromise formula to restore Northern Ireland's power-sharing government by next March, allowing for an election or referendum to endorse the deal.

While the package was not immediately embraced by the province's fractious political parties, it gave them until Nov. 10 to hold meetings among their followers and then give their answer to what was promptly named the St. Andrews Agreement. But it is not certain that an agreement sponsored by London and Dublin will be enough to survive the tripwires of Northern Ireland's fissured politics.

The main parties, the Roman Catholic Sinn Fein and the Protestant Democratic Unionist Party, promised to respond by Nov. 10. If they consent, their action will begin a choreographed sequence of events to permit the power-sharing government set up under the Good Friday Agreement of 1998 to be restored. It was suspended four years ago in a dispute over alleged espionage by the Irish Republican Army.

Restoration of the power-sharing government, consisting of an executive branch as well as the existing local assembly, would be an important step toward ending Northern Ireland's anomalous political status at a time when its people have become used to relative peace and economic growth.

At a news conference, Prime Ministers Tony Blair of Britain and Bertie Ahern of Ireland refrained from high-flown language to herald the end of the negotiations. "I think we have a way forward here," Mr. Blair told reporters in the golf resort where the talks took place.

The Rev. Ian Paisley, the 80-year-old Protestant leader, said his party had made "considerable progress throughout the course of these talks."

The Democratic Unionists, who want a continued union with Britain, had been pressing for Sinn Fein, which seeks a united Ireland and is the political wing of the Irish Republican Army, to commit itself completely to respecting the province's police force, which Sinn Fein regards as a Protestant-dominated adversary.

Sinn Fein has been pressing for Mr. Paisley's agreement to sit in a power-sharing government as first minister with a republican leader as his deputy — an idea that would once have been unthinkable. The agreement means each side would have to accept the other's demands for the deal to unfold.

On Friday, at least, they seemed determined to do that. "We need to find ways to put differences behind us," said Gerry Adams, the Sinn Fein leader.

Mr. Paisley seemed equally ready to compromise. "Today we stand at a crossroads," he said. "We stand at a place where there is a road to democracy and there is a road to anarchy, and I trust that we will see in the coming days the vast majority of people taking to the road of democracy."

Initially, Britain threatened to shut down the Northern Ireland Assembly and resume direct rule of the troubled province if the parties did not agree to settle their differences by Nov. 24. That deadline now seems to have slipped well into next year.

The St. Andrews Agreement lays out a schedule of events, beginning with a preparatory caucus for political leaders in Northern Ireland starting Tuesday. Then, if they agree to continue the settlement deal by Nov. 10, the assembly would meet on Nov. 24.

On that day, the assembly would nominate a first minister and a deputy. According to a British official, those two figures — likely to be Mr. Paisley and Sinn Fein's Martin McGuinness — would "not take up their role" on that day. But the presence of the two men technically in the same administration would offer a heady symbol of power sharing intended to breathe confidence into the agreement.

The next steps would be for the so-called Independent Monitoring Commission to report in January on the status of the Irish Republican Army's pledge to renounce violence, followed by a referendum or election in March to endorse the St. Andrews Agreement.

Most participants except Mr. Paisley favored a referendum, according to a participant who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to disclose details of the deliberations.

Finally, the local executive body would be revived on March 26. But if the parties failed to set up the executive, or failed to agree "at any stage," the assembly would be dissolved.

The agreement also provides for the British government to inject unspecified financial support into the province, which is already heavily dependent on central government financing.

A critical element of the agreement relates to Sinn Fein's demand that the police in Northern Ireland be controlled by the local executive, giving Sinn Fein more influence over the force. The agreement suggests that the local government could assume control of the police by May 2008.

Deal Would Revive N. Ireland Assembly (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Power-Sharing Plan Faces Hurdles

LONDON, Oct. 13 -- The prime ministers of Britain and Ireland on Friday announced plans for Northern Ireland's Protestants and Catholics to share power in a deal that would restore the province's suspended local government by next March.

"I think we have a way forward here," British Prime Minister Tony Blair said at a news conference with his Irish counterpart, Bertie Ahern. The breakthrough came after three days of intensive talks with Northern Ireland's main political players in the Scottish resort town of St. Andrews.

Creating a local assembly in which Catholics and Protestants govern together was a cornerstone of the 1998 Good Friday accords. That pact set out a framework for lasting peace in the British province, where three decades of sectarian conflict claimed more than 3,600 lives until a cease-fire in 1997. The first assembly collapsed in October 2002 amid the mutual suspicion between Catholic and Protestant leaders that has long poisoned the province's politics.

While the assembly officially reconvened in May, officials have been unable to agree on a power-sharing plan between the "nationalist" Catholics, represented by Sinn Fein, who favor reunification with the Republic of Ireland, and the "unionist" Protestants, represented mainly by the Democratic Unionist Party, who favor continued British rule.

Blair and Ahern had said that if the parties could not reach agreement by Nov. 24, the province would have everything from water rates to education controlled by the central government in London. The St. Andrews talks were an attempt to avert that outcome, which is particularly opposed by Sinn Fein and its leaders, Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness.

Blair and Ahern said on Friday that Northern Ireland's political parties would have until Nov. 10 to agree to the plan. If they do, they would also nominate the two ministers who would lead the assembly -- most likely the Rev. Ian Paisley, head of the Democratic Unionists, as the first minister, and McGuinness as his deputy. The ministers would not actually assume full power until March 26, a delay officials said would give each side time to assess the other's commitment to the power-sharing agreement.

Blair also said the agreement would have to be approved by the province's voters in some sort of referendum.

Blair and Ahern said the plan requires each side to compromise. Sinn Fein would have to endorse and support the province's police force, which is still predominantly Protestant. Sinn Fein officials have been reluctant to recognize the force until they believe that it more fully represents Catholic interests.

The Democratic Unionists and Paisley, their hard-line leader, would have to agree to collaborate in a government with Sinn Fein, the political affiliate of the Irish Republican Army, which waged a guerrilla war in the province for decades before announcing last year that it had laid down its weapons for good. Paisley has often said he refuses to govern with men he considers "terrorists."

If the voters approve the deal and the main political parties find the arrangement satisfactory, the assembly would choose the rest of its leadership on March 14 and London would restore the provincial government's authority on March 26.

Officials from the main political parties said they would consult with their members about the proposal.

Paisley said the nationalists, or republicans, had a "delivery to make."

"Delivering on the pivotal issue of policing and the rule of law starts now," he said.

Adams said: "Common-sense political realism and the interest of all our people demand we achieve this."

Renewed Optimism Over N Ireland Deal (FT)

By Christopher Adams And John Murray Brown

DOJ_NMG_0081196

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

Tony Blair and Bertie Ahern, the Irish Taoiseach, on Friday set out a timetable for returning devolved power to Northern Ireland, amid evidence that republicans and unionists were edging closer to a deal over power-sharing.

On Friday, the final day of three days of multi-party talks in St Andrews, Scotland, Mr Blair said the province could have devolved government by March 26 if the parties endorse the plan by November 10.

There was optimism that Ian Paisley's Democratic Unionists and Sinn Fein could within weeks overcome long-standing differences and agree to form a joint power-sharing executive.

The provincial assembly in Stormont has been suspended since October 2002 and the UK has set a November 24 deadline for the parties to strike a deal

One person close to the negotiations told the Financial Times that the first step in the process, assuming the parties agreed, would be for Gerry Adams, Sinn Fein president, to call a meeting of his national executive to recommend a special conference on policing.

Mr Paisley and Sinn Fein's Martin McGuinness would then be appointed first and deputy first ministers of the Stormont assembly, but in shadow form without wielding real power.

As they prepared for government, it is hoped Sinn Fein would approve recognition of the Police Service of Northern Ireland – a key DUP demand – at its special conference.

The republicans' acceptance of policing has been a key stumbling block to agreement. Sinn Fein has demanded that the assembly and executive be set up first.

The deal might then be endorsed by referendum or by fresh elections to the assembly.

After lengthy overnight talks, Thursday's pessimistic mood began to dissipate. A news conference originally scheduled for midday was deferred and was expected at around 4pm local time.

Mr Adams, who spoke briefly to reporters outside the isolated hotel where the talks were being held, refused to go into detail about how discussions were going.

However, he hinted at a growing sense of optimism.

"I don't want to add to any rumour machine or anything else. All I'm going to say at this point is thank God it's a lovely day and it's work in progress...This process is based on optimism of the will."

Peter Hain, Northern Ireland secretary, has said the government will dissolve the assembly by parliamentary order and stop paying the representatives' salaries if the parties fail to meet the November deadline for agreement.

Mr Blair said there would be some process of electoral endorsement in March, either with a referendum or elections.

The prime minister put a positive gloss on the talks, but acknowledged there was still some way to go to secure a deal and that the talks could yet unravel.

"It is a pretty brave and bold move to say absolutely for sure that no-one will attempt to unpick any aspect of it [the draft agreement]," he said.

Mr Paisley declared afterwards: "The days of the gunman in government are hopefully over."

"More work is required on a number of issues, not least to institutions and structures of devolved power." he said

And, referring to concerns over Sinn Fein's stance on policing, he added that "it is deeds not deadlines that count".

Mr Adams said he would consult with Sinn Fein members and the wider republican community. "Republicans have delivered big time in recent times...in order to be part in a progressive way of finding a solution we have to acknowledge we have been part of the problem," he said.

N. Ireland Talks Yield Progress (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

Both sides are optimistic after Blair and Ahern draw up a proposal for a new joint government.

DOJ_NMG_0081197

LONDON — After three days of intense negotiations while locked in at a Scottish golf resort, the prime ministers of Britain and Ireland failed to bring Northern Ireland's feuding parties to immediate agreement on power sharing, but worked out a proposal that could establish a new joint government by March.

The talks diplomatically ignored a Nov. 24 deadline for settling the long-standing conflict, but held out the possibility of a resolution during another five months of consultations, concessions and tentative steps toward a shared future.

"Today we stand at a crossroads," the Rev. Ian Paisley, leader of the Democratic Unionist Party, said Friday after the talks, which he said made "considerable progress."

"We stand at a place where there is a road to democracy and there is a road to anarchy, and I trust that we will see in the coming days the vast majority of people taking to the road of democracy," the Protestant leader said. "The days of the gunmen in government are hopefully over forever."

Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams said he was committed to "put all these divisions behind us and to resolve all of these differences."

"Common sense, political realism and the interests of all sections of our people demand that we achieve this," the republican leader said.

Years of violent conflict between Protestant British loyalists and Roman Catholic republicans hoping for a united Ireland have been followed by more years of missed deadlines and failed agreements toward achieving a lasting peace. The result was that the British government turned up the heat on the process and imposed the November deadline for the parties to either reach agreement on restoring the Northern Ireland Assembly and a shared executive, as the administration is called, or face dissolution of the Assembly and return to direct rule by London.

Both sides have been generally willing to work out an agreement, but ran aground once again this week on two issues: Sinn Fein's reluctance to recognize a police force that has often been used as an instrument of repression; and the refusal of DUP leaders to sit in a government with Sinn Fein until assured it had abandoned its militant, Irish Republican Army-linked past and, especially, was willing to accept the police.

The proposed agreement and timetable set out by British Prime Minister Tony Blair and his Irish counterpart, Bertie Ahern, recognizes that the remaining hurdles are as much choreography as substance — if Sinn Fein accepts the police, the DUP will probably accept Sinn Fein, but who blinks first? — and establishes a series of confidence-building measures.

The proposal demands agreement on police and power sharing. But it also gives the parties time to consult with their bases and seek voter approval of significant policy moves.

Each party has until Nov. 10 to respond. If they agree in principle, the Northern Ireland Assembly will nominate a leader, presumably from the DUP, and a deputy leader, from Sinn Fein, on Nov. 24. But significantly, the executive does not take power until elections are held in March.

If all goes smoothly, party leaders would nominate members of the full governing executive March 14, and London would hand over governing authority March 26.

The British prime minister, who has worked to make resolution of the Northern Ireland conflict a hallmark of his administration, flew to the Scottish city of St. Andrews and blocked out a full 48 hours from his schedule to sit with Ahern and try to push the parties to agreement. He said the proposed deal provided "a sound basis" that required compromises from both sides.

"We want a new dispensation in Northern Ireland where there is a shared future and where people can resolve their differences in a democratic way," Blair said. "And so it's a simple deal in the end. It's about, on the one hand, equality, respect for people who hold different views … and exclusively peaceful means being used in order to decide differences."

Ahern said the proposed agreement provided "all of the elements" needed for a final resolution. "If not perfect by anybody's agenda, it is a fair and sustainable balance to try to, by March, make sure we have a working executive based on power sharing and acceptance of policing and the rule of law."

Chile Holds Own In Global Market (LAT)

By Marla Dickerson

DOJ_NMG_0081198

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

While other countries fear China and maintain high tariffs; the Latin nation is tearing down trade barriers to Beijing.

SANTIAGO, Chile — Chinese competition has put hundreds of textile manufacturers in Latin America out of business. It gave Jose Ramon de Camino Muxi a new start.

After visiting China many times in the 1990s, the Chilean entrepreneur was convinced that his family's wool and cotton operations would be shredded by mammoth factories there. But he didn't despair. He decided to let China do his manufacturing for him.

De Camino now peddles Chinese-made footwear through his 10 Payless ShoeSource retail shops in Chile. And he sells wholesale shoes and fabrics with the "Made in China" label to mom-and-pop stores around the country. De Camino said his $12-million enterprise is growing 20% a year. Business has never been better.

"China is my partner," he said on a recent afternoon amid the clatter of electric drills and hammers wielded by construction workers expanding his jam-packed warehouse. "I would not like to have the Chinese as an enemy."

De Camino's if-you-can't-beat-'em-join-'em attitude is an example of how Chile has cobbled one of Latin America's most successful trading relationships with the Asian giant. While other countries in the region maintain high tariffs on Chinese goods, Chile is busy tearing down trade barriers.

Over the last decade, China has become Chile's second-largest trading partner, behind the United States. Chile signed a free-trade agreement with China last year, the only Latin American country to have done so.

That might seem foolhardy for a nation of only 16 million souls, whose manufacturing base is dwarfed by that of the world's most populous country. But Chile ran a $1.9-billion trade surplus with China last year, mainly because of surging copper exports to feed voracious Chinese demand.

Chinese-made merchandise is swamping store shelves and showrooms in Chile. Chinese imports hit a record $2.5 billion last year, about 8.5% of Chile's total purchases from foreigners. China supplies nearly half of Chile's imported consumer goods such as clothing and electronics, up from one-tenth in 1996.

But in contrast to countries such as Mexico, where domestic producers are clamoring for protection, Chilean manufacturers are among the strongest supporters of the free-trade deal with China.

"You can't close the door. That's the reality," said Patricia Perez, general manager of a Santiago-based medical products company and president of AsexmaChile, an exporters' trade group. "We see an opportunity to find niches for our products in China … and to make Chile a platform" for Chinese manufacturing and trade with the rest of Latin America.

That view is not widely shared across the region despite a Chinese-led commodities boom that is fueling robust economic growth. In addition to snapping up raw materials from aluminum to wood pulp, China is investing in railways, pipelines, highways and satellites. Analysts credit low-cost Chinese-made consumer goods for helping keep inflation in check and for boosting the buying power of the poor. Still, many in Latin America view China and other fast-growing Asian nations as rivals that are stealing jobs, soaking up foreign investment, threatening domestic industries and pushing them out of world markets.

In 1980, the combined economies of the nations of Latin America and the Caribbean were twice as large as those of China and India together. By 2004, they were 20% smaller than the two Asian countries, according to a recent World Bank report.

China and India's share of world exports is 50% larger than those of Latin America and the Caribbean. In 1990, the reverse was true. China's economy averaged 8.5% growth from 1981 to 2000, while Latin America's barely budged and poverty remains entrenched.

"Blame for the private sector's poor performance … often falls on the growing presence of China," said the World Bank report released in August.

Mexico and the natural resource-poor nations of Central America are particularly wary. In contrast to their South American counterparts, they sell little to China and are running trade deficits with the Asian nation.

They are also losing out in export markets. Ten years ago, China wasn't even ranked among Chile's top-ten trading partners. Today it's No. 2, behind the United States.

Central America has lost thousands of apparel and textile jobs to Asia. Mexico, Brazil and Argentina together have initiated more anti-dumping cases against China than the European Union, the United States or Canada, according to the World Bank, which says the approach is counterproductive.

"Instead of responding with protectionist policies, the region should adopt offensive strategies to take advantage of the overall positive effects of high Chinese and Indian growth," said Guillermo Perry, chief economist of the Latin America region for the World Bank.

Chile, which is thinly populated but blessed with natural resources and educated citizens, has been opening its economy for more than three decades.

In the 1970s, its military rulers decided that trade, private enterprise and increased productivity were keys to raising living standards. They adopted a policy of unilateral liberalization to drop tariffs, open Chile's markets and force its companies to sink or swim against global competitors.

Now a full-fledged democracy, Chile enjoys one of the highest standards of living in Latin America and has become an accomplished world trader. Gross national income per capita was $5,870 in 2005, second to Mexico's $7,310 in Latin America, according to the World Bank.

Exports accounted for nearly 40% of the nation's gross domestic product last year. The nation has free-trade agreements with some of the world's largest economies, including the U.S., Canada, Mexico, the European Union and South Korea. It's currently in negotiations with Japan and India.

Thus Chile had no fear of signing a pact with China, Perez of AsexmaChile said.

Chilean stores were stocked with plenty of Chinese goods before the agreement, thanks to Chile's meager tariffs averaging about 6%. Perez said most of AsexmaChile's 500 members figure that Chile got the better end of the deal because it will eventually win tariff-free access for 92% of its exports to China.

"We're already competing with the whole world here," she said. "We aren't afraid."

Still, the agreement underscores how important Asia trade is to Chile. Although Chile's exports are well-balanced, with about 23% of its $39 billion in 2005 exports going to North America and 25% to Europe, Asia now accounts for the largest chunk at 36%. Chile last year shipped $4.4 billion worth of copper, wine, fish meal, vegetables, wood pulp and other products to China. That's more than 11% of Chile's total exports and nearly one-third of its exports to Asia.

Chile's Ministry of Exterior Relations has beefed up its Asian department. Entrepreneurs are taking Mandarin classes and going on trade missions to China.

Shoe importer De Camino recently returned from his 34th trip there since 1987. An exuberant man who wears pinstriped suits and drives a Jaguar, he credits China for helping keep inflation low and for allowing Chileans to stretch their pesos.

A room in his offices in the capital's outskirts is crammed with this season's offerings — spike-heeled boots, sexy pumps, sleek basketball shoes.

Chileans are fashion conscious, he said, but most can't afford to spend a fortune on footwear. De Camino said Chilean design combined with Chinese manufacturing prowess have allowed him to deliver good-looking shoes at reasonable prices.

"Ten years ago you would have paid $100 for these," he said, grabbing a pair of Air Jordan knockoffs. "I can sell them for $20 now, thanks to China."

De Camino acknowledges that his staff of 100 is half what it was when his family had manufacturing plants in Chile. But he dismisses the notion that China's development is a danger.

He said that China would eventually become the world's largest economy and that the rest of Latin American would do well to learn how to work with it rather than throw up trade barriers.

"It's impossible to go back," he said. "Everybody needs China."

Book Outlines How Spy Exposed U.S. Intelligence Secrets To Cuba (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

DOJ_NMG_0081200

WASHINGTON - A senior Cuba analyst for the Defense Intelligence Agency gave Havana detailed information on U.S. eavesdropping programs aimed at the Castro government, allowing Cuba to mount effective counterintelligence and deception operations for year, according to a new book on U.S. intelligence failures.

Cuban spy Ana Belen Montes, who was born in Puerto Rico, enjoyed nearly unfettered access to classified information until she was caught in 2001. She's now serving a 25-year prison term.

The book, "Enemies: How America's Foes are Stealing Our Vital Secrets and How We Let it Happen" was written by Bill Gertz, a defense correspondent for The Washington Times.

In it, Gertz reports that Montes leaked so many significant U.S. secrets to Havana that some U.S. officials rank the damage she did with that caused by Aldrich Ames and Robert Hanssen, the infamous CIA and FBI turncoats for Moscow whose information resulted in the deaths of dozens of U.S. agents.

"Montes was the first national-level analyst from the intelligence community known to have turned traitor and the most damaging Cuban spy arrested to date," Gertz wrote, quoting from a still-classified damage assessment report on Montes.

U.S. intelligence officials consulted by McClatchy Newspapers confirmed that Gertz's book reflects the intelligence community's assessment of the Montes case, although some of the more sensitive information remains under wraps.

Gertz has written several books on intelligence matters.

U.S. officials believe Montes did the greatest damage by giving Cuba information on U.S. electronic eavesdropping systems, which were the primary sources of intelligence on Cuba since Washington had long found it all but impossible to recruit spies within the island, Gertz wrote.

During a briefing from the National Security Agency she received in 1999, Montes learned about "every single NSA eavesdropping program targeted against Cuba and Latin America," according to Gertz's book.

She also learned about current and proposed electronic spying systems by taking part in planning sessions for future imagery and other intelligence-gathering programs, the book adds.

Montes had access to an intelligence community computer system, the Corporate Information Retrieval and Storage system, which includes information from the CIA, the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research, the NSA, the FBI and other sources, Gertz wrote.

The book notes that Montes also sat on an interagency group known as the Hard Target Committee, which discussed operations in places such as Iran, China and North Korea. The book doesn't say if the information was passed to those countries.

Through Montes, the Cubans obtained a clear picture of what Washington knew and didn't know about Cuba, allowing Havana to carry out "a robust denial and deception program," according to the damage assessment report.

Some of her disinformation included a 1998 U.S. intelligence report that downplayed the threat of Cuban armed forces and its bio-weapons capabilities, and a 1993 paper that said the Cuban military wanted closer ties with the United States, Gertz wrote.

The book also says there are "indications" that her spying may have led to the deaths of some U.S. agents in Latin America, but it provides no details. Court records show Montes leaked the identities of four U.S. agents in Cuba. Those agents weren't harmed.

The damage assessment report, however, paints an embarrassing picture for U.S. spy-catchers: Montes met her Cuban handlers, posing as business people, students or academics, at Washington restaurants more than 100 times, sometimes twice a week.

Montes, who pleaded guilty to spying charges, told a Washington courtroom that she had spied for Cuba out of conviction that U.S. policies were causing undue suffering to Cubans and that Havana paid her little or no money for her work.

According to Gertz, Cuba recruited Montes around 1985. She first came under U.S. suspicion in 1994, when Cuba detected a highly secret electronic surveillance system. Montes took a polygraph test and passed it.

Montes came under suspicion again in 2000, when Cuban officials uncovered a U.S. agent working in Cuba for a special intelligence program, Gertz wrote. Montes was one of the few U.S. officials familiar with the operation. The FBI placed her under surveillance and arrested her in 2001.

Micro-Credit Pioneer Wins Peace Prize (WP)

Economist, Bank Brought New Opportunity to Poor

PARIS, Oct. 13 -- Bangladeshi economist Muhammad Yunus and the Grameen Bank he created won the Nobel Peace Prize on Friday for leveraging small loans into major social change for impoverished families.

The Grameen Bank's pioneering use of micro-credit has been duplicated across the globe since Yunus started the project in his home village three decades ago. Loans as low as $9 have helped beggars start small businesses and poor women buy cellular phones and basket-weaving materials.

"Lasting peace cannot be achieved unless large population groups find ways in which to break out of poverty," the Norwegian Nobel Committee said in its citation released Friday in Oslo. "Micro-credit is one such means."

The committee praised Yunus, 66, as "a leader who has managed to translate visions into practical action for the benefit of millions of people, not only in Bangladesh but across cultures and civilizations."

In a telephone interview, Yunus said he was overcome by the excitement of winning the prize after several years of being nominated.

"I was trying to find people to tell, and the phone kept buzzing, so I could hardly tell anybody," said Yunus, speaking from his home in Dhaka, the capital of Bangladesh. "Then people started coming and bringing flowers. It's fantastic."

Still exuberant after hours of telephone calls and hundreds of visitors pouring into his house, Yunus said: "This prize is so overwhelming, it will affect our work tremendously. It will bring the issues I'm raising to the attention of people who can make a difference in the world.

"From this day on, micro-credit will become part of the financial center, it can't be kept as some kind of subsector," he said. "As a bank you have to reach the poor people. That's a big change, and banking will not be the same."

Yunus said he believes the Nobel committee endorsed his view that bridging the gap between rich and poor countries in an age of increasing globalization is critical to reducing conflict around the world.

"You cannot go on having absurd amounts of wealth when other people have problems of survival," he said. "If you can bring an end to poverty, at least from an economic point of view, you can have a more livable situation between very rich people and very poor people, very rich countries and very poor countries. That's our basic ingredient for peace."

Bangladesh's first Nobel Prize exhilarated a poor nation more accustomed to news of natural disasters, disease and political upheaval. A massive public assembly was planned for Saturday in Dhaka to honor Yunus and the Grameen Bank, according to bank officials who said their offices were besieged Friday by customers, citizens and politicians offering congratulations.

Yunus and the bank were surprise winners among the 191 nominees for the most prestigious of the Nobel awards. Speculation in recent days had focused on diplomats and officials who brokered last year's Aceh peace accord, which ended 29 years of fighting in the Indonesian province, and on global celebrities that included Bono, the U2 lead singer and anti-poverty campaigner.

The $1.4 million prize will be split between the Grameen Bank and Yunus, the bank's managing director. Yunus said he would use his share to set up a company to make low-cost, nutritious food for the poor and to establish an eye hospital for poor Bangladeshis.

Yunus and the Grameen Bank are hardly household names outside of Bangladesh, but Yunus has been one of the world's most prominent and renowned leaders of poverty alleviation. The Grameen Bank model has been duplicated in more than 100 countries, from Uganda to Malaysia to Chicago's South Side.

The Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation recognized the bank's efforts in August, providing a $1.5 million grant to expand its work worldwide through the Grameen Foundation.

A gentle, soft-spoken man who has been feted by kings and presidents for his groundbreaking and tireless efforts to improve the lives of poor families, Yunus nonetheless has remained most at ease in the steamy Bangladeshi villages where the bank's clients -- mostly sari-clad women -- line up at makeshift tables to repay their loans.

Yunus launched the idea of the Grameen Bank after he returned to Bangladesh from the United States to take a teaching job in the economics department at Chittagong University.

Alarmed at the poverty created by ongoing famine, he and his students started an experimental project giving women $27 loans to buy straw to make stools.

The bank they created -- Grameen means "village" in the Bengali language -- not only defied conventional lending rules by making loans to the poorest of the poor, but challenged cultural taboos by giving most of the loans to women in a Muslim-dominated society where rural women at the time were seldom allowed to touch money or work outside of their homes. The bank issues most of its loans to women because Yunus discovered that they spent their money more carefully and paid back the loans in far high percentages than did men.

Today, the bank has 6.61 million borrowers and 2,226 branches. The bank reports that it has lent $5.72 billion over the past 30 years and claims a 98 percent repayment rate.

"Micro-credit has proved to be an important liberating force in societies where women in particular have to struggle against repressive social and economic conditions," the Nobel Prize committee said in its citation Friday.

Three years ago, the bank started a program to give beggars -- or "struggling members" -- lines of credit of about $9 to purchase small items such as bread, candy, pickles and toys. Recipients of the loans then resell the goods "to supplement their begging," according to the bank's description of the program, which is intended not only to empower beggars, but to boost their morale and dignity.

"Yunus's long-term vision is to eliminate poverty in the world," the Nobel Prize committee said. "That vision cannot be realized by means of micro-credit alone. But Muhammad Yunus and Grameen Bank have shown that, in the continuing efforts to achieve it, micro-credit must play a major part."

Peace Prize To Pioneer Of Loans To Poor No Bank Would Touch (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

A Bangladeshi economist, Muhammad Yunus, and the bank he founded 30 years ago won the Nobel Peace Prize yesterday for pioneering work in giving tiny loans to millions of poor people no commercial bank would touch — destitute widows and abandoned wives, landless laborers and rickshaw drivers, sweepers and beggars.

The Nobel Committee praised Mr. Yunus, 66, and the Grameen Bank for making microcredit, as the loans are called, a practical solution to combating rural poverty in Bangladesh and inspiring similar schemes across the developing world.

“Microcredit has proved to be an important liberating force in societies where women in particular have to struggle against repressive social and economic conditions,” the committee said in announcing the prize.

Mr. Yunus has long been an influential champion of the idea that even the most impoverished people have the drive and creativity to build small businesses with loans as small as $12, and Grameen Bank has dedicated itself to helping the poorest of the poor.

The borrowers used the money to buy milk-giving cows, or bamboo to craft stools, or yarn to weave into stoles, or incense to sell in stalls, among myriad other money-making schemes.

Reached in Dhaka, Bangladesh, by telephone yesterday, Mr. Yunus recalled the day in 1976 when he reached into his own pocket to give his first loan, $27, to 42 villagers living near Chittagong University where he said he was then teaching “elegant theories of economics.” The borrowers invested the money and repaid him in full, though they had no collateral and signed nothing.

He said he asked himself that day, “If you can make so many people so happy with such a small amount of money, why shouldn’t you do more of it?”

Still, over the years, Mr. Yunus faced skeptics and detractors, as it became clear that microcredit loans, alluring as they were, were not by themselves a panacea for poverty.

Some in the microfinance business have questioned the Grameen Bank's focus on serving the poorest, arguing the industry would grow faster and have more impact if it aimed at a wider pool of borrowers, including those struggling just above the poverty line.

Others have sometimes criticized what they see as Grameen's unconventional accounting practices (which Mr. Yunus said yesterday were fully transparent) — or maintained that Grameen should have been more of a leader in combining microcredit with health and education services, or in lending to poor people who need money not to start businesses, but to pay their bills, or cover their children's school fees.

But in interviews yesterday, Mr. Yunus's skeptics and fans alike credited him and Grameen with helping to fundamentally change the way the world saw the potential of poor people and to popularize the movement to provide financial services to the poor.

"Yunus was one of the early visionaries who believed in the idea of poor people as viable, worthy, attractive clients for loans," said Elizabeth Littlefield, who heads the Consultative Group to Assist the Poor, a research institution supported by microfinance donors. "That simple notion has put in motion a huge range of imitators and innovators who have taken that idea and run with it, improved on it, expanded it."

Or, as the Nobel committee put it: "Yunus's long-term vision is to eliminate poverty in the world. That vision cannot be realized by means of microcredit alone. But Muhammad Yunus and Grameen Bank have shown that, in the continuing effort to achieve it, microcredit must play a major part."

The prize was another that fell under a broader definition of peace, awarded by the committee not for traditional conflict resolution, but rather development work, and followed the 2004 award to a Kenyan environmentalist, Wangari Maathai.

Indeed, in the decades since Mr. Yunus's first loan, microcredit has become one of the most popular antipoverty strategies in the world. Last year, more than 100 million people received small loans from more than 3,100 institutions in 130 countries, according to Microcredit Summit, a Washington-based nonprofit advocacy group that Mr. Yunus helped found. The average loan from Grameen Bank was $130.

Over the years, the movement to provide financial services to the poor has become more capacious, stressing the need for services beyond loans — for safe places to save small amounts of money, for crop and life insurance, for inexpensive ways to transfer money earned in distant cities and foreign countries to families back home.

In the 1970's, when Mr. Yunus was getting started, the idea that poor people were a good credit risk seemed far-fetched. The United States Agency for International Development had conducted a global survey of banking services in poor communities and found failure after failure, said Jonathan J. Morduch, an economics professor at New York University who co-wrote a book on microcredits.

Many of the lenders then were state-owned banks that gave credit to politically connected elites rather than the poor people they were supposed to serve. And often at election time, vote-seeking politicians pressed the banks to forgive loans wholesale, leaving the institutions in terrible financial shape.

In 1974, Mr. Yunus, trained as an economist at Vanderbilt University, found himself teaching economics at Chittagong University when Bangladesh was struck by famine. "I decided I must do something," he said. He began working in nearby villages, among them Jobra, where he made his first loan in 1976.

He said he tried to persuade commercial banks to give loans to poor people who had no assets and had always been dependent on local moneylenders. But the bankers only did so when he personally co-signed as a guarantor.

Mr. Yunus's new model of banking for the poor had several unusual features, Professor Morduch said. Grameen lent to groups of five people, who helped ensure that each member repaid his or her share. It lent not only to farmers, but also to laborers and women who had a knack for crafts and shopkeeping. And it required borrowers to repay their loans in manageable, bite-sized weekly installments.

"He proved the impossible: that the poor were bankable," Professor Morduch said.

But Mr. Yunus's approach went beyond giving the poor economic opportunity to seeking deeper social change, said Amartya Sen, who, like Mr. Yunus, is a Bengali, an economist and a Nobel prize winner.

DOJ_NMG_0081204

Mr. Sen, a professor at Harvard, noted that Grameen's loans had gone overwhelmingly to women, giving financial clout to women who had little power in Bangladeshi society and often lived cloistered in their homes.

In the overwhelmingly Muslim nation of Bangladesh, Mr. Yunus's approach also offered hope and ideas to compete with the allure of fundamentalist Islamic causes.

"It's a very secular movement," Professor Sen said, "very egalitarian, market friendly and socially radical."

Those who have watched Mr. Yunus over the years remarked on his gifts as a salesman — his personal warmth, his talent for telling a story, his sheer ability to charm an audience. Those qualities were very much on display last month when he participated in a panel at a Sheraton hotel in New York during Bill Clinton's gathering of international do-gooders.

The theme was "Building a Sustainable Future," and Mr. Yunus told about how Grameen gave loans to beggars. He made hundreds of rich people — many of them looking for causes to support — laugh out loud and also tugged at their heartstrings.

"All we are doing is telling beggars that, well, since you go house to house begging, would you like to take some merchandise with you, some cookies, some candy, something?" he asked a crowd that hooted with delight at this clever notion.

"A typical loan for a beggar is something like $12," he said. "With $12, she has a basket of merchandise she carries around and goes house to house."

"Today, we have more than 80,000 beggars in the program," he said. "Many of them have already quit begging completely."

At that, the audience erupted in a sustained burst of applause. Mr. Yunus beamed.

Economist, Bank Win Nobel Peace Prize (AP)

By Farid Hossain, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

The simple yet revolutionary idea of loaning tiny sums to poor people looking to escape poverty by starting businesses won Bangladeshi economist Muhammad Yunus and the Grameen Bank he founded the Nobel Peace Prize on Friday.

Yunus' notion — today, known as microcredit — has spread around the globe in the past three decades and is said to have helped more than 100 million people take their first steps to rise out of poverty.

Some bought diary cows, others egg-laying hens. In recent years, money for a single cell phone has been enough to start thriving enterprises in isolated villages without phone lines from East Asia to West Africa.

"Lasting peace cannot be achieved unless large population groups find ways in which to break out of poverty," the Nobel Committee said in its citation in Oslo, Norway. "Microcredit is one such means. Development from below also serves to advance democracy and human rights."

The 65-year-old economist said he would use part of his share of the $1.4 million award to create a company to make low-cost, high-nutrition food for the poor. The rest would go toward setting up an eye hospital for the poor in Bangladesh, he said. The food company, to be known as Social Business Enterprise, will sell food for a nominal price.

Yunus is the first Nobel Prize winner from Bangladesh, a poverty-stricken Southeast Asian nation of about 141 million people on the Bay of Bengal.

"I am so, so happy, it's really a great news for the whole nation," Yunus told The Associated Press after the prize was announced. He was reached by telephone at his home in the Bangladeshi capital, Dhaka.

His joy was shared by those his microcredit program has helped.

"I can't express in words how happy I am," said Gulbadan Nesa, 40, who five years ago used $90 from the Grameen Bank to buy chickens so she could sell eggs. She's since taken more loans and expanded into selling building materials.

"Not long ago I was almost begging for money to feed my family," she said from Bishnurampur, her village in northern Bangladesh. "Today, I've got my own house and enough money to feed my children and send them to school."

Grameen, which means rural in the Bengali language, was the first lender to hand out microcredit, giving small loans to poor Bangladeshis who did not qualify for loans from conventional banks. No collateral is needed for Grameen loans, which average about $200.

But there is social pressure to repay. Recipients form groups of five and members qualify for future loans only if all are current on their old ones.

The results are hard to argue with — the bank says it has a 99 percent repayment rate.

The bank says it has loaned $5.72 billion to 6.6 million Bangladeshi, 97 percent of whom were women, and today provides services in more than 70,000 villages.

The success has allowed Grameen to expand its credit to include housing loans, financing for irrigation and fisheries as well as traditional savings accounts.

But Grameen is not without critics, many of whom focus on the bank's high interest rates. Its business loans carry a rate of 20 percent, significantly higher than the 10-15 percent charged by commercial banks.

"While the poor pay 20 percent interest for their loan, the rich pay much less. It can't be called social justice," said S.M. Akash, an economics professor at Dhaka University.

Reports routinely circulate in Bangladesh's media of people being forced to borrow from second or third sources, often at higher interest rates, to repay Grameen loans. But almost no one is willing put their names to such criticism in Bangladesh, where Yunus was considered a national hero even before the Nobel Prize was announced.

How much impact Grameen has had on Bangladesh's economy also remains an open question.

Poverty has decreased since Grameen was founded in 1983. Bangladesh's per capita income has grown from $280 in 1985 to $440 in 2006, according to World Bank figures.

While the bank was "a factor" in that success, economists "can't apportion exactly how much credit has to go with Grameen," said Jonathan Morduch, an expert on microfinance at New York University.

And even if per capita income has increased, overwhelmingly Muslim Bangladesh remains one of the world's poorest countries, a land beset by political unrest and the ever-present specter of another military coup.

In fact, the spread of Yunus' and Grameen's microcredit schemes around the world — they are now considered a key approach to spurring development — is arguably one of the few bright spots for Bangladesh since it won independence from Pakistan in 1973.

Worldwide, microcredit financing is estimated to have helped 92 million families last year alone, according to Jove Oliver, spokesman for the Microcredit Summit Campaign, part of the Washington-based Project Results Educational Fund.

Yunus told The Associated Press in 2004 that his "eureka moment" came while chatting to a shy woman weaving bamboo stools with calloused fingers.

Sufia Begum was a 21-year-old mother of three when he met her in 1974 and asked how much she earned. She replied that she borrowed about five taka, the equivalent of nine cents, from a middleman for the bamboo for each stool.

All but two cents of that went back to the lender.

"I thought to myself, my God, for five takas she has become a slave," Yunus said in the interview.

The following day, he and his students did a survey in the woman's village, Jobra, and discovered that 43 villagers owed a total of $27.

"I couldn't take it anymore. I put the $27 out there and told them they could liberate themselves," he said, and pay him back whenever they could. The idea was to buy their own materials and cut out the middleman.

Over the following year, they all paid him back — day by day.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Government Argues To Uphold Warrantless Surveillance Program (AP)

By Jim Irwin, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

DETROIT -- The Justice Department on Friday asked a federal appeals court to throw out a lower court decision that said the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program is unconstitutional.

The president has said the program is needed in the war on terrorism. U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit agreed with the program's opponents when she ruled Aug. 17 that the program violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers.

Government lawyers said in pleadings filed Friday with the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the surveillance program "is necessary to protect the nation from an ongoing national security threat of the highest order and is vital to waging and winning the ongoing armed conflict."

Taylor's injunction "dismantles a vital tool that already has helped detect and disrupt al-Qaida plots," the Justice Department attorneys argued. They also said Taylor's order barring use of the program "in any way" showed the judge dealt with sensitive national security issues in a "blunderbuss manner."

A three-judge panel of the Cincinnati-based appeals court ruled Oct. 4 that the administration could keep the program in place while it appeals Taylor's decision. The judges said their ruling considered the likelihood an appeal would succeed, the potential damage to both sides, and the public interest.

The appeal is likely to take months.

Taylor's ruling came in a lawsuit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union seeking to block the program. Kary Moss, executive director of the ACLU's Michigan chapter, said Friday that the government's arguments buttressed "a very dramatic power grab" by the Bush administration.

"There's an awful lot of hyperbole in there, and fear mongering -- suggesting we're at war when Congress has declared no war," Moss said in a telephone interview. "They want to act as a kingdom. But we live in a democracy."

The surveillance program monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links. A secret court has been set up to grant warrants for such surveillance, but the government says it can't always wait for a court to act.

The ACLU sued the National Security Agency in January on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers who claim the program has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets.

Similar lawsuits challenging the program have been filed by other groups, including in New York and San Francisco. The issue could wind up before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Southern Command Probe Gitmo Charges (AP)

By Andrew O. Selsky, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

The U.S. Southern Command on Friday launched an investigation into "credible allegations" that guards at Guantanamo Bay abused detainees, and appointed an Army colonel to head the probe.

The Pentagon's Inspector General's office told The Associated Press on Friday that it had ordered the Miami-based Southern Command to investigate after Marine Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, who represents a detainee at the U.S. naval base in eastern Cuba, filed the "hotline" complaint last week.

Vokey attached a sworn statement from his paralegal, Sgt. Heather Cerveny, 23, in which she said several guards in a bar at Guantanamo Bay bragged about beating detainees and described it as common practice.

"Other ones of them were talking about how when they get annoyed with the detainees, about how they hit them, or they punched them in the face," Cerveny said during a telephone interview Thursday night. "It was a general consensus that I (detected) that as a group this is something they did. That this was OK at Guantanamo, that this is how the detainees get treated."

Cerveny visited the U.S. Naval Base in Cuba last month and said she spent an hour with the guards at the military club. The guards quit discussing beating detainees after finding out she works for a detainee's legal team.

In her complaint, she wrote: "From the whole conversation, I understood that striking detainees was a common practice. ... Everyone in the group laughed at the others' stories of beating detainees."

Asked Thursday if the conversation could have been exaggerated bar talk, she said, "I don't think that they were trying to impress me in any way. They were already in a discussion in there when I walked into a group."

She said she filed the complaint because "I don't think it's right for us to be allowing these prisoners to be treated poorly ... I think we should hold ourselves to a higher standard."

Gary Comerford, spokesman for the Pentagon's Inspector General's office, told the AP that in the past two days, the case "has been referred to Southcom for action. They're going to have to look into this."

Gen. John Craddock, the commander of the Southern Command, said later Friday that he had ordered the investigation, headed by an Army colonel, to begin.

"The investigation is consistent with U.S. Southern Command's policy to investigate credible allegations of abuse" at Guantanamo detention facilities, the Southern Command said in a statement.

The military Joint Task Force that runs the detention camps in Guantanamo Bay pledged to work with investigators from the Southern Command, which oversees U.S. military operations in the Caribbean and Latin America.

"The Joint Task Force will cooperate fully with Southcom to learn the facts of the matter and will take action where misconduct is discovered," said Navy Cmdr. Rob Durand, spokesman for the detention center, in an e-mail to the AP from the base.

He insisted that his group's mission "is the safe and humane care and custody of detained enemy combatants. Abuse or harassment of detainees in any form is not condoned or tolerated."

The Inspector General receives 14,000 tips on misconduct each year via the hotline, and opens 3,000 cases each year as a result, Comerford said.

There are now 454 detainees at Guantanamo Bay, according to Vincent Lusser, a spokesman for the Geneva-based International Committee of the Red Cross.

The Red Cross just completed a two-week visit to the prison, meeting the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks and 13 other high-profile detainees who were transferred there weeks ago from CIA custody.

Guantanamo Bay began receiving prisoners, most of them captured in Afghanistan and Pakistan, in January 2002. Only 10 of the detainees have been charged with crimes.

Red Cross To Issue Suggestions To U.S. (AP)

By Andrew O. Selsky, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

The Red Cross will make confidential recommendations to the U.S. government after meeting at Guantanamo Bay with 14 new detainees, including the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, a spokesman for the humanitarian organization said.

The encounters apparently mark the first time the 14 detainees have spoken with anyone other than their captors since they were arrested. They had been held in CIA custody at secret locations, and were transferred weeks ago to the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in southeastern Cuba.

The men include Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, who allegedly planned the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States, as well as the alleged architect of the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole and the alleged plotter of the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania.

President Bush announced Sept. 6 that the 14 men had been moved from CIA custody to Guantanamo Bay for trial and that "there are now no terrorists in the CIA program."

The Red Cross would be concerned if the secret CIA prisons were to resume operation, Vincent Lusser, a spokesman for the International Committee of the Red Cross, told reporters in Geneva on Friday.

The Red Cross had been trying to obtain access to U.S. detainees in secret locations for a long time under the Geneva Conventions, Lusser said.

Red Cross officials, who are supposed to have access to all prisoners of war, said they were aware of the arrests of some detainees but were unable to find them in the U.S. detention facilities they visited. Until the 14 high-profile detainees were recently transferred to Guantanamo Bay, their whereabouts were unknown. The locations of the CIA prisons are secret.

Bush has left open the possibility of future secret detentions, saying that "having a CIA program for questioning terrorists will continue to be crucial to getting lifesaving information."

Simon Schorno, a Washington spokesman for the Red Cross, said the group would make recommendations to the U.S. government after visiting the 14 new "high-value" detainees at Guantanamo Bay this week. He gave no time frame, but stressed the recommendations would be confidential.

He said Red Cross officials met with all 14 of the new detainees, and gave each a standard one-page form to write letters to their family members, which — after going through U.S. military censorship — would be delivered by the Red Cross.

"We were able to speak to them privately," Schorno told The Associated Press in a telephone interview late Thursday.

"The detainee is not forced to speak to us," he added. "It is up to the detainee to raise any issues that fall within our concern, for example past detentions and current conditions. It's up to the detainee to address whatever he wants to address."

The Pentagon has confirmed that the Red Cross arrived at Guantanamo Bay on Sept. 25 and met the 14 newest detainees this week.

Mohammed was believed to be the No. 3 al-Qaida leader before he was captured in Pakistan in 2003. Also among the 14 new detainees are Ramzi Binalshibh, who is accused of helping plan the Sept. 11 attacks and being a lead operative for a foiled plot to crash aircraft into London's Heathrow Airport, and Abu Zubaydah, who was believed to be a link between Osama bin Laden and many al-Qaida cells before he was captured in Pakistan in 2002.

Lusser said there were now 454 detainees at Guantanamo and the Red Cross has private access to all of them. He said Red Cross workers in Afghanistan have visited the 600-odd detainees at the U.S. military prison at Bagram air base.

Coerced Confession Traps Detainee, Lawyers Say (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Former Prisoner of Taliban Held at Guantanamo

Young runaway Abdul Rahim endured cigarette burns, electric shocks and repeated beatings at the hands of Taliban soldiers who captured him in 2000, he said -- all because he refused to fight for al-Qaeda.

In one of the bizarre twists of war, the 22-year-old college student was taken from the Taliban prison to another prison run by Americans after the invasion of Afghanistan. And the U.S. military's chief reason for holding Rahim for the past five years, according to newly declassified records, is the false confession Rahim gave to placate his Taliban torturers.

Rahim's American lawyers filed the records in federal court in Washington this week, along with the results of their own investigation corroborating Rahim's claims of innocence, adding sworn statements from witnesses. They are asking a judge to order the military to admit that it made a mistake and release Rahim, who is being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The filings outline a chain of unfortunate circumstances. Rahim left his family home in the United Arab Emirates after a quarrel with his strict father and was captured by Taliban fighters as he crossed into Afghanistan. They took him to an al-Qaeda training camp, and when he tried to flee, soldiers put him in prison and tortured him, the records say.

While in a cell in Kandahar, Rahim said, he gave his captors what they wanted to hear: He falsely confessed on videotape that he was a spy for the United States and promised to renounce the West and wage jihad. Among the people who tortured him, he said, was one of America's most notorious enemies: al-Qaeda operative Muhammad Atef, who was killed in 2001.

Rahim's account of being imprisoned and tortured by the Taliban is supported by newspaper accounts about Rahim and fellow prisoners whom the Taliban abandoned when U.S. forces began bombing Afghanistan in the fall of 2001. It is also supported by documents from impartial agencies that had contact with Rahim, notably the International Committee of the Red Cross.

Navy Lt. Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon, a Defense Department spokesman, said in a statement yesterday that he could not comment on the specifics of Rahim's case, but he said detainees have several opportunities for review of their detention by military panels.

"There is a significant amount of evidence, both unclassified and classified, which supports detention by U.S. forces," he said. "This evidence has been carefully weighed at the Combatant Status Review Tribunals (CSRT) and Administrative Review Boards (ARB) held over the past two years at Guantanamo."

The U.S. military is detaining 440 foreign nationals at Guantanamo, and most have been there for more than 4 1/2 years.

The investigation and new records describe Rahim as a pawn trapped unfairly on both sides of the war on terrorism -- first in the Taliban's prison in Kandahar and then at Guantanamo. Given that much of the gathered information suggesting Rahim's innocence was available in 2001, his lawyers say the case raises alarms about the U.S. military's willingness to fairly assess decisions to indefinitely detain foreign nationals.

"They accused me of being a spy. And here, you guys accuse me of being al-Qaeda. No mercy. Who am I?" Rahim told a U.S. military tribunal, according to transcripts. "You take me from that prison and nothing changed in my life."

According to court records, in December 2001, a New York Times reporter quoted Rahim and other prisoners left behind when the Taliban fled the prison. He described being desperate to recover from his torture and to find a way back to his family.

"We just need the Red Cross or the United Nations to come take us out of here," he was quoted as saying.

But Rahim and a Russian prisoner, who has since been released from Guantanamo, attest that U.S. troops arrived instead. At first, they told Rahim and his companions that they needed to remain in U.S. custody in case they had useful information about their former captors. Rahim told the soldiers about being forced to confess on a Taliban videotape that was broadcast in his home country and being worried about how he would be received there. A few days later, after finding the Taliban videotape of Rahim's confession, the detainee and his attorneys assert, the soldiers began to treat Rahim very badly, interrogating him about his interest in suicide missions and eventually taking him to Guantanamo.

"By me telling them about the video it created confusion to the point that the Americans believed I was working with al-Qaeda," Rahim told a military review panel last year, according to transcripts. "I swear I am not al-Qaeda. . . . Please be just and fair. . . . Look into this."

Rahim's attorneys, who work in the federal public defender's office in Oregon, said they traveled to Afghanistan in their investigation of Rahim's case. The key facts were not difficult to gather, they said.

"All you have to do is find public news articles and find out this guy was imprisoned by the Taliban," said Steve Sady, one of the lawyers.

In court filings, the attorneys argue that there is no legal justification for the Bush administration to detain someone who never took up arms against the United States and was simply in Afghanistan without a passport.

"No conceivable definition of enemy combatant would include a freed political prisoner who had been subjected to brutal torture and confinement by the enemy prior to the declaration of war," the lawyers wrote in their court filing.

Swiss Official Says Banks Broke Law By Supplying Data To U.S. (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky And Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 13 — Swiss banks broke their nation's laws by providing banking information to American counterterrorism officials, Switzerland's top data-protection official said Friday.

The banks, known for safeguarding privacy, should have informed customers using the Swift money-transfer service that their data could be passed on to third parties, the Swiss official, Hanspeter Thür, said in Bern, according to The Associated Press.

Just the possibility of the data being leaked should have been grounds enough to warn customers, he said. His statement was at odds with the views of the Swiss finance minister, Hans-Rudolf Merz, who said last month that giving the Central Intelligence Agency such access did not infringe on the country's banking secrecy rules.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Swift provided records on millions of international banking transactions to the American government in response to subpoenas from the Treasury Department. Swift — formally the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication — operates a secure electronic-messaging service used by some 7,800 financial institutions to make international money transfers worth $6 trillion a day.

Analysts at the C.I.A. have used the records to conduct tens of thousands of individual examinations of banking records in search of evidence and patterns of possible terrorist financing. A prime focus of the effort has been on international transactions coming into and out of the United States.

Swift and American officials have defended the operation as a vital and lawful effort to cut off money to terrorists, but it has come under sharp international criticism.

Mr. Thür said the issue was whether information could be given to countries whose data protection laws are less stringent than Switzerland's.

He urged that a solution be negotiated by which United States laws and European data-protection rules are standardized. Some European officials want the appointment of an independent, European-based auditor to guard against abuses, in place of a Washington consulting firm that now has that role.

Switzerland is not a member of the European Union, which separately has lashed out at Swift. European Union legislators criticized the consortium in early October; at the same time, one of Swift's supervisors, the European Central Bank, acknowledged that it had known for years that the consortium was giving confidential banking records to the United States authorities.

Earlier, the privacy commission for Belgium, where Swift is based, accused the consortium of flouting European rules. "It has to be seen as a gross miscalculation by Swift that it has, for years, secretly and systematically transferred massive amounts of personal data for surveillance without effective and clear legal basis and independent controls in line with Belgian and European law," the report said.

Swiss Banks Broke Law by Passing Banking Data to CIA, Data Protection Chief Says

BERN, Switzerland (AP) -- Swiss banks violated the law by passing banking information on to the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, the country's top data protection official said Friday.

The banks, usually known for safeguarding the privacy of their clients, should have informed customers making international money transfers via the Belgium-based SWIFT money-transfer service that their data could be passed on to third parties, Hanspeter Thuer said.

Just the possibility of the data being leaked should have been grounds enough to warn customers, he said.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, SWIFT largely complied with U.S. requests for banking information in its anti-terror investigations.

SWIFT, or the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, operates a secure electronic messaging service used by some 7,800 financial institutions to make international money transfers worth $6 trillion a day.

Thuer said the issue was whether information could be passed on to states whose data protection laws are not as stringent as those in Switzerland.

Referring to a report by a Belgian privacy commission, Thuer urged that a solution be negotiated by which U.S. laws and European data protection rules are standardized.

Last month, Switzerland Finance Minister Hans-Rudolf Merz said giving the CIA access to the SWIFT information did not infringe Swiss sovereignty or the country's banking secrecy rules.

N. Ga. Man Guilty Of Aiding Hamas (AJC)

DOJ_NMG_0081213

By Bill Rankin, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 14, 2006

The prayer leader of a North Georgia mosque has pleaded guilty to federal charges of providing material support to the Islamic militant group Hamas.

Mohamed Shorbagi, 42, who lived near Rome, entered his guilty plea on Aug. 28, federal authorities said Friday. Shorbagi's court documents were unsealed in U.S. District Court in Atlanta Friday morning.

"This case illustrates that people who illegally support foreign terrorist organizations may be found anywhere in the United States, even in quiet and pleasant places like Rome," U.S. Attorney David Nahmias said in a prepared statement. "We will use every lawful tool to ferret out terrorism and those who provide material support to it, regardless of where they live or how they try to hide their criminal activities."

Said FBI Special Agent in Charge Gregory Jones, "It is very disturbing to see people in the United States who are so willing to offer their assistance to known terrorist organizations, and this case should remind us all of the continued need to be vigilant."

In 1997, the United States formally designated Hamas as a foreign terrorist organization. Hamas' ideology calls for the destruction of Israel.

Up until December 2001, Shorbagi provided financial support to Hamas and conspired with others, whose names were not disclosed, to provide material support to the militant group, Nahmias said. He provided the support through donations to the "Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development," knowing that some or all of the money was destined for Hamas, Nahmias said.

Shorbagi was a Georgia representative for the Holy Land Foundation and attended foundation meetings at which high-level Hamas officials made presentations condemning Israel, Nahmias said. Shorgagi also hosted Hamas officials at a mosque in Rome where he was Imam, or prayer leader, he added.

Nahmias would not say how much money Shorbagi contributed to the Holy Land Foundation, saying only that it "was not a large amount of money."

"It goes to emphasize the point that you can not provide any money to a designated foreign terrorist organization or you're looking at 15 years in federal prison," Nahmias said.

Shorbagi's plea agreement states he is to be sentenced to 15 years in prison, the maximum allowed under federal sentencing guidelines.

The agreement also states that if Shorbagi provides "substantial assistance" to the government's ongoing investigation, "the government will consider whether to file a motion for reduction of sentence."

"This is part of an overall investigation. We're continue to investigate every angle and rely on Mr. Shorbagi's cooperation in that respect," Nahmias said.

Shorbagi agreed to pay full restitution to the victims of the "fraud crimes" he committed -- and which the government agreed not to charge him with, federal authorities said. Details of those fraud crimes were not released Friday.

Nahmias said that Shorbagi, who was born in Israel and is a citizen of the Palestinian territory of Gaza, is a lawful permanent resident of the United States. He is in federal protective custody in an undisclosed location, Nahmias said.

Sentencing for Shorbagi is scheduled for Nov. 3, before U.S. District Judge Harold L. Murphy in Rome.

Leader Of A Georgia Mosque Pleads Guilty To Aiding Hamas (NYT)

By Brenda Goodman

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

ATLANTA, Oct. 13 — In a case kept secret for nearly two months, the religious leader of a mosque in Rome, Ga., has pleaded guilty to providing financial support to the militant Palestinian organization Hamas, federal prosecutors said Friday.

The government said the 42-year-old defendant, Mohamed Shorbagi, a citizen of the Palestinian territories who is living legally in the United States with his wife and young children, was charged on Aug. 28 with providing aid to Hamas through donations he made to the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, an Islamic charity shut down by federal authorities in 2001.

Mr. Shorbagi was also a Georgia representative for the Holy Land Foundation and attended meetings that were addressed by “high level” Hamas officials, said David E. Nahmias, the United States attorney for the Northern District of Georgia.

Mr. Nahmias hinted that there could be more legal action to follow, saying the charges and the plea agreement involving Mr. Shorbagi were being unsealed now “because we expected it to be made public in the near future in another forum as part of Mr. Shorbagi’s cooperation.”

Support for Hamas is illegal, because the government deems it a foreign terrorist organization. Prosecutors said Mr. Shorbagi provided financial help to the group from 1997 until the Holy Land Foundation was shut down five years ago. In pleading guilty to material support of terrorism, he agreed to serve a maximum prison term of 15 years and pay restitution of at least $240,000 to unidentified victims of that support.

Still, the plea agreement provides that if he cooperates "truthfully and completely," as is expected, the government may recommend a lesser sentence.

Michael J. Trost, an Atlanta lawyer representing Mr. Shorbagi, declined to characterize the government's case, but did say "mitigating factors" would become public at sentencing.

President Bush ordered the Holy Land Foundation closed in December 2001, saying that by raising money in the United States and funneling it to Hamas, the group "pays for murder abroad."

Seven former board members and fund-raisers for Holy Land, six of whom are American citizens, have previously been charged with conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists because they gave money to charities believed run by Hamas and to the orphans and families of "martyrs" killed in the Palestinian conflict.

There has been little public examination of the evidence against the defendants, however, and the government's efforts have been criticized because of their high level of secrecy.

"The facts of these cases are never actually released," said Rabiah Ahmed, a spokeswoman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, based in Washington. "There's no public scrutiny except what the government chooses to release. The perception is that they're being heavy-handed and the Muslim community is being unfairly targeted."

John W. Boyd, a partner in an Albuquerque law firm that has represented the Holy Land Foundation, said he was not familiar with the particulars of the case against Mr. Shorbagi and so could not comment on its merits. But he did say he was dismayed to hear that a donor to Holy Land had been charged, since, he said, that was likely to discourage people from giving to Palestinian relief organizations.

"It certainly is going to have that effect if there's any aroma that donors are being targeted," Mr. Boyd said. "If they're now going to make it so that Islamic charities can't function at all, that's pretty dire."

Imam Guilty Of Aiding Hamas (WP/AP)

By Greg Bluestein

The Washington Post/AP, October 14, 2006

Under Plea Deal, Georgia Cleric Could Get 15 Years

ATLANTA, Oct. 13 -- The imam of a northern Georgia mosque pleaded guilty to providing material support to the militant group Hamas in a case in which the agreement, charges and even the plea hearing were handled in secret.

The U.S. attorney's office said Friday that the charges and plea agreement involving Mohamed Shorbagi were filed Aug. 28 in federal court in Rome, Ga., a division of Atlanta's federal court, but were sealed until Friday.

Shorbagi, 42, agreed to a maximum of 15 years in prison, prosecutors said. His sentencing hearing is scheduled for Nov. 3.

According to prosecutors, between 1997 and 2001, Shorbagi provided financial support to Hamas, a group designated by the United States as a foreign terrorist organization. He also was accused of conspiring with unnamed others to provide material support to Hamas.

The donations were passed through the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, prosecutors said.

"It was not for a large amount of money," U.S. Attorney David Nahmias said. "But that goes to show you it doesn't take a large amount of money to get 15 years in prison."

He said the prison time could be reduced if Shorbagi cooperates, which he is expected to do. The prosecutor's office said the sentencing is likely to take place in Rome.

Nahmias's office said Shorbagi was a Georgia representative of the Holy Land Foundation and knew money provided to the foundation was actually funneled to Hamas.

He had attended Holy Land Foundation meetings at which high-level Hamas officials made presentations condemning Israel, and had hosted high-level Hamas officials at the Rome mosque where he served as imam, prosecutors said.

Shorbagi's attorney, Michael Trost, did not immediately return a call seeking comment Friday.

President Bush yesterday signed a law to protect U.S. ports from terrorists smuggling weapons into the United States hidden within the 11 million containers that enter the country each year.

"With the bill I sign today, we renew a clear commitment: We will work tirelessly to keep our nation safe and our ports open for business," the president said in a signing ceremony at the Eisenhower Executive Office Building.

The Security and Accountability For Every Port Act of 2006 (SAFE) includes an amendment that bans Internet gamblers from using credit cards, checks and electronic funds, drawing protests from a group representing the gambling industry.

The SAFE act authorizes $3.4 billion over five years for safety measures, including the installation of radiation detectors at the 22 largest U.S. ports by the end of next year. More inspectors will be hired to increase the number of random searches of containers.

"The SAFE Port Act will make this nation more prepared, more prosperous and more secure," Mr. Bush said. "We're going to protect our ports. We're going to defend this homeland. And we're going to win the war on terror.¶

Congress approved the bill two weeks ago before lawmakers left to campaign for the Nov. 7 midterm elections in which national security, the war in Iraq and terrorism are major issues. Democrats favored the bill, but said it failed to address rail and mass transit, other areas considered highly vulnerable to terrorists.

Rep. Edward J. Markey, Massachusetts Democrat, called the new law a "sham port bill" and complained it did not go far enough by authorizing only a pilot program to study scanning of cargo containers headed for the United States from three ports.

"Even though the technology exists today to scan 100 percent of U.S.-bound cargo at all ports to make sure it doesn't contain nuclear bombs, this bill doesn't require that to occur," Mr. Markey said.

But Mr. Bush said the bill codifies the Container Security Initiative, which deploys U.S. inspectors to dozens of foreign ports on five continents, where they can screen cargo bound for the United States. He said it also codifies the Customs Trade Partnership Against Terrorism, a joint public-private sector initiative in which private shippers agree to improve their own security measures in exchange for benefits, including expedited clearance through U.S. ports.

The bill was approved on a 409-2 vote in the House, and by a voice vote in the Senate.

The decision by the Republican majority to lump the Internet gambling ban onto the bipartisan ports bill had drawn scathing criticism from some Democrats.

"Today is a dark day for the great American game of poker," said Michael Bolcerek, president of the Poker Players Alliance, a grass-roots advocacy organization of more than 110,000 poker enthusiasts.

"Twenty-three million Americans who play the game online will effectively be denied the ability to enjoy this popular form of entertainment, even in the privacy of their own homes," he said.

Bush Signs Port Security, Internet Bill (AP-Y)

AP, October 14, 2006

President Bush signed a bill Friday to help prevent terrorists from sneaking a nuclear, chemical or germ weapon into the United States inside one of the 11 million shipping containers that enter the nation each year — many without inspection.

"We're going to protect our ports. We're going to defend this homeland, and we're going to win this war on terror," Bush said.

The president used the bill-signing ceremony to assert that Republicans are tough on terror, a key issue in congressional elections just less than four weeks away.

He didn't mention an unrelated provision that seeks to put teeth into laws that forbid most online gambling. Instead, Bush focused on the multiple ways the legislation tightens security and closes a loophole in anti-terror defenses, especially at ports.

He noted that the SAFE Port Act authorizes the development of high-tech inspection equipment so customs agents can check cargo containers for dangerous materials without having to open them. It requires radiation-detection technology at 22 of the nation's busiest ports by the end of next year.

"We'll do everything we can to prevent an attack, but if the terrorists succeed in launching an attack, we'll be ready to respond," Bush said.

The president said the bill codifies the Container Security Initiative, which deploys U.S. inspectors to dozens of foreign ports on five continents where they can screen cargo bound for the United States. He said it also codifies the Customs Trade Partnership Against Terrorism, a joint public-private sector initiative in which private shippers agree to improve their own security measures and in return can receive benefits, including expedited clearance through U.S. ports.

Bush also noted that the bill provides additional authority for the Domestic Nuclear Detection Office, which was established to guard against the threat of terrorists smuggling a nuclear device into the country. And the act requires the Department of Homeland Security to establish a plan to speed the resumption of trade in the event of a terrorist attack on a U.S. port or waterway.

"This bill makes clear that the federal government has the authority to clear waterways, identify cleanup equipment and re-establish the flow of commerce following a terrorist attack," the president said.

Unrelated provision seeks to put teeth into online gambling laws.

WASHINGTON — President Bush signed a law today to deter terrorists from smuggling weapons into the United States inside the 11 million shipping containers that enter the country from foreign ports each year.

An unrelated provision of the bill also seeks to put teeth into laws that forbid most online gambling. It prohibits Internet gamblers from using credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers to settle their wagers.

At the signing ceremony, Bush spoke only about sections of the SAFE Port Act that tighten security and close a loophole in anti-terror defenses, especially at ports.

"Our seaports are a gateway to commerce, a source of opportunity, and a provider of jobs," Bush said. "Our ports could also be a target of a terrorist attack, and we're determined to protect them."

Congress approved the bill two weeks ago before lawmakers left to campaign for the Nov. 7 midterm elections in which national security, the war in Iraq and terrorism are major issues. Democrats favored the bill, but said it failed to address rail and mass transit, other areas considered highly vulnerable to terrorists.

Bush was accompanied at the bill-signing ceremony by one Democrat, Sen. Patty Murray of Washington, alongside a slew of Republican lawmakers. For weeks the president has insisted that Republicans are tough on terror and that Democrats would make the country weaker.

He said the new law authorizes the development of high-tech inspection equipment so customs agents can check cargo containers for dangerous materials without having to open them. It requires radiation-detection technology at 22 of the nation's busiest ports by the end of next year.

"We'll do everything we can to prevent an attack, but if the terrorists succeed in launching an attack, we'll be ready to respond," Bush said.

He said the bill codifies the Container Security Initiative, which deploys U.S. inspectors to dozens of foreign ports on five continents where they can screen cargo bound for the United States. He said it also codifies the Customs Trade Partnership Against Terrorism, a joint public-private sector initiative in which private shippers agree to improve their own security measures in exchange for benefits, including expedited clearance through U.S. ports.

Bush said the bill provides more authority for the Domestic Nuclear Detection Office, which was established to guard against the threat of terrorists smuggling a nuclear device into the country. And the act requires the Department of Homeland Security to establish a plan to speed the resumption of trade in the event of a terrorist attack on a U.S. port or waterway.

"This bill makes clear that the federal government has the authority to clear waterways, identify cleanup equipment and re-establish the flow of commerce following a terrorist attack," the president said.

The bill was approved on a 409-2 vote in the House, and by a voice vote in the Senate.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, called the bill landmark legislation that will help close "a dangerous gap in our homeland security."

Murray said that for the first time in many years, she will sleep well, knowing that ports in Seattle and other cities will be safer. Murray, who has been working on the bill for more than five years, said it was gratifying to see the president sign a bipartisan bill "in an extremely political month," with midterm elections a few weeks away.

Bush Signs Law On Security For US Ports, Ban On Online Gambling (AFP)

AFP, October 14, 2006

President George W. Bush signed a law designed to bolster security at US ports and prevent terrorists from smuggling in nuclear weapons.

The law also included an unrelated provision inserted by lawmakers in Congress to severely restrict Internet gambling, prompting gaming companies abroad to close down their US operations.

DOJ_NMG_0081217

Hoping to retain control of Congress in legislative elections on November 7, lawmakers in Bush's Republican party adopted the measure two weeks ago to persuade voters that they are better able to prevent another terrorist attack.

The Republicans rode the security issue to electoral victory in 2002 and 2004. But the same strategy may falter this year amid growing public anxiety about the war in Iraq and the economy.

Bush, who has portrayed the opposition Democrats as failing to grasp the nature of the terrorist threat after the attacks of September 11, 2001, used the signing ceremony as an opportunity to hammer home his campaign message on security.

"We're going to protect our ports. We're going to defend this homeland, and we're going to win this war on terror," said Bush, surrounded by Republican lawmakers.

Entitled the "Security and Accountability For Every (SAFE) Port Act of 2006," the law provides 3.4 billion dollars over five years to strengthen security at ports and requires radiation detection technology to be installed in 22 of the country's largest ports by the end of 2007.

The measure calls for bolstering inspections on some 11 million containers that transit American ports every year, deploying inspectors to foreign ports to check cargo headed to US ports, and speeding up paperwork from private shipowners.

The opposition Democrats mostly supported the law, but said the Bush administration has neglected other vulnerable sectors such as rail and mass transit.

Congress took the gaming industry by surprise in approving restrictions on online gambling. The law prohibits US banks and credit card companies from processing online bets.

Republicans backing the provision said it was designed to protect youngsters from the financial and moral damage of online gambling, but opponents said it could prove extremely difficult to enforce.

Critics also said that gambling businesses that cater to horse-racing and state lotteries, which enjoy powerful political patronage, were exempted from the law.

New Law Cripples Internet Gambling (WP)

By Frank Ahrens, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Banks Are Barred From Handling Transactions

Placing bets over the Internet was effectively criminalized by the federal government yesterday, as lawmakers work to eliminate an activity enjoyed by as many as 23 million Americans who wagered an estimated $6 billion last year.

Attached to a port-security bill signed by President Bush yesterday was the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, which prohibits online gamblers from using credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers to place and settle bets. The law puts enforcement on the shoulders of banks and other U.S. financial institutions, some of which fought the legislation.

The bill's sponsor, Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte (R-Va.), said he opposes all gambling, citing its "ill effects on society," but particularly Internet gambling, which led him to draft the legislation in the summer. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) attached Goodlatte's bill to the port-security measure to ensure its passage and Bush's signature.

While proponents decried the effects of gambling on society, opponents pointed to the enormous popularity of Internet gambling and compared the new law to the Prohibition amendment of 1919, which led to the rise of illegal speak-easies and organized crime.

"We're going to have Prohibition, and what happened then?" said champion poker player Annie Duke, a former University of Pennsylvania doctoral candidate who began playing professionally in 1994. "We had people running around with tommy guns and drinking moonshine because they weren't given a safe product."

The new law is potentially crippling to a worldwide industry whose biggest customer has been the United States. Already, several online wagering businesses have pulled their operations out of the United States and some have collapsed, including publicly traded companies in Britain, where online betting is legal and regulated. International online gambling businesses have been watching closely as U.S. regulatory and law enforcement officials stepped up their campaign against online wagering in recent months.

Gambling, along with pornography, was one of the earliest businesses on the Internet, and one of the few profitable ones. The first Internet gambling site appeared in 1995, according to the American Gaming Association, the trade group of big casinos. Over the past decade, online gambling has caught fire, especially among men in their 20s, and crossed into the mainstream to include poker and fantasy sports leagues.

Nevertheless, online gambling has been a legally gray area, equally populated by legitimate, publicly traded overseas corporations and fly-by-night predators who, like music pirates, can shut down and move their computer servers overnight to stay ahead of the law.

In the United States, the Justice Department and federal courts are unable to agree on whether Internet gambling is illegal. The Justice Department maintains that the 1961 Wire Act, written to prohibit betting transactions via telephone, applies to the Internet. Courts have disagreed, saying that betting on sports teams over the Internet is illegal, but wagering on casino games, such as poker, is not. And though the Justice Department thinks that off-track and online wagering on horse races is illegal, it has never prosecuted a case.

Internet gamblers typically set up accounts at offshore businesses, and place and settle bets using credit cards and checks that are converted in electronic currency, much as eBay users buy and sell items using the PayPal system.

Instead of targeting specific games, such as criminalizing blackjack but not fantasy sports leagues, the new law seeks to block the financial transactions that fuel them.

The Poker Players Alliance, a lobbying group that opposes the new law, said it would ask Congress to exempt poker from the statute. The group considers poker a game of skill, not chance.

The new law is shaking up the worldwide Internet gambling industry, with some comparing it to Congress banning the sale of Toyotas, BMWs and all other foreign vehicles here. Britain's Sportingbet PLC, for example, said 62 percent of winning bets on its site came from the United States.

A major offshore e-currency company, FirePay of Britain, said it no longer will accept payments from U.S. customers. Sportingbet sold its U.S. online operations to an Antiguan company yesterday for $1, five weeks after former company chairman Peter Dicks was arrested in New York when customs officials found he was wanted in Louisiana on charges of illegal online gambling. New York Gov. George E. Pataki (R) refused to extradite Dicks to Louisiana, and a federal judge cleared his return to England.

Former BetOnSports PLC chief executive David Carruthers was arrested in the Dallas airport in July. BetOnSports founder Gary Stephen Kaplan, also wanted by U.S. authorities, is a fugitive. BetOnSports said yesterday it would pull out of the United States and repay balances to customers here.

Most online wagering and e-currency Web sites posted releases yesterday commenting on the law and its impact on customers.

"After taking extensive legal advice, the board of PartyGaming PLC has concluded that the new legislation . . . will make it practically impossible to provide U.S. residents with access to its real money poker and other real money gaming sites," the company said.

The World Trade Organization even has a stake in the game. The organization has ruled that the United States violates trade treaties by outlawing offshore online gambling while tolerating some forms of U.S.-based online gambling, citing the horse-racing ambiguity.

The major casinos in Las Vegas and Atlantic City and on Indian reservations did not take a position on the new law, said Frank J. Fahrenkopf Jr., president of the American Gaming Association. The group's reasoning: Less casino revenue comes from gambling, as entertainment, retail and other non-wagering spending now makes up 55 percent of the cash streaming into resorts such as Harrah's and Bellagio.

"The guy who comes home and goes to his den and cracks open a can of beer and bets on the Internet is not really our customer," Fahrenkopf said. "We never viewed the Internet as being competitive."

The association wants Congress to authorize an independent study of whether a legalized, nationwide, taxed and regulated online gambling system would work in the United States, as it does in Britain.

"Would we like to get into that business?" Fahrenkopf said. "Yeah, some of our guys would."

Goodlatte said he would press to update the Wire Act to conclusively extend its authority to the Internet. That part of his bill was dropped in the Senate.

"All the problems that manifest themselves with gambling, even in heavily regulated states, are even worse on the Internet," Goodlatte said yesterday. "There are family problems, bankruptcy problems, gambling addiction, gambling by minors, using gambling to launder money for criminal and terrorist organizations and organized crime. It does not help our society."

For poker advocates such as Duke, the new law is the wrong way to cure social problems.

"We've proven in history that trying to protect the minority and punish the majority never works," Duke said. "The fact is, there is a certain percentage of people who have addictive personalities [and gamble online]. Are you going to pass a law outlawing online shopping? Or day trading?"

Lost In The Dust Of 9/11 (LAT)

By Ellen Barry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

From society's margins, janitors were drafted for an epic cleanup around ground zero. Then 'the cough' racked their lives.

DOJ_NMG_0081219

NEW YORK — There is no voice left in Manuel Checo's voice. He speaks in a granular rasp that fades, occasionally, to whispery puffs of air. Sometimes, for periods as long as two days, he is unable to speak at all.

When that happens, Checo carries a pad of paper with him so he can scribble down notes if he needs something. But for the most part, he will simply disappear into his rented room, ignoring his cellphone when it rings.

Checo, a janitor, spent six months cleaning dust from office buildings around ground zero after the World Trade Center attack. Five years later, the lining of his lungs is pocked with scars and densities that do not belong there — possibly a sign of a disease that can cause lung tissue to become so stiff that it can no longer carry oxygen, wrote a radiologist who examined a scan of his lungs last year.

The son of a general in the Dominican Republic, Checo, 54, irons his shirts with military precision. When he meets a woman on the street, he kisses her hand. But the truth is that when he discovered that he was too weak to work again, his life veered terribly off course. He was evicted from his apartment and slept in his car for six months. Acquaintances didn't understand his racking cough and thought he had tuberculosis or AIDS.

Whoever he was before Sept. 12, 2001 — when a supervisor from his company called to tell him there was work near ground zero — he is a different man now. Sometimes he is overwhelmed by the feeling that he has lost his way.

"I get up, I get dressed," he said, in Spanish, through a translator. "And then I say to myself, 'Where am I going?' "

The dust around ground zero, we now know, contained caustic, finely pulverized concrete, trillions of microscopic fibers of glass, and particles of lead, mercury and arsenic, as well as carcinogens like asbestos and dioxin. Five years out, the "World Trade Center cough" has started to look like a persistent — and in some cases disabling — respiratory condition.

An ever-growing number of New Yorkers is coming forward to describe symptoms: the first responders who plunged into the tangled wreckage to find survivors; the volunteers who hauled diesel fuel and doled out cigarettes; the students at Stuyvesant High School who returned to classes while acrid fires burned nearby.

Less visible is the army of cleaning workers who were sent to the area to clean office buildings. Those were the cases that were shocking to Scottie Hill, a social worker, when the Mount Sinai Medical Center opened its WTC health clinic in 2002. The cleaners, mostly Polish and Latino immigrants, were already living close to the edge when the job began; by the following year, many were in crisis because of lost wages and poor health.

Three out of four lacked health insurance. Forget workers' compensation — many of them could not even contact their employers by phone. Hill frequently saw clients who were facing eviction or had lost their homes. Some couldn't afford the $4 it cost to ride the subway to the clinic and back.

A few of the immigrant workers, too sick to support themselves in the U.S. anymore, have returned to their home countries. But that decision is fraught, too, because relatives back home — or doctors, for that matter — may not know what is wrong with them. Jaime Carcamo, a psychologist who treats 50 Latino workers who cleaned around ground zero, said some of them, finding that they were unable to work, simply withdrew from society.

"They just remain like nomads," he said. "Some of these people just fell into the cracks. People don't know about them, but they're out there still."

It is ironic, then, that Checo remembers the job so fondly. He had been a U.S. citizen for almost a decade by then, and working around ground zero gave him "so much sense of brotherhood," as if he were descending into the pit every day with police and firefighters. It was an environment stripped of class, of racism. What he says about the experience is this: "Something so bad created something so beautiful."

He worked a night shift as part of a two-man team with Alex Sanchez, a fellow Dominican 15 years his junior. Using a handsaw, they would cut two holes, each large enough for a man's torso, in a building's air vents. Peering into the dark passageway with a flashlight, all they could see was dust, glittering in the dark. Then one of them would hold up a hand vacuum, and the other would switch on an air hose, and both would disappear in a cloud of dust.

Tons of material had settled in the buildings. When terrorists crashed two planes into the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, its two towers collapsed with such force that dust and debris poured in and upward through the ventilation systems of the buildings around them. It was up to landlords to decide who would clear the buildings, and many chose cheaper labor: men and women who days before had been emptying trash cans and dusting computers.

The city's Department of Environmental Protection generally oversees the removal of debris containing asbestos, but that system was informally abandoned after Sept. 11, according to David Newman, an industrial hygienist with the New York Committee for Occupational Safety and Health, a coalition of union leaders and safety activists. Landlords got no guidance from state or federal agencies, leaving them "free, if you will, to do whatever they wanted, or to do nothing," Newman said. "It was kind of a Wild West."

Checo and Sanchez wore paper masks that covered their noses and mouths when they were available — about 30% of the time, Sanchez said. But the dust permeated everything; a T-shirt that was white at the beginning of a shift would be mousygray by its end. Anyway, health was the last thing on their minds. They were making $18 an hour, plus time and a half for overtime, instead of the $12.75 an hour they earned cleaning university buildings. It was good money. It was a good cause.

What was painful, oddly, was leaving at the end of a shift; that's when the hopeless, leaden feeling sank in. Sanchez, 39, who was born in the U.S. and wears hip, Woody Allen-ish glasses, recalls making a conscious effort to tune out at the end of the day. Back in his apartment in Washington Heights, he would watch silly, diverting television shows. Then he would collapse in bed. He had no idea whether the air was safe to breathe because he didn't ask.

"If we all used common sense, we would say, 'This is not a healthy environment,' " Sanchez said. "But the whole 9/11 situation itself kept you from thinking."

Sanchez figured he deserved to be exhausted at the end of the job. But this exhaustion was depthless, unfathomable. In May, when he tried to return to his ordinary job — buffing floors at New York University — he got dizzy and his chest closed up. He lasted six days, then went back to bed. He, his mother and his son had moved in with an aunt to save money, and both women were pressuring him, angrily, to go back to work. At one point, the fighting grew so stormy that his mother called the police.

Sanchez's world revolved around his symptoms: fatigue, joint pain, pressure in his chest, a sore throat that would not go away. Only one person seemed to believe him, and that was his work partner, Checo. The sickness drove them closer to each other, and farther from everyone else. "Me and him, we're a team," said Sanchez.

Checo had his own set of problems. Because of a bureaucratic mix-up at the company where he worked, ABM Industries, he was unable to receive unemployment benefits, and he ran through his savings so quickly that in the summer of 2002, he took a few of his possessions and moved into his car. He began to tell Sanchez that there were shadowy figures following him. Asked how Sept. 11 had altered him, he rasped out this answer:

"Every man — every great man, every evil man — has feelings," he said. "No matter how rough you are outside, you have a weak spot. 9/11 hit me in my weak spot."

Soon after the first anniversary of Sept. 11, Checo called Sanchez with exciting news: He had been watching a news show when Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton appeared, urging ground zero workers to go for screening at the Mount Sinai Medical Center's new clinic. "Boom. I put one and one together," Sanchez said. "It's like, 'This is why this is happening.' "

The day they went in for appointments, everything changed. Checo was diagnosed with rhinitis, sinusitis, asthma, chronic post-traumatic stress disorder, major depression, delusional disorder, and schizophrenia, paranoid type. Sanchez was diagnosed with asthma, sinusitis, gastroesophageal reflux, various musculoskeletal injuries and post-traumatic stress disorder. Each now takes fistfuls of medications.

The two men don't see their old circle of Dominican friends as much these days, Sanchez said. New friends have replaced them: doctors, therapists, environmental activists. In 2004, Sanchez and Checo traveled to Washington to testify before an Environmental Protection Agency panel.

Both now receive regular workers' compensation payments — Sanchez receives $243 a week, Checo about $350 — and free healthcare at Mount Sinai. They are among 75 plaintiffs who have filed a $30-million lawsuit against the owners of dozens of office towers in Lower Manhattan. But that case is not likely to go to trial for at least two years, said their attorney, Robert Grochow.

In the meantime, Sanchez and Checo shuttle from appointment to appointment. Each man carries a sheaf of medical records and hospital bills around with him — artillery in an ongoing battle to get care. The future is something they do not focus on. But this is not unusual, said Carcamo, the psychologist.

"We don't know what is ahead of them,' " he said. "They often ask me, 'What am I going to do?' To be honest about it, I am not sure."

Sanchez is jerked back to ordinary life by the demands of his son, Jack, who started kindergarten this fall. But Checo still seems a bit lost as he walks slowly down Broadway, stopping every now and then to catch his breath. What undoes him, as he waits for the next round of doctor's appointments, are the trappings of ordinary life that have slipped away from him: for instance, the collection of jazz recordings that he gave away when he was evicted.

In the black vinyl folder that he carries around with him — it contains, among other things, the program from his father's funeral — is a photograph of himself kneeling in front of a softball team, the J-Boys, for whom he played center field until he got sick. In the picture, he is dark-haired, vigorous. It was taken a few weeks before the World Trade Center attack. He looks at it, occasionally, to remind himself who he was.

A Big Easy Bon Voyage (WT/AP)

By Alan Sayre, Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0081221

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

The New Orleans' cruise ship industry returns to service tomorrow when the 2,000-passenger Norwegian Sun becomes the first regularly scheduled liner to cast off from the city's docks since Hurricane Katrina.

The 853-foot Norwegian Cruise Lines vessel is leaving for the Caribbean. Three other cruise ships are expected to return later this year and in 2007.

Before Katrina, four cruise ships called New Orleans home. The industry was rapidly expanding, with more than 700,000 passengers leaving and arriving in 2004 through the port.

But Katrina, which struck in August 2005, shut down the usually strong fall season. Only 308,000 passengers sailed from New Orleans during the first eight months of the year, according to the International Council of Cruise Lines (ICCL), an industry group.

The truncated year supported nearly 5,000 jobs in Louisiana as the industry spent $241 million, a figure that was still higher than the $208 million spent for all of 2004, according to ICCL.

Now, nearly 14 months since the Carnival Sensation embarked on the last regular voyage -- just before Katrina hit -- the business is starting over.

There have been several one-time liner stops at New Orleans since Katrina, but tomorrow's voyage marks the return of regularly scheduled service of four- to seven-day voyages. For a time after Katrina, two cruise ships moored at New Orleans to provide housing for emergency workers.

The port is opening a third cruise terminal and a 1,000-vehicle garage at a cost of $38 million that will give the facility the ability to handle two large passenger ships at once. It is bullish enough to be making plans for a fourth terminal.

But Bob Wall, owner of the New Orleans-based travel agency Vacations at Sea, said the first year probably would only be modest as the ships get re-established. He thinks bookings will increase steadily in the coming months.

"Once they (the public) see the ships docked, I think that's going to provide a nice bump of sales," he said.

Next in line at the Port of New Orleans is Carnival Cruise Lines' Fantasy, which sails on Oct. 26, followed by Royal Caribbean International's Grandeur of the Seas on Dec. 7. Carnival is expected to begin sailing Carnival Triumph next September. All the voyages will be bound to the western Caribbean.

New Orleans' return to the vacation cruise business comes during a heady time for the industry worldwide, according to the Cruise Lines International Association (CLIA), another industry group. The industry has averaged an 8.5 percent annual growth rate in passengers since 1980, according to the group. The ICCL put total U.S. economic impact in 2005 at $32.2 billion.

After an industry record of 11.2 million passengers in 2005, the business is expecting 11.7 million this year, said CLIA spokesman Brian Major.

Before Katrina, New Orleans was one of the fastest-growing cruise ports in the country. That was fueled by the attraction of the city itself. Passengers often toured the French Quarter and other attractions before or after a cruise.

No figures are available on collateral spending specifically by cruise passengers. However, the New Orleans Convention and Visitors Bureau said the average domestic visitor spent $196 per day in the city in 2004, the latest year for which figures are available, while an international visitor put down $244 per day on average.

But that was before Katrina. Since the storm, the city has struggled with losses in its convention business and a very slow summer, in part affected by widespread concern outside the region about the city's condition.

Mr. Wall said tomorrow's cruise is near capacity, but like airlines, cruise companies offer various ticket deals in hopes of filling up all the cabins. "The question is on-board revenue, such as shore excursions, the casinos, the bars," he said.

Ticket prices for the cruise were the lowest in several years, Mr. Wall said, ranging from about $500 per passenger for an interior cabin to $1,200 for luxury accommodations. "That's great for the consumer, though, of course, it keeps the cruise line officials nervous," he said.

'A Hand Up Doesn't Always Require A Handout' (WSJ)

By Muhammad Yunus

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

America's government and people brought charity to a new level last year in their response to Hurricane Katrina. The rebuilding has been particularly difficult, however, because it has involved lives as well as bricks and mortar. Many victims had been desperately poor all their lives. Helping them to self-sufficiency has proved just as difficult, if not harder, than putting homes and businesses back up again.

Having many very poor citizens, and more than its share of natural disasters, Bangladesh -- my own country -- has a great deal of experience facing both these challenges. We have a per capita gross national income of $440, with half the population living below the poverty line. We've little to start with, and much of that is repeatedly snatched away. In 1998, floods covered much of the country for over two months, affecting 30 million people; and a single cyclone killed 300,000 in 1970. Despite these catastrophes, more of our people are climbing out of poverty.

So at the risk of sounding presumptuous: What can the U.S. learn from Bangladesh about post-disaster economic recovery? Like many other countries, even Bangladeshis were quick with a handout after Katrina, giving the U.S. $1 million for the victims. But Americans might be surprised to learn that one of our most successful tools for rebuilding businesses is not government handouts, but rather, small loans packaged with practical business and social advice.

Microfinance is one of the biggest success stories of the developing world, and proponents like me believe it could be just as successful in helping the poor in wealthy countries such as the U.S. The basic philosophy behind microfinance is that the poor, although spurned by traditional banks because they can't provide collateral, are actually a great investment: No one works harder than someone who is striving to achieve life's basic necessities, particularly a woman with children to support. Sadly, it is also true that in catastrophic circumstances, very little of the cash so generously given ever gets all the way down to the very poor. There are too many "professionals" ahead of them in line, highly skilled at diverting funds into their own pockets. This is particularly regrettable because very poor people need only a little money to set up a business that can make a dramatic difference in the quality of their lives.

I started the Grameen Bank 30 years ago by distributing about $27 (no typo here!) worth of loans among 40 extremely poor Bangladeshis. Since the bank officially opened in 1983, it has loaned $5.7 billion in microfinance. Today, Grameen has 6.6 million borrowers in Bangladesh alone, borrowing $500 million a year in loans that average just over $100 each. The loans are entirely financed by borrowers' deposits and the bank recovers 98.85% of all money loaned. Notably, Grameen Bank has been profitable in all but three years since its launch. Our largely poor customers save $1.008 for every dollar they borrow, so the poor are truly funding the poor.

The bank supports businesses such as small services, stores, direct sales, furniture-making, cell phone stations and milling, all of which support the local economy. And it works. More than half of our borrowers have moved out of poverty, mainly through their own efforts. Most importantly, when you lend money to disadvantaged people, it gives them a sense of pride, rather than the humiliation they may feel over a handout. And just as helpful as the money is the guidance they get from the bank. Training and connecting poor, inexperienced workers to a reliable and ethical lending and savings service is a huge advantage for them that only gets stronger after a disaster. This is particularly true of women, who are often constrained by social and financial barriers. Grameen communities have also made tremendous strides on health and social issues, such as sanitation, and pushed aside discriminatory practices such as bridal dowries.

The impact of microfinance is spreading worldwide. As of December 2004, 3,100 microcredit institutions reported reaching 92,270,289 clients, 66,614,871 of whom were among the world's poorest when they took their first loan. Assuming five persons per family, the loans to the 54.8 million poorest clients affected some 330 million family members by the end of 2004.

Microfinance has worked so well that it has become a major instrument of reconstruction in post-tsunami Asia as well. A Sri Lankan conglomerate, Ceylinco, partnered with Grameen to provide small loans to 10,000 tsunami victims. These range from $300 to $10,000 and carry an interest rate of 6%, less than half the rate for similar small loans in Sri Lanka. The loans have a one-year grace-period, and Ceylinco takes no collateral, thereby heaping all the risk onto itself. But the company felt this was still a wise investment.

Because some countries that rely heavily on microfinance also happen to be disaster-prone, Grameen now has special disaster loan funds (DLFs) to help meet the urgent need for cash after a catastrophe. These funds also aim to offset the microlender's own losses. The funds were established in Bangladesh after the record flooding of 1998, which affected 20% of the population. Similar funds were set up in Central America in the wake of Hurricane Mitch, and in Poland after the floods of 1997. The DLFs are financial reserves and usually derived from the initial donor grant to the micro-credit lender.

Many people ask, Why not just give free cash, especially under such dire circumstances? In Bangladesh, we've learned that when aid is free, not only do the poor get the least of it, but everyone inflates their needs. While some handouts are clearly necessary in such times, we focus on lending small amounts of money. This lets us keep costs down and rebuild funds for the next disaster. Most importantly, our Grameen banks are ready to act at a moment's notice. They can respond to a disaster without waiting for anyone's permission, immediately becoming like humanitarian agencies by suspending loan payments, and providing cash, food and medicines. Once rebuilding starts, the bankers keep detailed records of the money lent, and people are allowed to repay bit by bit.

That is the strategy we followed after the 1998 flooding, which covered 50% of Bangladesh's land and affected customers at about 70% of our branches. More than 700 Grameen borrowers or their family members were killed and just over half (a million borrowers) were affected by the flooding. That represents a small percentage of the overall population affected, but the Bank and its staff where there right away to help with immediate needs. Later, microlenders helped people restructure their loans or gave out new loans on more favorable terms.

Microlending has already helped millions reach a better life through their own initiative. It has also given them valuable skills as well as crucial financial back-up in case they ever face a natural disaster like Katrina. So it might be time to think about another type of support for Katrina's victims: the microloan. As our small, flood-battered country has learned, giving someone a hand up doesn't always require a handout. The most important thing is to help people get back to work while letting them hold on to their self-respect. Microloans can do just that.

WAR NEWS:

British Downplay Discord After General's Remark (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

ST. ANDREWS, Scotland, Oct. 13 — The British government raced Friday to defuse an embarrassing public debate over remarks by its top military commander that Britain should withdraw its troops from Iraq "sometime soon."

To critics of the government, his comments amounted to a challenge to Prime Minister Tony Blair's authority, since they seemed to be a direct contradiction of Mr. Blair's insistence that a retreat would be "a craven act of surrender."

The officer, Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, modified some of his remarks in a series of radio and television interviews on Friday to expand on his comments in The Daily Mail, which first featured them on its Web site late Thursday.

By "soon," he later said, he meant that British troops should not remain there for "years and years." But he did not completely retract his assessment that the presence of British forces in Iraq "exacerbated" the violence there.

"I have withdrawn none of the comments that I have made," he said in a radio interview. "I have given a little more explanation about what I meant by 'sometime soon.' That's not backtracking."

At a news conference after the Northern Ireland political settlement talks here in Scotland, Mr. Blair was asked whether Sir Richard had been opposing government policy. Mr. Blair insisted that, having read transcripts of the general's interviews on Friday, he was echoing official policy. "In terms of what he was saying about Britain, he was saying exactly the same as we have all said," Mr. Blair said, though he has never used the general's words. "We will stay and get the job done."

Mr. Blair also said, "The reason that we have been able to give up two provinces now to Iraqi control is precisely because the job has been done there."

The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, also tried to dull the remarks, saying, "His general point was that, you know, when your work is done you hand over authority to the Iraqis."

At an earlier briefing here, Mr. Blair's spokesman said the general's remarks after his Daily Mail interview showed there was "not a cigarette paper between" the prime minister and the general.

Opposition to the war led two members of Mr. Blair's cabinet to resign in protest to the invasion, and the war has greatly diminished Mr. Blair's popularity.

In another emotional issue that generates continued anger against the war, a coroner in Oxford said Friday that an inquest had found that Terry Lloyd, a British television war correspondent killed in Iraq in March 2003, was "unlawfully killed" by United States forces who opened fire on a vehicle carrying the wounded reporter away from a battlefield.

The coroner in Oxford, Andrew Walker, said the American troops should not have fired on a vehicle with wounded civilians. Mr. Lloyd was working as a so-called unilateral journalist, meaning he was not embedded with the allied forces. The coroner reviewed videotape of the fighting.

On Friday, Britain's National Union of Journalists called Mr. Lloyd's death a war crime, and Mr. Walker said he would write to the British attorney general urging him to prosecute the killers. In the fighting, Mr. Lloyd's Lebanese translator, Hussein Osman, also died. A French cameraman, Frédéric Nérac, is still missing and is presumed dead.

The general's initial comments drew widespread approval among antiwar legislators and on unofficial Web sites used by military bloggers. Britain has some 7,000 troops in Iraq, based primarily in the south around Basra.

In the Daily Mail interview, Sir Richard said British soldiers should leave Iraq "sometime soon, because our presence exacerbates the security problems." He also was quoted as saying that overstretching the British Army in Iraq could "break it."

The general told the BBC on Friday in a radio interview, "It was never my intention to have this hoo-ha."

"My intention is particularly to speak up for what is right for the army," he said.

On the same radio show, another British officer, Col. Tim Collins, who fought in Iraq in 2003, said the general's comments had offered a "refreshing and very honest insight into what the army generally feels."

DOJ_NMG_0081224

In an interview with Sky News on Friday, Sir Richard said: “We are not on the run; we are not hauling our colors down. We are going to see this thing through, but we have got to get on with it; we can’t be there for years and years in the sorts of numbers we are.”

Britain's Army Chief Clarifies Remarks On Troop Withdrawal (WP)

By Mary Jordan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 13 -- Britain's top army commander, who ignited a controversy by saying that British troops should withdraw from Iraq "sometime soon," clarified Friday that he wants a pullout but not until "the mission is substantially done."

Gen. Richard Dannatt had been quoted in Friday editions of the Daily Mail as saying that British troops should leave Iraq "sometime soon because our presence exacerbates the security problems."

"We weren't invited" into Iraq, he said, but rather "kicked the door in," and "whatever consent we may have had in the first place" from the Iraqi people "has largely turned to intolerance."

Dannatt said he had "much more optimism that we can get it right in Afghanistan."

In television and radio interviews Friday, Dannatt said he was not "backtracking" but expanding on his remarks and putting them in context. He said there was no "rift" between him and Prime Minister Tony Blair, whose office reportedly was engaged in a flurry of phone calls with the Defense Ministry over the issue. Blair recently has said a British withdrawal from Iraq would be "a craven act of surrender."

Military experts on both sides of the Atlantic have said they believe that many British military officials are eager to find a way to withdraw from the unpopular war in Iraq and concentrate on Afghanistan. Britain has 7,200 troops in Iraq and 5,600 in Afghanistan, according to the Defense Ministry. According to ministry figures, 119 British soldiers have died in Iraq and 40 in Afghanistan.

Dannatt, echoing a statement put out by Blair's office, said in a statement issued Friday that "I am on record publicly saying we're standing shoulder to shoulder with the Americans."

In Washington, White House spokesman Tony Snow said Dannatt believed his comments had been "largely taken out of context."

"He's saying there may be some times when the Brits no longer are necessary -- they're there, they're seen as an occupier, that may exacerbate some of the tensions. And that's the context in which he was discussing it," Snow said.

Amyas Godfrey, a former British army officer at the Royal United Services Institute, said officials have responded to public pressure to set a timetable for a withdrawal from Iraq by saying that it will come "when the job is done." So it is significant, he said, that the army chief has said: "We should be leaving."

"Right or wrong, there is a feeling we followed Americans into Iraq," Godfrey said. As the security situation worsens in Iraq, he said, there is a feeling of "it wasn't our idea in the first place, so why are we still there?"

In interviews Friday, Dannatt, who took over as head of the army in August, continued to speak more candidly than previous military leaders. He said that in some parts of Iraq, the "mere presence" of British troops exacerbates violence.

"I am just saying, 'Come on, we can't be here forever at this level.' . . . I have got an army to look after, which is going to be successful in current operations, but I want an army in five years' time and 10 years' time. Don't let's break it on this one. Let's keep an eye on time," Dannatt said.

"Let's face it, we have been there three and a half years," he said. "We have an interest in getting on with this."

Blair Seeks To Counter General's Attack Over Iraq (FT)

By James Blitz

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

Tony Blair was last night fighting to limit the damage to his Iraq policy after Sir Richard Dannatt, the UK's top soldier, warned that Britain's military presence there would "break" the Army if it were required to operate in the country for much longer.

His assault on the prime minister's foreign policy - an unheard of action for a serving leader of the armed forces - provoked a day of tension between Downing Street and the military. Sir Richard had to clarify a comment in a newspaper interview that troops must leave Iraq "some time soon". But he drew wide support from former military leaders.

In radio and TV appearances Sir Richard said there was no difference between his views on Iraq and those of Mr Blair, who has argued that Britain would only leave when Iraqi forces could manage national security.

A contrite-sounding Sir Richard said the 8,000 troops in Iraq would leave "some time soon when the mission is done".

But while he insisted there was no difference between himself and Downing Street on Iraq policy, Sir Richard did not retreat from arguing that the campaign in Iraq was stretching the army to intolerable levels.

DOJ_NMG_0081225

Warning that Britain must be out of Iraq by 2008, he said: "We don't want to be there another two, three, four, five years. We've got to think about this in terms of a reasonable length of time."

Sir Richard received a show of support from senior military figures. Colonel Tim Collins, a senior UK officer in Iraq in 2003, said he had given a "refreshing and very honest insight into what the army generally feel".

But Michael Portillo, ex-Tory defence secretary, said Sir Richard was "absolutely compromised" by his initial contradiction of UK government policy.

Blair Stresses No Disagreement With Army Chief In Iraq Pull-out Row (AFP)

By Katherine Haddon

AFP, October 14, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair insisted that there was no difference of opinion between him and army chief General Sir Richard Dannatt, who has said British troops in Iraq are exacerbating security problems and should pull out soon.

In an interview with the Daily Mail newspaper published Friday, Dannatt said: "I don't say the difficulties we are experiencing round the world are caused by our presence in Iraq but undoubtedly our presence in Iraq exacerbates them."

He added that Britain should pull out "sometime soon because our presence exacerbates the security problems".

Dannatt, the chief of general staff, later used a statement after further interviews on television and radio Friday to try to scotch the impression that he was at odds with Blair and Defence Secretary Des Browne.

He said that the army would stay in southern Iraq "until the job is done", adding: "I'm a soldier -- we don't do surrender".

Blair said Dannatt had used his later interviews to set the one with the Mail in context, during a press conference at St Andrews, Scotland, where he has been taking part in talks on restoring power-sharing to Northern Ireland.

The Prime Minister said he agreed with "every word" of Dannatt's later radio interview.

"If you read the transcript of his interview on the radio this morning and the television, he sets in proper context exactly what he was saying," Blair said.

"And if I can take just one example of why it's important these things are in context, what he is saying about wanting the British troops out of Iraq is precisely the same as what we're all saying."

Meanwhile, White House spokesman Tony Snow indicated that the United States had asked for an explanation of Dannatt's comments.

"We did call and say 'what did he say?' and we received transcripts, especially this morning's interview," he said.

Since the newspaper interview appeared overnight, Dannatt has also been at pains to show any troop reductions had to be coordinated with the United States, which provides the bulk of allied troops in Iraq.

Dannatt told the Mail that though the intention of invading Iraq was to set up a pro-Western liberal democracy which "might have a beneficial effect on the balance within the Middle East", he did not think "we are going to do that."

"I think we should aim for a lower ambition."

On BBC radio, Dannatt suggested a reduced goal might involve aiming for a unitary Iraqi state but added "whether we can make it happen, I don't know."

The Mail interview was widely interpreted as contradicting Blair's defence of the presence of British troops in Iraq in September, when he said that if Britain were to withdraw, the country "will be committing a craven act of surrender that will put our future security in the deepest peril".

Colonel Tim Collins, one of the most senior British Army officers in Iraq in 2003, praised Dannatt for what he said as a "refreshing and very honest insight into what the army generally feel."

Anti-war campaigners welcomed Dannatt airing his views, with the left-wing Stop The War Coalition even inviting the general to speak at the group's next public demonstration.

Britain has 7,200 troops in southern Iraq patrolling an area around Basra, a bastion of Iranian-backed Shiite militias. Since Britain joined the US-led invasion three years ago, 119 British troops have been killed in Iraq.

Blair's Power Sliding On Dannatt Remarks (AP)

By Beth Gardiner, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Is Tony Blair losing control? His army chief's brazen declaration that British troops should soon leave Iraq is the latest evidence that the once-formidable prime minister — who rode out a fierce party rebellion just last month — may be rapidly losing his political clout.

DOJ_NMG_0081226

The catalyst is clearly the Iraq war, which is seen across Britain as a tragic mistake. But Blair's influence also has suffered because of his close ties to President Bush, who is deeply unpopular in Britain, and in recent months over his support of Bush's stand that Israel should not be forced into a premature cease-fire in Lebanon.

Blair struggled Friday to stamp out the furor following Gen. Richard Dannatt's statement that the presence of British troops is provoking violence in Iraq, not preventing it.

The opposition Conservative party — which has branded Blair a lame duck leader since he announced last month that he would resign within a year — said the army chief's comments were further proof that the Labour leader's authority was waning.

Dannatt later tried to tone down his remarks — saying he wanted a gradual pullout over the next few years — but he did not back away from them entirely. And it was too late to quell the debate set off by comments that not long ago would have seemed almost inconceivable.

"The general is just saying what millions of people in this country know to be true from simply reading the papers and watching the news," said John Rees, a co-founder of the Stop the War Coalition.

"He better than anybody knows that the British army isn't in a position to sustain this," Rees said. "It's chaos in Iraq."

Dannatt gave a series of interviews Friday and issued a statement clarifying the remarks he originally made to the Daily Mail newspaper, which were dominating the British media.

"The mere fact that we are still in some places (in Iraq) exacerbates violence from those who want to destabilize Iraqi democracy," his statement said.

"But that is not a reason for us to leave. I am on record publicly saying we're standing shoulder-to-shoulder with the Americans," he said. "I'm a soldier — we don't do surrender, we don't pull down white flags. We will remain in southern Iraq until the job is done. We're going to see this through."

Blair, in Scotland brokering talks between Northern Ireland's Catholic and Protestant political parties, said the Daily Mail had twisted Dannatt's words and taken them out of context.

The prime minister said he agreed with what he saw as the general's real message — that British troops should leave areas of Iraq as soon as local forces were able to take over security, and would be unwelcome if they stayed beyond that time. British troops have so far left two provinces in the country's south.

"What he is saying about wanting British forces out of Iraq is precisely the same as we're all saying," Blair told reporters. "Our strategy is to withdraw from Iraq — when the job is done."

Liam Fox, defense spokesman for the opposition Conservative Party — whose recent surge in the polls has made it a real threat to Blair's Labour Party — said the government should be as candid as Dannatt was about Iraq.

"What is surprising is the timing and outspoken nature of the (Dannatt) interview, which occurs at a time when the prime minister's authority seems to be ebbing away," the Tory said in a statement.

The Daily Mail, which released its interview on its Web site Thursday night, quoted Dannatt as saying that while Iraqis might have welcomed coalition forces following the ouster of Saddam Hussein, the good will has since evaporated.

The British military should "get ourselves out sometime soon because our presence exacerbates the security problems," he reportedly said.

British and American planning for postwar Iraq was poor, he added — "probably based more on optimism than sound planning."

The criticism follows months of political trouble for Blair, whose government has been damaged by a war that was unpopular from the beginning and has grown more so as the violence grinds on.

A rebellion in the Labour Party trying to oust Blair forced his reluctant announcement last month that he will resign within a year.

Former Home Secretary David Blunkett also claimed in memoirs excerpted this week that Treasury chief Gordon Brown — who seems likely to take over the party, and the government, when Blair steps down — privately opposed the war until shortly before it began, when he decided to back Blair.

Seeking Success In Iraq (NYDN)

However fast Britain's top general clarified remarks appearing to suggest he is less enthusiastic about staying the course in Iraq than he's expected to be, there is undeniably growing sentiment even in hardy stay-the-course circles that the Iraqi mission - just and high-minded though it was at the beginning, just and high-minded though it remains - has been no howling triumph.

Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, no cut-and-run man, said: "I'm a soldier. We don't do surrender. We're going to see this through." But he also said: "History will show that the planning for what happened after the initial successful war fighting phase was poor, probably based more on optimism than sound planning." No arguing with that.

Which is why the war's immediate future hangs heavily on the soon-to-be-issued recommendations of ex-Secretary of State James Baker's bipartisan Iraq Study Group. It may already be too late in the game to undo some of the Bush administration's blunders, which have become a familiar litany in the national dialogue: There were too few boots on the ground to begin with, nobody moved fast enough to quell civil unrest in the invasion's immediate aftermath, Coalition Provisional Authority chief Paul Bremer was an utter fool to disband the Iraqi military, etc., etc. All true, all true, inexcusable, indefensible, a sorry prosecution. And all there is to say about it is, well, that was then and now is now, and there's no starting over.

High hopes attend whatever the Baker group's ideas will be about redirecting the allied energies into coherent goals, however they might be realized under the real-world conditions that now exist in what Sen. Hillary Clinton has just described as the Iraq that is, not the Iraq we would like it to be. The fact remains that the success of the allied effort has always been contingent on Baghdad's new leadership, which has yet to bring meaningful order to its own set of circumstances. The Iraqis absolutely must begin to take charge of their own affairs. Like the general said: We don't do surrender. "But we've got to get on with it. We can't be there for years and years."

No, we can't. And at this hour, it's up to Baker's bunch to help the White House find a path toward satisfactory resolution - and perhaps even to find America's way home again. Wish them wisdom.

It still stinks in Albany

The group that tagged New York's state Legislature as the nation's worst reports now that - surprise! -precious little has changed.

Wily pols that they are, Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver and Senate Majority Leader Joe Bruno mollified the public with gestures - such as meeting the budget deadline and requiring lawmakers to actually be in their seats when voting. But the pair still giveth and taketh away committee chairmanships - and the extra pay accompanying same - so the rank-and-file sheepishly obeys their every command. No wonder, then, that the followup report from the Brennan Center for Justice at NYU pronounces the system "still broken."

Committees still rubber-stamp major legislation without hearings. Bruno and Silver still determine, unilaterally, which bills go to the floor. And bills that go to the floor always, always, always pass.

In 2004, the Brennan Center proved by objective measures that ours was the land's most dysfunctional legislature - which is saying a lot (think Trenton). The authors did not take the trouble to repeat that calculation this time around, but no matter. When it comes to godawful government, everyone knows Albany takes the prize.

Economics lesson

It doesn't take a Nobel Prize in economics to realize that the federal minimum wage - frozen at $5.15 an hour since 1997 - should be higher. Say, $7.25. But the Republican Congress, parroting the disproved argument that a higher minimum hurts employers, refuses to act. To refute the politicos, more than 650 economists, among them five Nobelists, this week issued a public letter calling for an increase.

They explain that a decent minimum not only fights poverty but equalizes "the imbalance in bargaining power that low-wage workers face in the labor market." And they note that the value of the 1997 increase"has been fully eroded," its purchasing power at its lowest point since 1951. Those hurt are not employers but the working poor. Which does not appear to matter to the working rich in Congress, who are not likely to change their minds, even with a lesson from the laureates. Perhaps control of Congress should be changed.

Shiites Push For British Troops To Leave (AP)

Many Shiites in this southern port city say they want British troops to leave, though the region is still bloodied by a persistent grind of killings, including Sunni insurgent bombings and Shiite-on-Shiite slayings amid a competition for political control.

Several prominent Basra leaders on Friday agreed with an assessment by Britain's army chief that the British presence only worsens the violence and the soldiers should withdraw soon. Gen. Richard Dannatt backpedaled Friday from the comments he made in an interview a day earlier, saying he meant troops should leave within years, but the statements caused a political storm in Britain.

In Basra, Shiites insist the British presence only provides a target for attackers seeking to end the "occupation" — and some said the troops are doing nothing to rein in party-backed Shiite militias that have risen to prominence.

"To tell the truth, (the British) have caused the chaos and the security decline in southern Iraq, especially Basra, by their leniency with the militias and their parties," said Ghali Nijm, head of the Shiite Wifaq party in Basra.

Added Aqil Talib, a member of the Basra provincial council from the Shiite Fadila party: "The British presence is no longer desired, as is that of the Americans and others, even though the British are kinder than the Americans."

It's a change in attitude from early in the Iraqi conflict, when Shiites across the country welcomed U.S.-led coalition troops that toppled Saddam Hussein, who had persecuted the Shiite majority. British troops in Basra were even praised for taking a gentler approach to policing the region than American troops further north, who were seen as heavy-handed.

But with the violence wearing on, anti-U.S. sentiment has been growing among Shiites across Iraq, and with it the feeling that international troops should go. The militia of Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, which deeply opposes the U.S.-British presence, has been growing in power.

The central government in Baghdad underlined on Friday that it wants U.S. and British troops to remain, saying they are needed to contain the violence and train Iraqi forces.

In early October, British and Iraqi forces began a neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep of Basra — code-named "Operation Sinbad" — similar to one launched in August by U.S. troops in Baghdad. The sweep has gone through three districts — including two with a heavy militia presence — clearing out weapons, arresting about 100 people and launching reconstruction projects.

"The presence of these forces is necessary so that they can participate in establishing stability in Iraq," government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said.

The predominantly Shiite south has long been less violent than Baghdad and the Sunni regions of central and western Iraq, where the anti-U.S. insurgency has been based.

But there has still been steady bloodshed, and it has increased this year with the swelling of sectarian killings across the country. Basra province — home to about 3 million people, where most of the 7,000 British troops are based — sees a constant toll of bombings, shootings and kidnappings.

They come in part from Sunni insurgent attacks against British troops and Iraqi civilians with bombings, mortars and rocket fire. But increasingly the area has seen killings between Shiites as party-backed militias vie for influence.

On Thursday, a prominent al-Sadr cleric, Sheik Radhi al-Assadi, was gunned down near his home. His slaying came days after another cleric — also named Radhi al-Assadi, a distant relative, but connected to the rival Badr Brigade militia — was killed by gunmen.

Shiite militias also intimidate residents, enforcing strict Islamic laws in some districts, such as banning haircuts seen as Western, forcing women to wear the veil and closing video and music shops.

The desire to see foreign troops leave is also fueled in part by Shiite insistence they can run their own affairs.

"The British forces entered Iraq and liberated it from the Saddam regime," said one Basra resident, Essam Mohammed. "Since they have fully accomplished their mission, they should now leave Iraq ... because they are creating some obstacles and problems for the Iraqi people."

Home Winning The Peace II (SN)

By John Hall

Scripps News, October 14, 2006

Commentary

Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, who says the Bush administration "seriously misjudged winning the peace" in Iraq, now is heading a bipartisan commission that almost certainly will recommend broad changes in policy there before the end of the year.

What will become of these recommendations is becoming this capital's most interesting guessing game.

Baker is the respected Bush family friend and solicitor who made Bush's troubles go away in the famous 2000 contested Florida election that made him president. President Bush affectionately called the older man "Jimmy" in the Rose Garden last week. Yet, according to author Bob Woodward, he passed over Baker as secretary of Defense so he could stand by Donald Rumsfeld.

You could not tell listening to Bush's press conference last week, or reading the transcript of it, whether he is amenable to any change Baker and his distinguished panel might come up with. Baker suggested last Sunday that "stay the course" is no longer a good idea in Iraq.

Here was Bush's response to that:

"Stay the course means keep doing what you're doing. My attitude is, don't do what you're doing if it's not working; change.

"Stay the course also means don't leave before the job is done. We're going to get the job done in Iraq. And it's important that we do get the job done in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0081229

The president, more than once, said he was open to any kind of tactical change in course that his top commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., would bring to him. But he seems more entrenched, not less so, on his message that "the enemy's coming after us" if there should be a premature withdrawal of troops from Iraq.

The Defense department is now spreading the doctrine of the "long war" against radical Islam to a new generation of intelligence officers. They are being taught by the Joint Chiefs of Staff that only a victory in Iraq will stop the establishment of a caliphate that will spread its tentacles out of Baghdad into a half dozen major capitals of the Middle East, threatening the existence of Israel and the Western oil supply.

That is the 21st century version of the "falling dominoes" theory, which held that failure in Vietnam would lead to the loss of Asian alliances starting with Thailand. Now it has been brought up to date and modernized with the horror of the 9/11 attacks behind it.

Bush spoke of a day when "extreme forms of religion fight each other for influence in the Middle East; in which they've got the capacity to use oil as an economic weapon."

Indeed, it was Baker who raised concerns about Saddam Hussein's use of Iraq's oil wealth as a tool to leverage power. Iraq's invasion of Kuwait led to the first Gulf War. When Baker suggested Bush's father, who was then president, was justified in invading Iraq because of the effect of oil on jobs and the U.S. economy, he and the elder Bush were roundly criticized.

What influence Baker and his Iraq Study Group will have with the second President Bush, particularly when he is officially classified as a lame duck after the November elections, is arguable. The panel was created by Congress and includes such luminaries as former Republican New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, former Sen. Charles Robb of Virginia and former Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana. The latter two moderate Democrats were co-chairmen of the bipartisan commission that investigated the failures of government agencies that led to the 9/11 attacks and the breakdown in intelligence before the Iraq war.

The Iraq panel has largely kept its own counsel since it started work last March, quietly interviewing many of the principal players on the Iraq drama from Bush down. But the two most important, Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney, and the network of neo-conservatives who backed the war from the start have formed a protective wall around the existing strategy for a long time.

It will be difficult for Baker or anyone else to break through or get around them.

Army Chief Campaigns For Increased Funding (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Army is campaigning hard to ensure that it has enough money to keep up the battles in Iraq and Afghanistan and to prepare for potential future conflicts.

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, says the service needs $138 billion in 2008 to ensure it can field as many as 19 combat brigades at any given time, as called for by the Pentagon's latest four-year strategy. That figure is about $20 billion more than Congress approved for the Army in the 2007 budget.

The Army has 17 combat brigades deployed in Iraq and Afghanistan - a total of about 136,000 soldiers - but keeping those troops in battle has put unprecedented strain on the Army's funding, despite an estimated $507 billion that Congress has set aside since 2001 to pay for the wars.

But with more boots on the ground than any other service, the Army also has borne the brunt of manpower and equipment losses. More than 2,100 of the 3,100 U.S. troops killed in Iraq and Afghanistan have been Army soldiers. The Army plans to spend $17.1 billion this year to replace or repair equipment that's been lost or damaged, including more than 2,000 vehicles awaiting overhaul.

It's against this backdrop that Schoomaker appeared this week at the Army's annual convention in Washington and called for the country to increase defense spending. It was part of a public relations campaign not often seen among top uniformed military officials.

While he didn't name a figure, the general said the Army's continued effectiveness in the war would depend upon a "national commitment" to recruit, train and equip soldiers and support them and their families properly.

"This is a matter of national priorities, not affordability," Schoomaker said.

The call for increased defense spending comes at a time when the United States is spending about 4 percent of its gross domestic product on defense. The White House predicts defense spending will fall in coming years.

Schoomaker said spending 4 percent of GDP on defense is a historic low during a war. The United States spent 38 percent of its GDP on defense during World War II, 14 percent during the Korean War and 10 percent during the Vietnam conflict.

As one seasoned non-commissioned officer put it, professional armies are expensive to maintain and Schoomaker is being straightforward about what it's going to take to support the all-volunteer Army in a time of protracted war.

"The nation has not realized that yet," said the officer, a sergeant major with more than 30 years in uniform who spoke on condition of anonymity because he wasn't authorized to speak publicly. "The recent wars just now are bringing it to light. The (chief) is just saying that we're through pretending that everything is OK."

Army officials have been meeting since June with senior defense officials, the White House and members of Congress to come up with a spending figure for 2008. Schoomaker described it as a "very serious dialogue" designed to agree upon a "common set of facts" about the strategic challenges the Army faces in the future and what kind of resources it will need to meet those challenges.

"We have to increase the base budget just to support the strategy," said an Army official, who wasn't authorized to speak on the record about policy, but who agreed that Schoomaker's speech was designed to send a public message. "That's his main focus. Who was the message directed at? It's directed at Congress. It's directed at the people."

But one problem the Army is facing is that having a successful all-volunteer force has undercut much of the responsibility that the country has traditionally felt for the military, said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute, a policy research group in Arlington, Va.

"When you're absolutely certain that you're not going to have to serve in the military, it becomes something that's an afterthought rather than a primary concern," he said. "What he's saying in his speech is that the country needs to recognize the Army's needs and fund those needs, even if it doesn't intend to serve."

Underlying the public appeal for support is a very real fear among the top Army ranks that instead of increasing spending, Congress will take money away from the Army's highest-priority modernization program, the Future Combat System.

The FCS is a $120 billion program designed to build a group of 18 manned and unmanned vehicles linked by satellite communications and a common sensor network. Advocates say it will give soldiers unparalleled situational awareness on the battlefield. The Army hopes to begin fielding the first of elements of the program in 2008.

If squeezed by competing budget pressures, the Army is likely to give priority to the program, even if it means forgoing adding soldiers to the ranks, said Frederick W. Kagan, a military historian and defense analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative Washington research group.

The active-duty Army currently has about 494,000 soldiers, but Kagan and many other experts believe the service needs tens of thousands more to fight the war and meet other strategic commitments.

"We're in a crisis as far as personnel goes, and FCS should be a much lower priority," Kagan said. "Nevertheless, transformation is very important. The U.S. is entering a period of tremendous crisis in terms of national security, and the armed forces should not have to be making hard choices now - like FCS versus soldiers."

Congress has authorized the Army to grow to 533,000 soldiers.

The Cost Of Iraq War Is Out Of Control (SN)

Scripps News, October 14, 2006

Commentary

When it comes to casualties in the war in Iraq, no one can put a price on human life. But the cost in taxpayer dollars of U.S. military operations there continues to rise to gargantuan proportions.

According to the Congressional Research Service, Congress already has appropriated $437 billion for war, not including $70 billion approved by the Senate as part of next year's record-breaking Pentagon budget. That's half a trillion dollars _ about three-quarters of it for Iraq, 20 percent for Afghanistan and 5 percent for increased security against terrorism at other foreign bases.

The fighting in Afghanistan, home of the Taliban and training ground of the 9/11 terrorists, is one thing. But an increasing number of Americans see Iraq as a war we can no longer afford. Either way, the fiscal burden will be felt for generations because the cost is being applied daily to the nation's budget deficit.

More than 2,700 American soldiers have lost their lives in Iraq and Afghanistan, and some 20,000 others have been wounded. We would not presume to trivialize their sacrifice by placing a dollar value on the mayhem, but how many more lives may be put in jeopardy when the growing cost of the Iraq war crowds out spending for, say, a new cancer drug?

These are the real costs that will multiply under an administration that has the nation stuck in an open-ended commitment, with no thought to the long-range consequences. And these costs will continue to grow until the American people decide they've had enough.

Lack Of Confidence In Maliki Government Grows (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0081231

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - In the five months since Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki became Iraq's leader, the parliament and his ministries have formed hundreds of committees to address problems on everything from how to disarm militias to whether tainted meat caused a group of police officers to fall ill last week.

No one knows precisely how many committees have been formed - one estimate puts the number at 400. Yet only one committee has brought its findings to the parliament.

That lack of action is eroding Iraqi citizens' and U.S. officials' confidence that Maliki's government will be able to address the problems that plague this country, a development that would leave the U.S. with virtually no policy alternative.

U.S. strategy in Iraq currently revolves around the idea that given enough time and the proper security environment, Maliki's government will take control of the country and calm the sectarian tensions that threaten to dismember it.

Yet since Iraq's first permanent government was elected, security has eroded by nearly every measure, despite the U.S. training of more than 300,000 Iraqi police and soldiers. When the government came into power, 65 bodies on average were appearing on Iraq's streets a day; today, 100 are killed daily.

According to the interior minister, the government is issuing 15,000 passports a week, many to residents who say they're desperate to flee; school populations have dropped; and some Iraqi neighborhoods have become so sectarian that some areas are divided up street by street. Services, such as electricity, haven't improved.

Now there's a growing chorus that Maliki's government is unlikely to ever come to terms with the country's problems, a complaint reflected in Iraqi Web logs, newspaper columns, and, U.S. civilian and military officials say, in private conversations.

"I think Maliki is trying to convince the American people that he is serious about fixing things, and he is not serious," said Saad Assim al Janabi, a former member of government loyal to Ayad Allawi, whom the United States appointed interim prime minister of Iraq in 2004. "Maliki believes he is a Shiite Muslim first and that he belongs to the Dawa Party (a mostly Shiite party). We need someone to say he belongs to all of Iraq."

Top U.S. military and civilian officials here have been raising the tenor of their complaints about the government's inaction over the past month, warning that the government has only about two months to make major changes - though they don't say what might happen if it doesn't.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, in an interview this week, also sounded that alarm, saying the government must tackle such broad issues as de-Baathification, needed changes to the constitution, distribution of oil and strengthening the security forces.

But when pressed on how he expects the government to respond, he couldn't offer an answer.

The government "has committed themselves to making those decisions. And we will see how much progress they are making. But we will work with them. And if there are adjustments that need to be made to those tactics, we will consider them," Khalilzad said. "We had said the (first) six months are critical. They still have a couple of months."

Some members of the parliament, such as revered leader Humam Hamoodi, said American pressure is only making their task more difficult and that they need time.

Maliki took office on May 20 and within days announced a 24-point national reconciliation plan. It was the first of many plans that so far have had little beneficial effect on Iraq's conditions but came with a host of committees, each of which is given $13,333 a month to operate.

Under the national reconciliation plan, various committees were appointed to address a number of issues: prevention of human right violations, dissemination of a message of reconciliation, the removal of obstacles that hinder Iraqis from wanting to work.

But after a highly celebrated news conference, immortalized in the next day's newspapers by a photo of Maliki and the Sunni Muslim speaker of the house seemingly glaring at each other, there were no visible signs of changes in how the Iraqi government functioned.

Maliki's next initiative was a plan to bring peace to Basra, the predominantly Shiite city in southern Iraq that had been racked by growing violence between rival Shiite militias. That plan was to last 30 days and involved the creation of several committees. But at the end of 30 days, there was no lessening of violence. Basra residents reported that promised checkpoints aimed at curbing violence disappeared within days of the plan's inception. The second phase of the plan began this month, which included promises of more committees to rebuild Basra and hand the security apparatus to Iraqis.

The government's next peace initiative was the Baghdad security plan, or Operation Together Forward, a house-by-house sweep through the capital's most troubled neighborhoods by the Iraqi army, with the help of American forces. While crime dropped when U.S. troops blocked all entrances into the neighborhoods, when they began pulling out, criminal elements started moving back in.

Attacks in Baghdad rose from an average of 25.3 daily before the operation, to 36.1, according to the U.S. military.

"The Americans used to set up a checkpoint for a few days, especially when the security plan started, but now the Iraqi commando forces are responsible for the checkpoints. And they don't know how to deal with the people. They are really sectarian. I feel that the whole security plan had failed," said Abu Amer, 35, of the mostly Sunni Baghdad neighborhood of Dora, one of the areas swept by the American forces.

Finally, last week, Maliki and top Sunni leaders signed a four-point pact vowing to create several committees to end sectarian violence, including one to curb the media from showing graphic images of bombings and assassinations. It took them two days to hammer out the deal, and in a prime-time broadcast, they swore that either the Shiite-dominated militias or the government would survive, but not both.

Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. general in Iraq, issued a statement that evening calling the pact a significant step in the right direction showing that the Iraqi leaders wanted their country to succeed and were responding to their people's wishes for security.

But Grand Ayatollah Ali al Sistani, the top Shiite religious leader, issued a statement through his representative a few days later saying the pact lacked details - a statement echoed last week at a news conference in Washington by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., who had just returned from Iraq.

Brandishing a copy of Maliki's speech, Warner told reporters he would share it with them. "But I have to tell you, folks, it's five pages long, and you're hard put to figure out how this represents a plan that was so carefully described to us," Warner said. "That, I think, symbolizes the difficulty we have in dealing with this situation."

Most recently, Maliki has met with leaders in Anbar province and promised to create two non-sectarian army brigades in Baghdad. It remains unclear when the brigades will hit the streets, and government officials couldn't explain how they would form a non-sectarian force in the current political climate.

Ali Debaugh, a spokesman for Maliki, said the administration's greatest success is that there is dialogue among the sects.

"I think the most important accomplishment is not the reconciliation project itself as the dissemination of the reconciliation spirit," Debaugh said.

But dissemination of spirit isn't what Iraq needs, say the government's critics.

"None of the plans have reached the Iraqi street," Janabi said. "They say everything. They do nothing."

Al-Sistani's Influence Declining In Iraq (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani once wielded so much influence he seemed to single-handedly chart the post-Saddam Hussein political future in Iraq. Now, the country's top Shiite cleric appears powerless as Iraq edges toward civil war.

With dozens of Iraqis dying daily from Sunni-Shiite reprisal killings, the failures of al-Sistani's pleas for peace underline a major power shift in the Shiite establishment.

"Their political interests now outweigh religious interests," said Mustapha al-Ani, a Dubai-based Iraqi analyst. "To some extent, the need for al-Sistani's endorsement is no longer a prerequisite to gain power. Those with street credibility and a militia now have the power."

It's a major shift from the more than two years following Saddam's ouster, when Shiite leaders hung on al-Sistani's every word concerning politics. His opposition to U.S. plans for elections and a constitution forced the Americans to make dramatic changes. His calls for Shiites to avoid violence were largely adhered to.

But priorities for Shiite political parties have changed and their leaders no longer appear to feel the need to be seen to be closely associated with al-Sistani to gain legitimacy.

The swing has stripped the Shiite clergy, with the Iranian-born al-Sistani at its head, of much of its influence and given a lead role to followers of anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who does not recognize al-Sistani's religious authority.

It is a power shift that does not bode well for Iraq's Shiite-dominated government or the U.S.-led military coalition as they try to contain the stubborn Sunni insurgency and the wave of sectarian killings that has swelled since last winter.

Al-Sadr's supporters are widely suspected in many of the attacks on Sunni Arabs. His militiamen, who staged two revolts against U.S. troops in 2004, also have clashed with U.S. and Iraqi soldiers in Baghdad and southern Iraq in recent weeks.

Al-Sistani has responded to the bloodshed with a mixture of resignation and a deep sense of disappointment, said an official who is in regular contact with al-Sistani in the southern holy city of Najaf.

"He keeps praying for peace," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to speak to the media. "He feels the pain every day, but he has no magic wand. He tells visitors every day that what's happening does not please God or his prophet and has nothing to do with Islamic teachings."

Al-Sistani's last public statement on the crisis in Iraq came more than three months ago, when after a meeting with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, he publicly upbraided the leader for the government's failure to bring security.

Although al-Sistani has steadfastly refused to meet with U.S. officials, he counseled Shiites not to take up arms against the Americans. In 2004, he personally intervened to broker a truce that ended weeks of fighting between al-Sadr's militiamen and the U.S. military in Najaf.

In statements earlier this year, al-Sistani emotionally appealed for peace between the Shiite majority and the once-dominant Sunni minority.

The cleric, who is in his mid-70s and suffers from a heart condition, sets aside 90 minutes every day to receive visitors and well-wishers and without fail he urges them to work for an end to the bloodshed, said the official close to al-Sistani.

The visitors are mostly tribal chiefs or public figures but include less prominent Shiites. The flow of visitors shows that reverence for al-Sistani as a religious figure remains strong — but the continuing violence is a sign of his waning political leverage.

Iraq's main media give significantly less coverage to al-Sistani than they did a year ago. Portrait posters of al-Sadr in the streets of Baghdad as well as the mainly Shiite south now far outnumber those of al-Sistani.

Previously, Shiite politicians could hardly make a major decision without traveling to al-Sistani's office in Najaf to get his opinion or seek his endorsement.

When the United States tried to put off elections, al-Sistani's insistence on the vote — and mass protests he called for — forced a change of heart in Washington and elections were held in January and December 2005.

The January 2005 election produced a parliament that drafted a new constitution adopted in a referendum last October. A second election, for a full, four-year legislature, was held last December.

Al-Sistani was credited for the high Shiite turnout in all three votes. But the dismal performance of the two Shiite-led governments produced by last year's elections chipped away at his prestige since it was his support that brought them to power.

The governments' failures drove many Shiites away from moderates and into the camps of radicals like al-Sadr, whose militia — the Mahdi Army — controls Baghdad's teeming Shiite district of Sadr City and a string of Shiite towns across central and southern Iraq.

"After the elections and the referendum, people as well as the marjayiah (top Shiite clergy) expected life to be rosy, but all we got was trouble," said the official in contact with al-Sistani.

Vali Nasr, who lectures on Islamic affairs at the U.S. Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, Calif., believes al-Sistani's involvement in politics hurt his standing.

"In some ways, his authority has gone down and he lost control of the political process," Nasr said.

Official: Guard Force Is Behind Death Squads (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 13 -- Iraq's interior minister on Friday rejected allegations that Iraq's police and military have played a major role in the death squads blamed for Baghdad's surging violence, saying that only a small number of all those caught in U.S. or Iraqi raids were members of the police or army.

Jawad al-Bolani, speaking to a small group of reporters in Baghdad, blamed the Facilities Protection Service, or FPS, a massive but unregulated government guard force whose numbers he put at about 150,000.

"Whenever we capture someone, we rarely find anyone is an employee of the government ministries," Bolani said. When they are, "they've turned out to be mostly from the FPS, with very few individual, actual incidents involving anyone from the Ministry of Interior or Ministry of Defense."

Since midsummer, Shiite-Sunni violence has escalated in Baghdad, with the Health Ministry last month reporting that the number of monthly killings here had roughly doubled since spring, to 2,600. Most of the victims had been shot and their bodies dumped in the streets, often handcuffed, blindfolded and showing signs of torture.

Many victims are Sunni Arabs. Sunnis and some U.S. officials charge that Shiite Muslim militias, sometimes operating inside the mainly Shiite police forces, are responsible for much of the killing. Victims of Baghdad's violence are often taken away by men in police uniforms, and sometimes in police vehicles, and later found dead.

Bolani and his predecessor as interior minister, Bayan Jabr, both have minimized the possibility of any police involvement in the nightly killings. "We are experiencing a problem of impressions" regarding a police role in killings and militia infiltration of police, Bolani said Friday.

American generals were among the first to publicly express suspicion that the Facilities Protection Service was playing a key role in the growing sectarian killings. U.S. commanders themselves started the agency soon after the 2003 U.S-led invasion, intending it to be a force of a few thousand men who would guard buildings against looting.

The service today has grown to a size rivaling that of the U.S. force in Iraq, although control of the service's men is split among the various ministries they are nominally assigned to guard. Most wear uniforms similar or identical to those of the police.

Bolani also said bodyguard units assigned to unspecified officials were carrying out some of the killings.

Bolani, like Jabr, has repeatedly suggested that killings by gunmen in police uniforms were being carried out by impostors. On Friday, he repeated promises made since early this year that police would soon be issued uniforms and vehicles that would be difficult to duplicate.

Bolani also said police forces are trying to reform themselves, such as by retraining men and requiring loyalty oaths. He said major changes were needed at the command level of the Interior Ministry itself and that he had the backing of the government to make them.

Iraq's government, led by the Shiite religious parties that also lead the militias, has shown little willingness to confront them.

Interior Ministry officials were serious about purging "corrupt elements" and had fired about 3,000 employees for that reason, Bolani said. Aides said 1,228 of those employees had been subjected to administrative punishment, and Bolani said 10 to 20 percent of the 3,000 had been referred for possible prosecution. He declined to immediately give examples of infractions or name those punished.

Bolani, an independent allied to the coalition of governing Shiite religious parties, also said three of the country's biggest militias -- those of the country's two main Kurdish parties and that of a leading Shiite religious party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq -- were among those that had been lawfully integrated into the country's security forces.

He said that a fourth major militia, the Mahdi Army of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, along with Sunni insurgent groups, were "outside the political body and structure."

"We do not approve of the existence of these militias," Bolani said of the Mahdi Army and Sunni insurgents.

Iraqi Official Deflects Criticism (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

The interior minister says few of those aiding or tolerating sectarian killings work for him.

BAGHDAD — Iraq's interior minister, whose forces are accused of complicity in sectarian death squad killings, defended his agency in an interview with U.S. reporters Friday, and said he had the backing of the prime minister and parliament to remove corrupt and incompetent police commanders from the streets.

Jawad Bolani, a political independent who took over as interior minister in June, downplayed the problems at his ministry, seen by many as a source of sectarian tension and violence throughout the country.

He said more than two-thirds of sectarian slaying victims were found in areas of Baghdad under the control of the Defense Ministry, which oversees the Iraqi army, suggesting that U.S. and Iraqi focus on the alleged abuses by his forces was misplaced.

"Baghdad is not only the Ministry of Interior," Bolani said in his office in the capital. "It is divided in responsibility."

The Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry has been accused by Sunni Arab politicians of harboring or tolerating Shiite Muslim militias linked to killings of Sunni Arab civilians. Dozens of corpses showing signs of torture show up daily in the Tigris River or in abandoned lots. At least 18 bodies were discovered Friday in Baghdad.

North of the capital, near the Tigris River town of Duluiya, police discovered the beheaded bodies of 14 Shiite Muslim laborers who were among 17 abducted Thursday by gunmen believed to be Sunni Arab insurgents. The victims were handcuffed and showed signs of torture.

South of Baghdad, insurgents killed an Iraqi police SWAT commander Friday in a bombing at an Interior Ministry compound that also killed a deputy and injured two others, officials said.

One U.S. soldier was reported killed in combat near Tikrit on Thursday when his vehicle struck a homemade bomb. A U.S. military news release said two Western security contractors guarding a U.S. Army Corps of Engineers convoy were killed by a roadside bomb Wednesday.

Bolani sidestepped questions about whether he saw militia influence in the Interior Ministry. But he drew a distinction between militias that existed before the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq and others, such as radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi army, that emerged afterward. Under Iraqi law, those that existed before the invasion and fought former President Saddam Hussein have a right to be incorporated into security forces, whereas the others are illegal, he said.

Bolani said few sectarian militia members who had been arrested worked for the Interior Ministry. Often they were employees of an Iraqi security force that guarded government buildings, or were security guards at other ministries or for politicians. He said some had been linked to the Iraqi National Intelligence Service.

Bolani said he had removed 3,000 police officers from their posts, referring anywhere from 10% to 20% of the cases to prosecutors. An aide said Bolani had issued 1,228 "administrative punishments" to employees.

But the minister acknowledged that he was powerless when it came to security in large areas of the capital, especially in Sunni-dominated western Baghdad.

He noted that Amer Hashimi, the brother of a Sunni Arab politician, was killed this week in his Baghdad home in a neighborhood under the control of the Defense Ministry.

Increasingly shaken by the violence, many Iraqis have demanded accountability.

"It is not reasonable that cars in the daylight come to the house of a well-known commander and kill him, and the government says, 'We don't know,' " Sheik Harith Obeidi told worshipers Friday at the Shawaf Mosque in Baghdad.

Cmdr. Salam Trad, leader of a special police squadron, and his assistant were killed Friday in a bombing at his office in the Shiite city of Hillah, U.S. and Iraqi officials said. Investigators provided no details about the blast, but an Interior Ministry official said a bomb might have been placed beneath Trad's desk.

"It's obvious there was some kind of inside collaboration," said Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Kinani, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry.

The attack in the southern city came as thousands prepared to descend on the Shiite holy city of Najaf to commemorate a religious holiday.

More than 20,000 police officers will be on duty in the city, south of Hillah. Officials worry that Sunni Arab insurgents will attack the worshipers.

Iraqi Colonel Who Bridged Sectarian Divide Is Killed (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Jonathan Finer, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Officer Bridged Sectarian Divide

BAGHDAD, Oct. 13 -- Operating between the insurgent Sunni Arab suburbs of Baghdad and the Shiite militia-dominated south, Col. Salam al-Mamuri and his Scorpion commando team were a rarity among Iraqi security forces, American and Iraqi colleagues said: a police unit fighting on both sides of the country's sectarian divide.

On Friday, a bomb blew apart Mamuri and an aide at the Scorpions' headquarters in the southern city of Hilla. The attack ended the life of a broadly respected commander who had been one of the longest-serving and longest-surviving men in a cadre of Iraqi army veterans struggling to restore law and order after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

Mamuri's comparative evenhandedness enforcing the law may have earned him an enemy within his own sect, the Shiites. Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani in Baghdad called it a "possibility and a probability" that the assassination was at least in part an inside job, because the killer was able to gain access to Mamuri's office to plant the bomb.

Mamuri had founded the Scorpion brigade soon after Americans arrived and had led it ever since. Though the unit, whose commandos wore the emblem of a black arachnid, was known to locals as the Scorpions, successive deployments of U.S. Special Operations members and Marines generally called it simply Hilla SWAT.

The Scorpions were made up of about 800 men, most of them Shiites from Hilla. The unit, which Bolani called "one of the most important and vital of the Ministry of Interior," has remained relatively stable and cohesive since its early days, as other U.S. efforts to build Iraqi security forces have collapsed.

"The way I look at it, I am not here to serve Sunnis or Shiites. I am here to serve Iraq," Mamuri said in early May, in an interview in the office in which he was killed Friday. His close-cropped salt-and-pepper hair made him look a decade older than his 35 years.

His expression of neutrality was indistinguishable from those issued up and down the ranks of Iraq's predominantly Shiite police forces, many members of which are accused by Sunnis and Americans of a role in the country's escalating Shiite-Sunni killings. The difference, many Americans and Iraqis said, was that Mamuri acted as if he meant it.

"They are literally the only Iraqi unit under arms in the south that is completely independent of the political parties and the militias," a Special Forces intelligence specialist and medic said this year. "Everyone else -- the police, the army -- is playing ball for somebody. They won't."

An American Special Forces team leader who worked with the Scorpions for several months said, "We look at them as peers, we don't look at them as below us." As a matter of policy, Special Forces soldiers speak only on the condition of anonymity.

In Hilla on Friday, the commando leader's funeral dirge was the rattle of automatic-weapons fire, as the Scorpions shot into the air to mark Mamuri's death. Many residents of the flat, sprawling market town stayed indoors, taking shelter from the gunfire and fearing the killing would spark retaliatory violence.

"Ninety percent of the people are so sad about what happened, because the colonel was a very good man with the good people, but he was an iron hand against the outlaws," Hayder Foaud, a lawyer in Hilla, said by telephone.

Seven other officers were wounded by the bomb that killed Mamuri.

Capt. Muthana Ahmad, a spokesman for the provincial police force there, said the bomb may have been attached to a window of Mamuri's office. Others, including Abdul Kareem al-Kinani, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry in Baghdad, said investigators believed the wreckage indicated that the bomb had been placed under his desk.

"This is correct," Ahmad said, asked whether authorities suspected that one or more of the commando leader's aides collaborated in the killing. "As you may know, infiltration has taken place" in Iraq's security forces.

Bolani told reporters that he had ordered an investigation.

Hilla, about 60 miles south of Baghdad, is markedly more peaceful than the towns on the capital's southern outskirts that serve as strongholds for Sunni insurgents. Shiite schoolchildren today sing the Sunni towns' names, such as Latifiyah, in chilling songs equating them with hell.

On the other side of Hilla is the almost entirely Shiite south, free of the brunt of Sunni insurgent attacks but the scene of growing clashes between militias and security forces loyal to rival Shiite religious parties.

Hilla residents said Friday that local forces of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr especially disliked Mamuri, more than ever after the Scorpions raided a Sadr office in mid-September. Sadr's militia, known as the Mahdi Army, is one of the most powerful forces in Iraq.

Shiite politicians and officials from the Shiite-run Interior Ministry frequently threatened to have Mamuri replaced. Several attempts were made on his life, including a roadside bomb attack on his convoy in late April that was blamed on the Mahdi Army.

Because of its makeup and the fact that it fought al-Qaeda in Iraq and other Sunni-led insurgent groups, Hilla SWAT swiftly earned a reputation as a feared anti-Sunni force. It was heavily involved in the operations around Yusufiyah in April and May that led to the capture of several top al-Qaeda lieutenants and, the military later said, the eventual killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

But the unit cracked down as fiercely on Shiite militias, which Mamuri blamed this spring for what by then amounted to at least a half-dozen attempts to assassinate him. He barred militia members from serving in his brigade, despite intense political pressure from the provincial governor, who Mamuri said repeatedly pressured him to accept more militia members into his ranks.

"The militias consider us the only thing preventing them from completely taking over the south," Mamuri said in the spring interview. "They are bad for the country."

Mamuri rejected the idea of giving up in the face of the assassination attempts. "You can get killed in Iraq even if you sit all day in your house," he said. "What should I do, sit around and wait to die, or try to stop the people who are killing?"

15 Killed In Attacks Across Iraq (AP)

By Christopher Bodeen, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

At least 15 people were killed in attacks Friday around Iraq, including the commander of a battalion of special Interior Ministry police and six women and two girls who were shot south of Baghdad.

The women and young girls were killed by unidentified gunmen on the western outskirts of Suwayrah, 25 miles south of Baghdad, police Lt. Mohammed al-Shammari said. Two other teenage girls were kidnapped, he said.

In Hillah, about 60 miles south of Baghdad, a bomb planted in the Interior Ministry police headquarters killed Col. Salam al-Maamouri, commander of the Scorpion police battalion, and his aide, while wounding seven others, police Lt. Osama Ahmed said.

Police were investigating whether the bomb could have been placed by a policeman from the brigade, Ahmed said. He added that the bomb appeared to have been planted under the commander's chair or desk.

In downtown Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, a father and his two sons were killed by gunmen, provincial police said. Another two people were killed and one was wounded when unknown assailants opened fire on them on the eastern outskirts of Baqouba, police said.

The bodies of two guards assigned to protect a sewage handling facility were found in a market in Suwayrah, said Hadi al-Itabi, an official at the morgue in Kut.

8 Females, 2 Teenagers Kidnapped In Iraq (AP)

AP, October 14, 2006

Gunmen attacked Shiite women picking vegetables in a field outside the capital Friday, killing six adults and two young girls and kidnapping two teenagers. It was one of the deadliest assaults specifically targeting women in Iraq's monthslong wave of sectarian violence.

Police said they suspected the gunmen were Sunnis seeking to intimidate Shiites into fleeing the area south of Baghdad. Previous major attacks in Iraq have killed many women and men together, and at times individual women have been shot or kidnapped. But rarely have large groups of women been attacked.

In another sign of sectarian bloodshed, police in Duluiyah north of Baghdad found 14 beheaded bodies thought to be from a group of 17 workers kidnapped by gunmen Thursday while traveling home to the mostly Shiite town of Balad. There was no word on the other abductees.

The attack on the farm field took place outside Saifiya, an ethnically mixed village south of Baghdad. Most residents already fled to escape violence, Sunnis going to the nearby town of Madain, Shiites to neighboring Suwayrah.

The women were gathering vegetables when gunmen pulled up in two cars around 8 a.m. and surrounded the field. They opened fire, killing six women and two girls about 4 or 5 years old, Lt. Mohammed al-Shammari said. The attackers forced two teenage girls into the cars and escaped, he said.

Al-Shammari said the gunmen may have come from the nearby Baghdad district of Dora, a mixed neighborhood long torn by bloodshed inflicted by both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militiamen.

Baghdad has been the epicenter of violence for months. The city has averaged 36 attacks a day the past three weeks, an increase of nearly 30 percent over the preceding seven weeks and 60 percent higher than from mid-March to mid-June, according to U.S. military figures.

The U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, attributed the rise to the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, when he said attacks "historically" have increased. Some Islamic militants believe that dying in combat during Ramadan brings extra blessings in paradise.

U.S. officials warned weeks ago that killings by Shiite and Sunni death squads have become the greatest threat in Iraq, although the Sunni-dominated insurgency continues bombing and shooting attacks on U.S. and Iraqi troops as well as civilians.

Besides the attack on the women, at least 10 other Iraqi civilians died in violence Friday. A U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in northern Iraq, the 45th American death this month.

Bloodshed in Baghdad itself was tamped down by a curfew — imposed every Friday, banning vehicle traffic to prevent car bomb attacks on weekly Muslim prayers.

The northern city of Mosul was also under curfew after U.S. and Iraqi troops fought with gunmen Thursday night. The fight was sparked by a mortar barrage on a U.S. base that wounded 12 American soldiers. At least 12 suspected insurgents were reported killed in ensuing gunbattles.

The head of Iraq's most feared Shiite militia, the Mahdi Army, issued a statement late Thursday disavowing violence committed against Iraqis in the name of his group. But it was unclear whether he referred to slayings of Sunnis or minor clashes with other Shiite militias.

In pamphlets distributed in his hometown of Najaf, 100 miles south of Baghdad, radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr — whose party is also a powerful member of the government — said members of his militia had not been involved in any "unlawful attacks" on Iraqis.

"This has not been proven, but if it is shown to be true I will publicize their names and disavow them," al-Sadr said.

"They should make use of the holy month of Ramadan and repent," he added.

Meanwhile, a new video on the Internet hinted at possible splits between Iraqi Sunni insurgents and al-Qaida in Iraq, the group behind many of the country's worst bombings and whose fighters are thought to be mostly foreign Arabs.

A man claiming to be an Iraqi Sunni insurgent appears on the video urging Osama bin Laden to replace the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq because of its attacks on Sunni clerics.

"They planted explosives in the houses, the hospitals and the schools and even the electric transformers," the man, who called himself Abu Osama al-Iraq, said in the video.

He warned that if insurgents lose Sunni support, "we will be an easy hunt for the crusaders, the occupiers and their agents the Shiites." He asked bin Laden to name an Iraqi to replace Abu Ayyub al-Masri as leader of al-Qaida in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0081238

Al-Masri — whose pseudonym means "the Egyptian" — took over the leadership after Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed by a U.S. airstrike in June. Other Sunni insurgents had criticized al-Zarqawi, a Jordanian, for turning Sunni Iraqis against the movement by killing civilians.

The authenticity of the video, posted on a Web forum often used by Islamic militants, could not be confirmed. But it was the first report of dissent toward al-Masri.

SEAL Falls On Grenade To Save Comrades (AP)

By Thomas Watkins

Associated Press, October 14, 2006

CORONADO, Calif. (AP) -- A Navy SEAL sacrificed his life to save his comrades by throwing himself on top of a grenade Iraqi insurgents tossed into their sniper hideout, fellow members of the elite force said.

Petty Officer 2nd Class Michael A. Monsoor had been near the only door to the rooftop structure Sept. 29 when the grenade hit him in the chest and bounced to the floor, said four SEALs who spoke to The Associated Press this week on condition of anonymity because their work requires their identities to remain secret.

"He never took his eye off the grenade, his only movement was down toward it," said a 28-year-old lieutenant who sustained shrapnel wounds to both legs that day. "He undoubtedly saved mine and the other SEALs' lives, and we owe him."

Monsoor, a 25-year-old gunner, was killed in the explosion in Ramadi, west of Baghdad. He was only the second SEAL to die in Iraq since the war began.

Two SEALs next to Monsoor were injured; another who was 10 to 15 feet from the blast was unhurt. The four had been working with Iraqi soldiers providing sniper security while U.S. and Iraqi forces conducted missions in the area.

In an interview at the SEALs' West Coast headquarters in Coronado, four members of the special force remembered "Mikey" as a loyal friend and a quiet, dedicated professional.

"He was just a fun-loving guy," said a 26-year-old petty officer 2nd class who went through the grueling 29-week SEAL training with Monsoor. "Always got something funny to say, always got a little mischievous look on his face."

Other SEALS described the Garden Grove, Calif., native as a modest and humble man who drew strength from his family and his faith. His father and brother are former Marines, said a 31-year-old petty officer 2nd class.

Prior to his death, Monsoor had already demonstrated courage under fire. He has been posthumously awarded the Silver Star for his actions May 9 in Ramadi, when he and another SEAL pulled a team member shot in the leg to safety while bullets pinged off the ground around them.

Monsoor's funeral was held Thursday at Fort Rosecrans National Cemetery in San Diego. He has also been submitted for an award for his actions the day he died.

The first Navy SEAL to die in Iraq was Petty Officer 2nd Class Marc A. Lee, 28, who was killed Aug. 2 in a firefight while on patrol against insurgents in Ramadi. Navy spokesman Lt. Taylor Clark said the low number of deaths among SEALs in Iraq is a testament to their training.

Sixteen SEALs have been killed in Afghanistan. Eleven of them died in June 2005 when a helicopter was shot down near the Pakistan border while ferrying reinforcements for troops pursuing al-Qaida militants.

There are about 2,300 of the elite fighters, based in Coronado and Little Creek, Va.

The Navy is trying to boost that number by 500 - a challenge considering more than 75 percent of candidates drop out of training, notorious for "Hell Week," a five-day stint of continual drills by the ocean broken by only four hours sleep total. Monsoor made it through training on his second attempt.

Coroner Says U.S. Forces Unlawfully Shot Reporter (WP)

Briton to Seek Prosecution in 2003 Iraq Killing

OXFORD, England, Oct. 13 -- A British coroner ruled Friday that U.S. troops unlawfully killed a British television journalist during the invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

Coroner Andrew Walker, after an eight-day inquest, also said he would seek prosecution of the U.S. troops responsible for the death of Terry Lloyd, a veteran reporter for British television network ITN. Walker said he would ask Britain's attorney general and director of public prosecutions "whether any steps can be taken to bring the perpetrators responsible for this to justice."

The U.S. Defense Department said in a statement that U.S. military authorities had investigated the incident and determined that the American troops "followed the applicable rules of engagement."

Although it has been "an unfortunate reality that journalists have died in Iraq," U.S. troops have "never deliberately targeted" them or other noncombatants, the statement said.

According to a videotape provided by the U.S. military and testimony from witnesses, including an ITN cameraman who was at the scene, Lloyd, 50, was killed after being caught in crossfire between U.S. and Iraqi forces near the southern Iraqi city of Basra on March 22, 2003.

The British coroner said Lloyd was shot in the back by Iraqi soldiers who had overtaken his four-wheel-drive vehicle. Lloyd then walked to a civilian minivan and was being driven away for medical treatment when U.S. forces opened fire on the van, killing Lloyd with a shot to the head, Walker concluded.

"There is no doubt that the minibus presented no threat to the American forces," Walker said. "There is no doubt it was an unlawful act of fire upon the minibus."

Under British law, coroner's inquests are conducted when a person dies violently or from unknown causes.

A Lebanese interpreter, Hussein Osman, was also killed in the incident, and French cameraman Fred Nerac is officially listed as missing and is presumed dead. An ITN cameraman, Daniel Demoustier, survived the incident.

"In my opinion, the U.S. forces involved should be prosecuted for war crimes," Demoustier said after the ruling.

Lloyd's widow, Lynn, in a statement read by her lawyer, called the incident a "very serious war crime" and said the troops responsible should be tried for murder.

David Mannion, ITN editor in chief, said the network supported the family's pursuit of prosecutions. "All of us want and need to know the truth," he said. "Terry Lloyd was killed in an unlawful act by a U.S. Marine who fired directly at the civilian minibus in which Terry, already badly injured, lay helpless."

No U.S. military officials testified at the inquest, although several submitted written witness statements. Walker ruled those statements inadmissible because he did not have the opportunity to question the troops who wrote them.

U.S. military officials provided a video shot by a serviceman from one of the U.S. tanks involved in the incident. The tape, which was played at the inquest Thursday, shows two burning vehicles, one of which may have been the minibus that was carrying Lloyd. A forensic video expert testified that about 15 minutes of the tape may have been erased before it was provided to the inquest.

Lloyd's daughter, Chelsey, said Friday that "many questions" remain about her father's death, including, "Why is there 15 minutes of film missing?" The family says they believe the missing video would show the attack on Lloyd's vehicle.

Maj. Kay Roberts, the Royal Military Police officer in charge of investigating Lloyd's death, testified that she raised questions with American military authorities about whether the videotape had been altered. She said they assured her that "what we were given was everything that they had."

Lloyd was a 20-year veteran of ITN who had made previous trips to Iraq and had extensive experience reporting from conflict zones, including Kosovo and Bosnia. In his ruling, Walker praised Lloyd and his crew as "that rare breed whose professionalism and dedication in the face of great personal danger is and can only be admired by those they left behind."

Sullivan reported from London.

Coroner: U.S. Forces Killed TV Reporter (AP)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

A coroner ruled Friday that U.S. forces in Iraq unlawfully killed a British television journalist by shooting him in the head as he lay in the back of a makeshift ambulance during the opening days of the war.

The widow of reporter Terry Lloyd called for the perpetrators to be prosecuted for the "despicable, deliberate, vengeful act." And Deputy Coroner Andrew Walker said he would ask the attorney general to take steps to bring to justice those responsible for the death.

But prosecution of U.S. service members seemed unlikely.

Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros, a Pentagon spokesman, said an investigation into the killing of Lloyd, 50, a veteran reporter for the British TV network ITN was completed in May 2003 and "determined that U.S. forces followed the applicable rules of engagement."

"The Department of Defense has never deliberately targeted noncombatants, including journalists," he said. "We have always gone to extreme measures to avoid civilian casualties and collateral damage."

Ballesteros said the Pentagon will continue to work with news organizations to "do everything realistically possible to reduce the risk on an inherently dangerous battlefield, but we must remember that there are inherent risks in covering a war. "

The coroner inquest was unable to determine whether the bullets that killed Lloyd in southern Iraq on March 22, 2003, were fired by U.S. ground forces or helicopters.

DOJ_NMG_0081240

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack later described Lloyd's death as a tragedy, but concurred with the Pentagon that an investigation had found the troops involved had not broken the law.

"(Lloyd's death) was a tragic circumstance that occurred in a war zone ... it's a tragedy. It's a tragedy for his friends and for his family," he said.

Aidan White, the head of the International Federation of Journalists, the world's largest organization of journalists, said: "If this was murder, as the court suggests, and the U.S. is responsible, it is certainly a war crime."

The London-based National Union of Journalists welcomed the coroner's decision and also called the killing "nothing short of a war crime." Jeremy Dear, the group's general secretary, said: "The killing of journalists with impunity must never, ever go unpunished. Any attempt to silence journalists in this way must never succeed."

Witnesses testified during the inquest that Lloyd — who was driving toward the southern Iraqi city of Basra with fellow ITN reporters — was shot by Iraqi troops who overtook his car, then died after U.S. fire hit a civilian minivan being used as an ambulance and struck him in the head.

"Terry Lloyd died following a gunshot wound to the head. The evidence this bullet was fired by the Americans is overwhelming," Walker said. "There is no doubt that the minibus presented no threat to the American forces. There is no doubt it was an unlawful act of fire."

ITN cameraman Daniel Demoustier, the sole survivor of the incident, told the inquest ITN's two four-wheel drive vehicles were overtaken by a truck carrying Iraqi forces and that gunfire erupted.

Demoustier, a Belgian, said he jumped from the flaming car and lay in the sand, waiting for the shooting to stop. Demoustier said he tried to stand to signal U.S. tanks in the area but they resumed firing at the clearly marked ITN vehicles.

Demoustier said he saw a makeshift ambulance arrive and pick up people. He was later taken to safety in the car of a British newspaper reporter.

The coroner said Friday that an Iraqi civilian drove up in a minivan and picked up four wounded Iraqi soldiers, then saw Lloyd with a press card around his neck and helped him into the van. Lloyd was shot in the head as the van drove toward a hospital, the coroner said.

In an interview with The Associated Press, Demoustier said after the ruling that the inquest did not make clear whether the bullet that killed Lloyd was fired by a U.S. tank or helicopter. He said the forces in a tank would have been able to see that they were firing at a civilian vehicle, but a helicopter would not.

Lloyd's widow, Lynn, in a statement read by her lawyer, said U.S. forces "allowed their soldiers to behave like trigger-happy cowboys in an area in which there were civilians traveling."

Lloyd and the three other ITN crew members were some of the few Western reporters who covered the fighting on their own, while most others were embedded with U.S. or British forces.

Lebanese interpreter Hussein Osman also was killed and cameraman Fred Nerac remains missing and presumed dead.

U.S. authorities didn't allow servicemen to testify at the inquest. Several submitted anonymous statements that the coroner ruled inadmissible.

"I should have heard all evidence from the American personnel," Walker said. "It was not satisfactory or appropriate to read these statements in place of that evidence."

The court watched a video Tuesday, filmed by a U.S. serviceman attached to one of the tanks accused of firing at the reporters' cars. The tape opens with images of Lloyd's vehicle and the Iraqi truck burning amid gunfire. The tanks drive to the cars and inspect them. A minivan — possibly the ambulance — appears and more shots are fired. At the end of the tape, a U.S. soldier shouts, "It's some media personnel! That's media down there!"

A forensic examiner said the first 15 minutes of the tape may have been erased.

Pentagon Rejects Coroner's Verdict On Killing Of British Journalist (AFP)

AFP, October 14, 2006

US troops who killed a British journalist in Iraq in 2003 followed their rules of engagement, the Pentagon said, rejecting a British coroner's verdict that the killing was unlawful.

The Pentagon said its own investigation into the incident, in which British journalist Terry Lloyd was killed, concluded in May 2003 that "US forces followed the applicable rules of engagement."

"The Department of Defense has never deliberately targeted non-combatants, including journalists," the Pentagon said in a statement. "We have always gone to extreme measures to avoid civilian casualties and collateral damage."

Lloyd was killed, along with Lebanese interpreter Hussein Osman and French cameraman Fred Nerac, near the Shatt al-Basra Bridge outside Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, on March 22, 2003, days after the US-led invasion was launched.

The 50-year-old Lloyd, a correspondent for ITN News, was shot in the back after getting caught up in US and Iraqi crossfire, then shot in the head by US forces as he was taken away in a minibus for medical treatment, Oxfordshire Assistant Deputy Coroner Andrew Walker said.

"I have no doubt that it was an unlawful act to fire on this minibus," said the coroner in Oxford, west of London.

The Pentagon statement said its investigation was "limited to the engagement of the vehicle Mr. Lloyd was traveling in."

"It has been an unfortunate reality that journalists have died in Iraq," it said.

"Combat operations are inherently dangerous, and we do not take lightly our responsibilities in the conduct of these operations. We do not, nor would we ever, deliberately target a non-combatant civilian or journalist," it said.

U.S. Forces Blamed In Death Of British Journalist (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

LONDON — U.S. forces unlawfully fired the heavy-caliber machine-gun bullet that killed British newsman Terry Lloyd after an Iraqi civilian put him in his car and attempted to take him to the hospital when he was wounded shortly after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, a coroner ruled Friday.

After an eight-day inquest that included testimony from Lloyd's cameraman at ITN News, Oxfordshire Deputy Coroner Andrew Walker said he had "no doubt" the shooting was "an unlawful act," and concluded that Lloyd could have survived an earlier attack by Iraqi forces had U.S. soldiers not opened fire on his rescue vehicle.

Walker said he would ask senior British legal officials to hold those responsible criminally liable, but U.S. authorities denied wrongdoing and said the Marines deployed in southern Iraq during the early days of the war were following the rules of engagement.

"The Department of Defense has never deliberately targeted noncombatants, including journalists," the Pentagon said in a statement. "We have always gone to extreme measures to avoid civilian casualties and collateral damage."

U.S. officials declined to provide troops to testify at the inquest, and the coroner refused to accept what he said were anonymous "self-serving statements." No U.S. explanation was part of the inquest's official deliberations.

Lloyd's family called the shooting a "very serious war crime," and said the evidence showed that the newsman was able to stand and walk until he was shot in the head by U.S. troops while lying in the back of a minibus that had stopped to help him.

"This was not a 'friendly fire' incident or a crossfire incident. It was a despicable, deliberate, vengeful act, particularly as it came many minutes after the initial exchange" between U.S. military forces and Iraqi troops, Lloyd's widow, Lyn, said in a statement read by her lawyer.

"U.S. forces appear to have allowed their soldiers to behave like trigger-happy cowboys in an area where civilians were moving around," she said.

Unlike many journalists who were traveling with American forces at the beginning of the war, Lloyd and his crew were operating near the southern Iraqi city of Basra on their own, a strategy many journalists believed would allow them to get a more impartial view of the war.

They had set out to survey the area when they inadvertently moved past U.S. tanks toward a line of Iraqi soldiers, who began chasing the journalists through Iraqi and American gunfire.

"All hell broke loose, absolutely," Lloyd's Belgian cameraman, Daniel Demoustier, testified at the inquest.

Moments later, he said, "I turned my head to the right and saw the passenger door was open and Terry was not in the car anymore."

Lloyd's Lebanese interpreter, Hussein Osman, was killed, and French cameraman Fred Nerac is missing.

Both were seized by Iraqis and put in a pickup, witnesses said.

Ballistics experts said Lloyd was hit first with a bullet fired by an Iraqi, but he would have survived had he not been hit by a second bullet fired from a U.S. tank that pierced the side of the minibus.

Walker, the deputy coroner, said the evidence led him to believe that U.S. tanks opened fire first on the two marked TV trucks and the Iraqi vehicle that had intercepted them.

He said U.S. troops opened fire on the minibus even though "it presented no threat to American forces."

The Pentagon said its investigation looked only at the shots fired at the minibus.

"Combat operations are inherently dangerous, and we do not take lightly our responsibilities in the conduct of these operations," the Pentagon said.

"We do not, nor would we ever, deliberately target a noncombatant civilian or journalist."

U.S. Citizen Sentenced To Death In Iraq (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Federal Court Asked To Block Transfer

A U.S. citizen who allegedly orchestrated the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists near Baghdad last year was sentenced to death in an Iraqi court Thursday, prompting his lawyers to ask a federal judge in Washington to block the U.S. military from transferring him to the Iraqi government.

Mohammad Munaf, 53, has been in U.S. custody since May 23, 2005, when he was arrested during a military raid to rescue the Romanian journalists nearly two months after they were snatched. Authorities have alleged that Munaf -- who had ushered the journalists into Iraq and was acting as their guide and translator -- posed as a kidnap victim but was actually involved in a conspiracy for ransom and led them into a trap.

Military officials have said in sworn statements that Munaf confessed to elements of the crime and helped arrange the kidnapping. Munaf has been held at Camp Cropper, where the U.S. military keeps high-value detainees on behalf of Multinational Force-Iraq.

Officials said yesterday that they could not recall another U.S. citizen receiving a death sentence from the Central Criminal Court of Iraq. Munaf was born in Baghdad, received U.S. citizenship in 2000, and moved to Romania in 2001 with his wife and three children, according to court papers. Munaf's attorneys and a spokesman for the Justice Department yesterday confirmed Munaf's sentence.

Lawyers representing Munaf in the United States said that his conviction in the Iraqi court is a farce and that he was not allowed to present evidence or witnesses in his defense. In an emergency motion filed yesterday in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, Munaf's attorneys asked the U.S. government to intervene and argued that Munaf made incriminating statements only after "threats of violence and sexual assault against him and his family."

Jonathan Hafetz, a lawyer at the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University's law school, has filed a habeas corpus petition on Munaf's behalf and said U.S. authorities have failed to properly ensure that Munaf's trial in Iraq was fair. He said handing Munaf over to the Iraqi government would mean certain execution without appropriate review of his case.

"The implications are that no matter where a U.S. citizen is taken into custody, there would be no review of their detention," Hafetz said. "If the U.S. is going to hand over a citizen, it must ensure that the trial comports to fundamental fairness."

Justice Department lawyers have argued in court documents that the United States should not step in because the Iraqi government has a right to try people for crimes and that the U.S. military is merely holding Munaf on Iraq's behalf and acting as a multinational force. A Justice Department spokesman said there has been no change in that position.

Munaf's Iraqi attorneys reported that the Central Criminal Court judge was prepared to dismiss the charges at a hearing on Thursday but that two American officials -- including an unnamed general -- stepped into the courtroom and requested a private meeting. The judge returned 15 minutes later and sentenced Munaf and four other defendants to death without hearing additional evidence, according to a sworn statement by Sean Riordan, a legal intern at the Brennan Center who spoke with Munaf's attorney in Baghdad.

"In 36 years practicing law in Iraq, [the lawyer] had never before seen or heard of a death sentence being handed down without deliberation or consideration of the merits," Riordan said in the statement filed in Washington yesterday.

Romanian officials had indicated previously that they did not want to push ahead with charges, according to Munaf's attorneys. They said no Romanian representatives were present at Thursday's hearing.

"The unfairness of Mohammad's trial in Iraq is horrifying, but I am thankful an American court has the ability to protect an American citizen like him," said one of Munaf's family members, who asked not to be identified because of safety concerns. "I have hope and faith that the court will do something to end this nightmare."

Shays: Abu Ghraib Abuses Were Sex Ring (AP)

By Andrew Miga

AP, October 14, 2006

Republican Rep. Christopher Shays, who is in a tough re-election fight, said Friday the Abu Ghraib prison abuses were more about pornography than torture.

The veteran Connecticut congressman said a National Guard unit was primarily responsible for the abuses although it was actually the 372nd Military Police Company from Cresaptown, Md., an Army Reserve unit.

"It was a National Guard unit run amok," Shays said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press. "It was torture because sex abuse is torture. It was gross and despicable ... This is more about pornography than torture."

Shays sought to defuse controversy over his previous comments suggesting the Abu Ghraib abuses weren't torture but instead involved a sex ring of troops.

"Now I've seen what happened in Abu Ghraib, and Abu Ghraib was not torture," Shays said at a debate Wednesday.

"It was outrageous, outrageous involvement of National Guard troops from (Maryland) who were involved in a sex ring and they took pictures of soldiers who were naked," added Shays. "And they did other things that were just outrageous. But it wasn't torture."

The lawmaker's comments were in a transcript of the debate provided by his opponent, Diane Farrell. Shays' campaign, contacted Friday, did not dispute the comments.

Abu Ghraib is the Baghdad prison where abuse of prisoners by U.S. soldiers led to an international scandal. Iraqi detainees at Abu Ghraib were brutalized and sexually humiliated by military police and intelligence agents in the fall of 2003. At least 11 U.S. soldiers have been convicted in the scandal.

Elected in 1987, Shays has distinguished himself as a moderate Republican who often breaks with his party, especially on his signature issue of campaign finance reform. But in the last week, his comments have echoed conservative talk radio.

Shays defended House Speaker Dennis Hastert's handling of a congressional page scandal, saying no one died like at Chappaquiddick in 1969 when Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy was involved.

"I know the speaker didn't go over a bridge and leave a young person in the water, and then have a press conference the next day," the embattled Connecticut congressman told The Hartford Courant in remarks published Wednesday.

"Dennis Hastert didn't kill anybody," he added.

In the debate, the congressman had been asked what the government should do to restore the nation's moral image in the wake of torture accusations at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison and Guantanamo Bay.

Shays said Friday he wished he had more fully explained his views at the debate.

"I was maybe not as expansive as I needed to be," he said. "Of course, the degrading of anyone is torture. We need to deal with it."

Shays said his debate comments reflected the disturbing photos he has seen of Abu Ghraib abuses: "Naked Iraqis, naked Americans, Americans having sex ... gross and despicable pictures."

Shays is waging a bruising re-election fight against Farrell.

"Once again, Chris is trying to back away from an earlier statement because it's politically expedient," Farrell said Friday. "It's typical Chris."

Democratic Sen. Christopher Dodd, who appeared at a news conference with Farrell on Friday, said people are going to jail because of torture at Abu Ghraib.

"It's not because it was some pornography ring. I'm surprised anyone would make that suggestion," Dodd said. "The suggestion that somehow this was something less than that is, again, almost bordering on the bizarre."

During the campaign stop, Dodd criticized a direct-mail flier from the National Republican Congressional Committee titled, "Diane Farrell: Coffee Talk with the Taliban," that had been sent to voters in the southwestern Connecticut district.

"This is absolutely the worst kind of politics in America," Dodd said. "The people who associate themselves with that party and these things must be held accountable."

Farrell has received money and an endorsement from the Council for a Livable World, a 44-year-old Washington, D.C., organization that works to reduce nuclear weapons. In the mailer, Republicans said the Council has a "leader who wanted someone to sit down and talk with the Taliban instead of just forcibly removing them from power."

In a statement Friday, Shays said the NRCC had crossed the line with the mailing and called on the Republican organization to "put an end to sending this type of garbage."

On its Web site, the council calls the NRCC claim bogus and says board member Roger Fisher, an expert on conflict resolution who teaches at Harvard University, "recommended combining carrots and sticks to persuade the government of Afghanistan to turn over Osama bin Laden."

Recently, Senate Republican Leader Bill Frist said during a trip to Afghanistan that the Afghan war against Taliban guerrillas can never be won militarily and he favored bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the government.

In Tight Race, Republican Shays Takes A Less Measured Tone (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0081244

During his 19 years in Congress, Rep. Christopher Shays (Conn.) has been widely known as a moderate Republican who rarely engages in firebrand politics. But that image has been challenged in recent days with remarks that a supporter called "unusual" and his opponent said were a sign of "desperation."

In a debate this week with Democratic challenger Diane Farrell, Shays said the Abu Ghraib prison abuse did not constitute torture. "It was outrageous, outrageous involvement of National Guard troops from [Maryland] who were involved in a sex ring, and they took pictures of soldiers who were naked," he said. "And they did other things that were just outrageous. But it wasn't torture."

Shays also recently defended House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) for his handling of the Mark Foley page scandal, contrasting it with the 1969 Chappaquiddick bridge incident, in which a young woman drowned in a car accident involving Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). "Hastert didn't kill anybody," Shays told the Hartford Courant.

Several analysts attributed the comments to Shays's frustration with what has become the toughest reelection campaign of his career. Shays has been under attack by Farrell for his support of the Iraq war, which is unpopular with many Democrats and independents in Connecticut.

Shays has tried to distance himself from the war in recent months, endorsing a timetable for withdrawal and calling for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. But polls suggest that Shays is still in serious danger of losing his seat.

"He seems to be coming undone," said Kevin F. Rennie, a former Republican state senator and Courant columnist. "I think he's having this conversation with himself in public that would better be held in private."

Gary Rose, an expert on Connecticut politics at Sacred Heart University in Shays's district, said the congressman is responding more forcefully than ever.

"Since 1987, Congressman Shays has routinely campaigned on the premise he is a man of principle and integrity who puts principle above politics," Rose said. "He really got aggravated when not only his opponent, but the press, suggested he was changing his position on the war due to political considerations. . . . He really feels like his core -- what makes him a special type of congressman -- has been questioned."

Yesterday, Shays backed away from his comments on Abu Ghraib. He told the Associated Press that the abuse was "torture because sex abuse is torture." But he also said, "This is more about pornography than torture."

"To appear to minimize Abu Ghraib as a sex ring doesn't characterize Abu Ghraib as what it was," Farrell said in an interview. "For him not to recognize that and be sensitive to it is deeply disappointing."

The widely reported and investigated abuse at Abu Ghraib included aggressive interrogation techniques that had been approved for use at the U.S. detention center in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, such as using military working dogs to intimidate prisoners and shackling prisoners in painful positions. The photographs of sexual abuse at Abu Ghraib led to more than a dozen investigations into U.S. interrogation and detention policies.

Shays's campaign manager, Michael Sohn, said Farrell and the Democrats "have been personally attacking Chris for over three years now" and added: "They want two different standards." Farrell and Shays also squared off in the 2004 congressional campaign.

Sohn said Shays's remarks on Kennedy only reflected the fact that the senator had come to Connecticut a few days earlier for a Farrell fundraiser after she had called for Hastert to step down -- before Hastert was shown to have made serious mistakes in the handling of the page scandal.

"Chris has a reputation his entire career of just speaking the truth -- no matter how blunt it might be," Sohn said.

In his comments to the Courant, Shays said, "I know the speaker didn't go over a bridge and leave a young person in the water, and then have a press conference the next day."

One political analyst said Shays's willingness to fight back fiercely -- something he has been reluctant to do -- is a necessary response given the fact that his career is on the line.

Fernando Botero's Chubby Figures Confront the Torture at Abu Ghraib

NEW YORK

Back in 1993, on Park Avenue, there was a public exhibition of Fernando Botero's big, curvy bronze sculptures, monumental human and animal figures that sat fat and happy on the green median of one of the world's priciest streets. Botero's trademark chubbies aren't exactly beloved by the high art crowd -- at least that part of it committed to conceptual and abstract work. But they are a golden brand everywhere else in the world -- lucrative, popular, collectible. Even the name Botero is shorthand for one of his paintings or one of his trademark pudgy figures, and if someone whispers "Botero-esque" as you waddle by, you can be sure that it's time to start losing a few.

Park Avenue was the perfect place for them, a canyon of concrete where they seemed to mock (or celebrate) the porcine habits of the upper class. After New York, the Boteros went on to Fort Lauderdale, Chicago, Beverly Hills and (in 1996) Washington. But American museums haven't exactly been clamoring for first rights to his current show, which opens at the commercial Marlborough Gallery in New York on Tuesday.

Shocked and angered by news of Abu Ghraib, Botero was inspired to put his familiar figures through the rigors and humiliations of the abuse that American soldiers perpetrated on Iraqi inmates at the notorious prison. The result was some 80 paintings, drawings and watercolors that show his rounded figures with hoods on, shackled, bound at the wrists, forced into human piles, bleeding, screaming and vomiting. They are fat, but they're not happy.

It is a remarkable show, and a disturbing one. Few artists in this country have focused so obsessively on the events at Abu Ghraib, and even fewer have done it in a figurative, representational style. And no artist with a style so recognizable as Botero's has dared to infuse his cash-cow calling card with such nakedly political sentiment. You will probably never see then-Spec. Lynndie England practicing her sick sadomasochism in a Thomas Kinkade cottage or one of William Wegman's dogs trussed up for some waterboarding.

Botero, 74, a trim man with thin silver hair, says that he first learned of Abu Ghraib from Seymour Hirsch's explosive 2004 article in the New Yorker. Then came newspaper and television reports, and a barrage of photographs. He spent four or five months stewing over the outrage, and then, on an airplane returning to his home in Paris, he started sketching. About 45 of his Abu Ghraib works, which he has tried without success to exhibit in a U.S. museum, will go on display for the first time in this country at the New York gallery, one of his primary American outlets. It is a gallery more given to such artists as Dale Chihuly, the glass sculptor. Chihuly's exhibition of utterly vapid glass color blobs is moving out just as the Boteros move in (the Botero show runs through Nov. 18).

"We've never done an exhibition quite like this," says Janice Gardner Cecil, one of the Marlborough's directors. In the back of the gallery, behind the public space where hoi polloi wander, are large sliding racks of paintings for sale, and there one finds more familiar Botero material. Here, paintings such as "After Goya" (2005), which shows a blank-faced, full-figured, somewhat squat woman in an elegant dress and elaborate hat, are saturated in color, often tropical hues inspired by the artist's native Colombia.

By contrast, the Abu Ghraib paintings stick to a restricted palette. Flesh tones are sunburned or sickly green, and the backgrounds are dark military greens, ochre tiles and a black void seen through prison bars. Many of the works were done in charcoal or pencil, with a splash of rust color soaking through, to indicate blood. The rare bright spots in the paintings come from the paraphernalia of sadism: a blue latex glove worn by an American captor, strangely festive blindfolds, or bright-red women's underwear, used to demean and embarrass the men.

Look back through Botero's career, and these rare touches of color connect the Abu Ghraib art to the folk-inspired figures he has focused on for decades. A painting of a transvestite, from 2000, shows a hint of the same red brassiere seen in the Abu Ghraib works, and the lips of his torture victims are, for some reason, glossed up in cherry just like those of his female impersonator. And there's the head-scratcher: Is Botero just playing Abu Ghraib dress-up with his Botero People?

And isn't there something opportunistic, or at least insensitive, in that? Throughout the trauma of public exposure that made Abu Ghraib synonymous with American hypocrisy around the world, the government (and often newspapers) argued that it is humiliating to the victims to spread these images. Is it a further humiliation to Botero-ize them?

It isn't clear whether Botero sees his Boteros quite like we do, as slightly ridiculous figures, a particular species with all the grotesquerie but little of the visual sting of caricatures such as the decadent old men and prostitutes of George Grosz. He seems to see the world through the medium of his tubbies, and they are essentially neutral objects, which can be fit to multiple purposes, including his efforts, in this show, to document his feelings about torture.

"I didn't invent anything," he says, explaining that he painted directly from, and with fidelity to, descriptions he read in official reports about the outrages. (Botero insists that he didn't work from photographs.) "If I did, then all the rest of the paintings would lose their significance."

So he thinks of himself as a chronicler, albeit in paint, on canvas, with a glossy art sheen. This isn't the first time that his career has undergone what he calls "a parenthesis," a dark chapter devoted to disturbing political or social events. In the late 1990s, he painted a series of works inspired by the bloody drug-cartel wars of Colombia, a country he can only visit under extremely elaborate security arrangements because his fame makes him a target. Those paintings also hewed to the Botero style, including a corpulent Pablo Escobar, seen above the rooftops, a la Chagall, going down in a hail of bullets. He donated his drug-war paintings to museums in Bogota and Medellin, and he will donate the Abu Ghraib paintings as well.

"It is immoral to try to make money out of the suffering of people," he says. He hopes that an American museum will take them for its permanent collection; a European museum will also do.

These paintings leave you with the sense that two worlds have collided with very odd results. The men at Abu Ghraib may not have been skeletal, but they weren't pleasantly plump, a condition that suggests (in artistic terms) bourgeois prosperity or complacency. Indeed, being fat, in our image-conscious society, is almost the same as being guilty, and yet the guilt, at Abu Ghraib, rests squarely with the Americans -- who are never explicitly represented as such; no identifying flags or insignia appear in any of these works. The perpetrators are often faceless or are represented only by a hand or a boot coming in from the margin of the painting.

And although Botero spares no effort to show degradation -- even sodomy is explicitly represented -- he never quite gets facial anguish right. The fat on a happy Botero works to neutralize expression into something round and blank, like a baby's idiotic goo-goo face; but screaming, shrieking, crying Boteros have awkward, cartoon mouths with widely separated teeth, such as a child might draw. The strongest images are ones in which the subject has passed through anguish into resignation, which strongly suggests the visual tradition of Christian martyrdom.

Authentic primitivism, with its raw edges and volatility, has largely been banished from Botero's big, happy work, which often looks as if it's minted in a factory. In the Abu Ghraib works, however, Botero is more closely in communion with folk-art traditions. He mentions Goya, the chronicler of French atrocities in Spain, and there's a resemblance. But his Abu Ghraib series feels more like a catalogue of dark memories, a compendium of outrages captured in a long-established people's vernacular, as a hedge against obfuscation and oblivion. These illustrations form a kind of history book, not one written by the victors but one sketched and colored by the meek of the earth, hidden away until the tables are turned and the truth can come out.

"Art is a permanent accusation," he says.

Abu Ghraib, an exhibition by Fernando Botero at New York's Marlborough Gallery, 40 West 57th St.,opens Tuesday and runs through Nov. 18. The gallery is open Monday-Saturday 10 a.m.-5:30 p.m.

Afghanistan: Suicide Bomb Kills Soldier And 7 Civilians (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

A suicide bomber drove his car at a NATO military convoy in the southern city of Kandahar, killing eight people and wounding nine others, officials said. One NATO soldier was among the dead and another was wounded. The governor of Kandahar, Asadullah Khaled, said the soldiers involved were Americans serving as part of the NATO force in the south. More than 200 people have been killed in Afghanistan in suicide attacks this year.

Winds Of War (NYT)

By Jacob Heilbrunn

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

In the fall of 2002, Dick Cheney assembled some of his favorite intellectuals, including George Will, Bernard Lewis and Victor Davis Hanson, at the vice-presidential residence in Northwest Washington to discuss the coming Iraq war. Cheney focused on Hanson's book "The Soul of Battle," which profiled George Patton, William Tecumseh Sherman and the Theban general Epaminondas to argue that they may have employed ruthless tactics that led their contemporaries to condemn them, but that each was later vindicated by history. As the evening wore on, it became apparent that Cheney viewed himself as one such leader.

In "Hubris," Michael Isikoff and David Corn chronicle the Bush administration's delusional march to war. Though there has been a deluge of works denouncing the follies of the military and the administration, Isikoff and Corn cover somewhat different terrain. They offer the most comprehensive account of the White House's political machinations, aimed at convincing Congress and the public that Iraq posed a dire threat. Isikoff is an investigative correspondent for Newsweek and the author of "Uncovering Clinton," and Corn is an editor at The Nation and the author of "The Lies of George W. Bush." The authors, who have interviewed key politicians and government officials, supply a lot of new information. They show that in many ways the administration became the dupe of its own propaganda. Though their narrative spins out of control by the end, much of the book makes for fascinating reading.

As Isikoff and Corn demonstrate, the administration's first mission was to snow Congress. At every step, Cheney took the lead, convincing the four top leaders of Congress — Dennis Hastert, Richard Gephardt, Trent Lott and Tom Daschle — that war was unavoidable. Together with George Tenet, the director of central intelligence, Cheney and the lawmakers gathered in the House Intelligence Committee briefing room, where they examined photos of what looked like new construction at what Cheney declared were Iraqi nuclear weapons sites. “When the Congressional leaders departed that briefing,” Isikoff and Corn write, “they looked grim.”

Cheney also tackled the job of persuading a skeptical House majority leader, Dick Armey. “Trust me on this, Dick,” Cheney told him. “When I get done with this briefing, you’re going to be with me.” Armey was perplexed: “He didn’t say, ‘You’re going to be with us.’ He didn’t say, ‘You’re going to be with the president.’ He said, ‘You’re going to be with me.” After Cheney showed him a bunch of pictures of putative W.M.D. sites in Iraq, Armey opted to give him the benefit of the doubt, even though he didn’t find the briefing very persuasive.

To buttress the administration’s case, Cheney not only visited the C.I.A. to pound away at agency analysts for failing to come up with links between Al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein, but also drew on a secret intelligence unit — if the term is not too grandiose — that was overseen by Douglas Feith, then under secretary of defense. Feith’s researchers, David Wurmser and Michael Maloof, who were both protégés of the prominent neoconservative Richard Perle, spent months combing through raw intelligence reports to discover the truths that had somehow eluded the entire intelligence community. In a small windowless office at the Pentagon, they created “giant wall charts” detailing the intimate links between Iraq and Al Qaeda.

Paul Wolfowitz, the deputy defense secretary at the time, was bowled over: he “was especially taken with the spaghetti lines that Maloof had drawn between the Abu Nidal terrorist organization in Iraq and training camps in Lebanon.” From Lebanon, the lines then went to Al Qaeda in Afghanistan. Isikoff and Corn report that these analyses, such as they were, made a big splash at the White House. If anyone complained that solid evidence was lacking, Feith’s team was unmoved: “The Feith analysts were essentially claiming that because Al Qaeda and Iraq had joined together in a clandestine partnership to attack the United States, there would be little, if any, evidence to prove the conspiracy.”

Where Isikoff and Corn themselves go astray is in their own obsessive focus on Judith Miller and The New York Times, as well as on the story of Joseph Wilson, Valerie Plame Wilson and Cheney’s former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby, who is under indictment for obstruction of justice and perjury. The attention they lavish on both the Miller and the Plame cases is out of all proportion to their true significance. These chapters reach a level of detail that is simply eye-glazing. To read Isikoff and Corn, one would think that Miller (whose conduct was bad enough) and The Times were almost uniquely responsible for abetting the administration’s march to war.

Far more interesting is Isikoff and Corn’s exploration of the mental world that the administration inhabits. They recount that in December 2001, Scooter Libby read aloud to a visiting journalist a famous passage from Winston Churchill’s memoirs about being named prime minister: “I felt as if I were walking with destiny, and that all my past life had been but a preparation for this hour and for this trial.” Libby declared that these words could be applied to Cheney after Sept. 11. Hubris? Megalomania may be more like it.

Pseudo-histories Of The Iraq War (WT)

By Victor Davis Hanson

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

Three recent books about the "fiasco" in Iraq -- "Cobra II" by Michael Gordon and Bernard Trainor, "State of Denial" by Bob Woodward and just plain "Fiasco" by Tom Ricks -- have attracted a lot of attention, and sales. All three well-written exposes repeat the now well-known argument that our government's incompetence and arrogance have nearly ensured U.S. failure in birthing democracy in Iraq.

It's worth noting, though, that many of the authors' critical portraits rely on private conversations and anonymous sources. The most damning informants in these books are never identified, and so can't be questioned.

The authors, as journalists, are well aware that after the New York Times' problems with Jayson Blair and other high-profile media scandals, the public no longer necessarily accepts as gospel what reporters write. That perhaps explains their and others' apparent adaptation of scholarly methods. Often these days journalists mimic the footnoting of historians -- giving the impression their reporting is history documented by verifiable primary and secondary sources also available to the reader.

Indeed, the verifiability of source material is what distinguishes history from hearsay -- and what distinguishes the genre from journalism or first-person recollections. Since the time of the historian Thucydides -- who not only recorded what speakers said, but, more controversially, made them voice what he thought they might or ought to have said -- historians have developed protocols to ensure credibility. Whether or not historians use footnotes or citations, they at least now agree to draw on information that can be checked by others, who will determine how skillfully, honestly or completely such sources were employed.

But by too often using only the veneer of the historical method, the authors of these three books give their work a patina of scholarly credibility that can confuse the reader. In "Cobra II," for example, some citations at the end of the book state that information came from a "former senior military officer," "former Centcom planner" or "U.S. State Department official."

In "Fiasco," often verbatim quotations are not cited with specific attribution, but only vaguely noted in the text as "said a Bush administration official" or "recalled one officer." Among the end notes in "State of Denial," we are apprised, "The information in this chapter comes primarily from background interviews with seven knowledgeable sources."

But who are these "seven knowledgeable sources"? Since Mr. Woodward so far won't name them, how do we really know they are "knowledgeable" or even "primarily" used? Is the answer they talked to Mr. Woodward (and not to others?), or were pre-selected because they happened to agree with his own views?

In "Cobra II," we wonder why one "former Centcom planner" would talk while others (more numerous?) choose not to. And in "Fiasco," is the talkative but unnamed "Bush administration official" getting even at his rivals by offering only his interpretation of shared past conversations?

There are a number of other things wrong with all this gossip.

First, note the disturbing pattern in this resorting to anonymity. Usually the unidentified source supports the author's critique -- and thus is almost always critical of the present policy in Iraq. Rarely do these journalists quote unnamed sources who dissent from their own views, although there are surely pro-U.S. Iraq policy candid voices among the thousands of retired generals.

Second, here is the cardinal rule for anonymous sources in this new genre of pseudo-history: Talk to reporters as soon as possible "off the record" in hopes they will be sympathetic. If you keep quiet, some of your loudmouth enemies might unload on you from the safety of anonymity, ensuring their narrative, not yours, will become authoritative.

Third, we are not reading accounts of golf or fashion but the most important event since the end of the Cold War as it unfolds. When one writes military history in the middle of a war, there is a responsibility to be extra careful. Real-time interpretations don't just offer lessons about the past but may change the very course of events as they happen.

These past couple of weeks, current and former officials have been protesting that they were unfairly characterized in Mr. Woodward's book -- and have argued conditions in Iraq are not as bad as claimed by anonymous sources. And while there have been on-the-record critics of all three books, none of the unnamed accusers cited in them has come forward.

These virtual histories all allege a "state of denial" and lack of accountability on the part of government officials. Perhaps -- but how odd then that the authors of "Cobra II," "Fiasco" and "State of Denial" have used the very secrecy and subterfuge they claim to deplore in their targets.

CRIMINAL LAW:

GOP's Ney Pleads Guilty (WT/AP)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

Rep. Bob Ney pleaded guilty yesterday in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling investigation, the first lawmaker to confess to crimes in an election-year scandal that has stained the Republican-controlled Congress.

Republican leaders said Ney will be expelled from the House if he doesn't quit by the time they return to Washington after the Nov. 7 elections.

Appearing before Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle on charges of conspiracy and making false statements, Ney acknowledged taking trips, tickets, meals and campaign donations from Abramoff in return for official actions on behalf of his clients.

Ney, Ohio Republican, faces up to 10 years in prison. The Justice Department recommended 27 months behind bars. Ney's lawyers plan to recommend him for a Bureau of Prisons alcohol-treatment program, which dramatically could cut the time he serves behind bars.

Judge Huvelle set sentencing for Jan. 19.

Although Ney's lawyer and the congressman promised he would resign in the next few weeks, it was not soon enough for House Republican leaders who are on the defensive because of fresh scandals in the final weeks before the midterm elections.

Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, called for Ney to resign, as did White House press secretary Tony Snow, who said Ney's criminal activity "is not a reflection of the Republican Party."

House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, said he will introduce a resolution to kick Ney out of the House as soon as Congress returns to Washington.

The House ethics committee is investigating Mr. Hastert and other Republican House leaders, along with their top aides, for their handling of former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually charged messages to teenagers who served as House pages.

DOJ_NMG_0081249

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, faulted Mr. Hastert and the Republican leadership for letting Ney remain on the public payroll since he signed papers in September agreeing to plead guilty. Mrs. Pelosi said House leaders "have a long pattern of protecting Republican members."

In Ney's home state, Ohio Republican Party Chairman Bob Bennett called Ney "a cancer in the Congress."

Political corruption has hurt Republicans more than Democrats, recent AP-Ipsos polling showed. Democrats have the advantage over Republicans on the question of who would do a better job of handling corruption, 40 percent to 25 percent.

Ney is the latest in a string of once-influential men convicted in a scandal that so far has caught several lobbyists and two members of the Bush administration.

·Abramoff, the Republican superlobbyist, admitted guilt in January. Two former aides to Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, the former House majority leader, have also pleaded guilty, as has Ney's former chief of staff.

·Former White House official David Safavian, who was the Bush administration's top procurement official, was convicted of covering up his dealings with Abramoff. He is scheduled for sentencing on Oct. 27.

·Roger Stillwell, a former Interior Department official, pleaded guilty in August to a misdemeanor charge for not reporting that Abramoff had given him tickets to football games and concerts.

Ney confessed his criminal acts during a half-hour session at a federal courthouse a few blocks from the Capitol, where until recently he wielded a gavel as chairman of the House Administration Committee.

Responding to each of Judge Huvelle's 25 questions, Ney agreed that he had conspired to deprive the government of his "honest services," a fraud-related charge often used in public corruption cases.

Ney also acknowledged making false statements on his financial disclosure forms by concealing that Abramoff and a foreign businessman were the true source of gifts Ney received.

The gifts ranged from a trip to Scotland bankrolled by Abramoff's clients to thousands of dollars in gambling chips Ney got on two overseas junkets from foreign businessman Fouad al-Zayat, a Syrian-born aviation company owner in Cyprus.

"I allowed myself to get too comfortable with the way things have been done in Washington, D.C., for too long," Ney said in a written statement after his court appearance.

Ney said, "I never acted to enrich myself or to get things I shouldn't." Details of conspiracy suggested otherwise.

The congressman admitted he gave $5,000 from one gambling trip to a staff member to carry across the border so Ney could report a lower dollar amount to customs officials.

Ney agreed to push legislation helpful to Abramoff clients including Indian tribes and a foreign beverage distiller. Ney agreed to help al-Zayat get a visa to enter the United States and a legislative exemption to laws barring the sale of U.S.-made airplanes and parts to a foreign country.

Regarding Abramoff, Ney acknowledged accepting all-expenses-paid and reduced-price trips to play golf in Scotland in August 2002, to gamble and vacation in New Orleans in May 2003 and to vacation in New York in August 2003. The total cost of all the trips -- in which others, including some aides, participated -- exceeded $170,000, prosecutors said. The congressman also admitted accepting meals and sports and concert tickets for himself and his staff.

Ohio Republican Pleads Guilty In Bribery Case (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

The Ohio congressman will be out of office by his January sentencing. He may get at least two years in jail for dealings with Jack Abramoff.

WASHINGTON — Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) pleaded guilty Friday to bribery charges stemming from the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling investigation, becoming the first sitting congressman to confess to taking bribes in the scandal that continues to reverberate through the Republican-controlled Congress.

"I accept responsibility for my actions, and I am prepared to face the consequences of what I have done," Ney said in a statement distributed to reporters outside a federal courthouse.

Before Judge Ellen S. Huvelle, Ney pleaded guilty to conspiracy and making false statements. A month ago, in a plea agreement with prosecutors, Ney admitted that he accepted tens of thousands of dollars in illegal gifts and other largesse that included nights of casino gambling in London and a lavish golf junket to Scotland.

In return, Ney acknowledged, he used his legislative clout to do favors for Abramoff and for a Syrian businessman nicknamed the "Fat Man."

Sentencing is set for Jan. 19, by which time Ney, who is not seeking reelection, would no longer be serving in Congress. Some on Capitol Hill speculated that Ney, who has mounting legal bills, might try to stay in office a few more weeks to maintain a salary. Members of Congress earn at least $165,000 a year.

Ney's lawyer told the judge that the congressman would resign his seat in the next few weeks.

But House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), already feeling political heat over the page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley of Florida, could be pressured to push Ney from his committee seats when Congress reconvenes for a special session after the Nov. 7 election.

And House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) announced that he would introduce a resolution expelling Ney from the House as soon as Congress returns.

"Bob Ney has brought shame to himself and disgraced the Congress by betraying the bond entrusted to him as a public official," Sensenbrenner said. "No one — Democrat or Republican — should remain a member of the people's House after being convicted of criminal conduct while in office."

At the White House on Friday, Press Secretary Tony Snow signaled the distance the GOP will try to put between themselves and Ney in the run-up to the midterm election, where several major polls indicate voters are leaning Democratic.

"He ought to resign," Snow said. "What Congressman Ney did is not a reflection of the Republican Party, it's a reflection of Congressman Ney."

The 52-year-old Ney — a six-term Republican — could face a maximum prison term of 10 years, but Huvelle said prosectors were recommending 27 months. She said federal guidelines suggest he should be fined $5,000 to $60,000.

Ney left the courtroom Friday without speaking to reporters. On reaching a plea agreement last month, he said that alcohol abuse had contributed to a downward spiral in his life, and that he had checked himself into a rehab facility for treatment.

"A dependence on alcohol has been a problem for me," he said then. "I am not making any excuses, and I take full responsibility for my actions."

Until the Abramoff scandal, Ney was best known nationally for renaming the French fries in the House cafeteria "freedom fries" after France refused to support the U.S.-led war in Iraq. "This action today is a small, but symbolic effort to show the strong displeasure of many on Capitol Hill with the actions of our so-called ally, France," he said in March 2003.

After Ney announced he would not seek reelection, Republicans in Ohio's 18th district held a special primary in September, nominating state Sen. Joy Padgett.

She faces Democrat Zack Space in a district that was once represented by Wayne Hays, the chairman of the House Administration Committee who resigned in 1976 after a much-publicized sex scandal involving his secretary Elizabeth Ray, who admitted, "I can't type. I can't file. I can't even answer the phone."

Ney Falls Victim To Abramoff Scandal (FT)

The scandal over Jack Abramoff, the crooked superlobbyist, claimed its first congressional victim on Friday when Bob Ney, a six-term Ohio congressman, formally pleaded guilty to criminal corruption charges that could see him face a jail sentence of up to 10 years.

After listening to a nine-minute litany of charges against him, including accepting thousands of dollars' worth of gifts, such as a $160,000 Scottish golfing trip with two of his aides, from the lobbyist, Mr Ney admitted that he had become "too comfortable with the way things have been done in Washington DC for too long" but blamed Mr Abramoff for using his name "to advance his own secret schemes of fraud and theft in ways I could have never imagined".

At the trial Mr Ney, who sought a plea bargain with prosecutors to limit his sentence to 27 months, said he would step down before he sentencing on January 19. However, the Republican leadership, including Dennis Hastert, the House speaker, scarred by criticism of their mishandling of the Mark Foley sex scandal, threatened to expel him on Friday when they return to Washington, saying there was "no place for him in Congress".

That threat was in contrast to decisions made just three weeks ago when Mr Ney first pleaded guilty to the charges. At that time, the Republican leadership – again, including Mr Hastert – made no calls for their colleague's resignation.

John Boehner, the House majority leader, said Mr Ney had made "big mistakes" but that it was up to him to decide to resign.

The White House echoed the new statement. Amid charges from Democrats that the Republicans were imbued with a "culture of corruption", Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, sought to deflect blame from the party to individuals.

"What congressman Ney did is not a reflection of the Republican party. It's a reflection of congressman Ney. And he ought to step down. We saw that with Duke Cunningham [a former Republican congressman who resigned last year in his own bribery scandal]. He took money; he stepped down. He should have."

The fallout from Mr Abramoff's largesse has continued to haunt Washington. Last week Susan Ralston, a White House aide to Karl Rove, the president's political adviser, abruptly re-sig-ned amid reports of her accepting gifts from Mr Arbamoff. On Thursday, the Democratic staff of the Senate finance committee charged several conservative not-for-profit groups with abusing their tax-exempt status by "laundering payments and then disbursing funds at Mr Abramoff's direction".

Congressman Pleads Guilty But Won't Resign For Now (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 13 — Representative Bob Ney, the first member of Congress to confess to crimes in dealings with the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, pleaded guilty to corruption charges Friday but said he would not immediately resign.

Mr. Ney, Republican of Ohio, announced last month that he intended to plead guilty, admitting that in return for official acts, he had accepted tens of thousands of dollars' worth of gifts from Mr. Abramoff that included lavish trips, meals and tickets to concerts and sporting events. He faces a prison term of more than two years.

But what had not been expected at Friday's court hearing was Mr. Ney's disclosure that he intended to remain in Congress for now. The announcement appeared to surprise and infuriate House Republican leaders, who are trying to tamp down other scandals that are threatening to damage the party in next month's Congressional elections.

After learning that Mr. Ney would not step down immediately and would continue to draw his $165,200-a-year salary, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and other Republican leaders said they would move to expel him as soon as Congress returns next month for a postelection session.

"Bob Ney must be punished for the criminal actions he has acknowledged," they said in a statement. "He betrayed his oath of office and violated the trust of those he represented in the House. There is no place for him in this Congress."

The White House joined in calling for Mr. Ney to resign immediately. "What Congressman Ney did is not a reflection of the Republican Party," said Tony Snow, the White House spokesman. "It's a reflection of Congressman Ney, and he ought to step down."

Mark H. Tuohey, a lawyer for Mr. Ney, said during the hearing, at the Federal District Court in Washington, that the congressman would resign "in the next few weeks" but wanted to remain for now "to make sure his staff is taken care of" and to deal with constituent issues.

Congressional rules do not require the immediate departure of a member convicted of a crime. So unless his House colleagues act to expel him, Mr. Ney, who announced in August that he would not seek re-election, could choose to serve until his term ends in early January.

Mr. Ney, 52, appeared contrite but calm in his court appearance. Asked by Judge Ellen S. Huvelle for his plea to charges of criminal conspiracy and making false statements, he replied, "I plead guilty, Your Honor."

He said in a statement issued after the hearing that "I accept responsibility for my actions and am prepared to face the consequences of what I have done."

In announcing last month that he had reached a plea bargain with prosecutors, Mr. Ney said he was an alcoholic and was seeking treatment at an outpatient medical center. Asked by Judge Huvelle on Friday whether he was currently under any medical treatment, he replied, "Right now, alcohol, last 30 days."

The congressman is to be sentenced on Jan. 19. Under the plea agreement he could face 10 years' imprisonment, but prosecutors have said they will ask Judge Huvelle to limit the sentence to 27 months, and she is expected to agree. His lawyers said Friday that they would ask that he be placed in a prison with an alcoholism treatment program.

Mr. Abramoff, a former Republican fund-raiser who pleaded guilty in January to charges of conspiring to corrupt public officials, including Mr. Ney, is to begin a prison sentence of nearly six years next month.

In two weeks, David H. Safavian, a former Bush administration official, is to go before a federal judge here to receive a prison sentence for his conviction on charges of lying about his relationship to Mr. Abramoff, including the circumstances of a 2002 golfing trip to Scotland that was arranged by Mr. Abramoff for Mr. Ney, Mr. Safavian and others.

Lawmaker's Conviction Is 8th in Abramoff Probe

Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) pleaded guilty yesterday to corruption charges arising from the influence-peddling investigation of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, becoming the first elected official to fall in a scandal that may damage his party's chances in next month's elections.

Ney, 52, emerged from a month of alcoholism treatment to appear in federal court in Washington, where he admitted performing official acts for lobbyists in exchange for campaign contributions, expensive meals, luxury travel and skybox sports tickets. Ney also admitted taking thousands of dollars in gambling chips from an international businessman who sought his help with the State Department.

House Republican leaders, still struggling to blunt the impact of a scandal involving House pages, immediately vowed to expel Ney in a post-election session if he has not resigned by then. Ney's attorney said in court that the congressman will resign his seat in the coming weeks but wants to first take care of pending constituent matters and see that his staff is settled.

Ney, a six-term House member from a conservative district in eastern Ohio, appeared before Judge Ellen S. Huvelle and calmly acknowledged his guilt as Huvelle read a long list of favors Ney and Abramoff had done for each other. "That's accurate, Your Honor," Ney repeated again and again.

Ney made no statement to the court, but afterward he issued a written statement saying he was "ashamed" that his long career in public service has ended this way.

"I never acted to enrich myself or get things I shouldn't, but over time, I allowed myself to get too comfortable with the way things have been done in Washington D.C. for too long," Ney said. "I accepted things I shouldn't have with the result that Jack Abramoff used my name to advance his own secret schemes of fraud and theft in way I could never have imagined."

Ney is the eighth person convicted in the continuing federal investigation into Abramoff's activities. A federal task force that includes a dozen Justice Department prosecutors is investigating Abramoff's dealings with other congressional offices, including those of Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.), according to lawyers and witnesses involved in the probe.

Last month, Ney agreed to plead guilty to one count each of conspiracy and making false statements. His formal plea was delayed while he was in rehab. Yesterday, Ney was accompanied by a young staffer and a friend, Ellen Rattner, who told reporters that he did not want to drag his wife and children into court. "He's very happy he is sober," added Rattner.

Huvelle set sentencing for Jan. 19. The government has recommended that Ney be given 27 months in prison.

But Republican and Democratic leaders said they are prepared to move against him in November when the House returns from its recess. "Bob Ney must be punished for the criminal actions he has acknowledged," said a joint statement by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and Republican Conference Chairman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio). "He betrayed his oath of office and violated the trust of those he represented in the House. There is no place for him in this Congress. If he chooses not to resign his office, we will move to expel him immediately as our first order of business when Congress resumes its legislative work in November."

Ney announced in August that he would not seek reelection and resigned as chairman of the House Administration Committee; the head of that panel is known as the mayor of Capitol Hill.

The Ohio Republican had been a target of the investigation for a year and came under increasing pressure -- first in January with Abramoff's guilty plea and agreement to cooperate in the investigation, then with the guilty plea in May of his former aide Neil G. Volz, who admitted conspiring to corruptly influence the congressman and others. Ney admitted encouraging Volz to violate the one-year ban on lobbying by former staffers.

Ney accepted a stream of valuable things from Abramoff and the lobbyists he hired from Capitol Hill, among them Volz. The gifts included luxury vacations that prosecutors valued at more than $170,000. Ney, for his part, sought to insert four amendments into a 2002 election overhaul bill to benefit Abramoff's clients. He also admitted helping another client win a multimillion-dollar contract to provide wireless communication services to the U.S. Capitol.

The congressman admitted that he twice inserted comments in the Congressional Record aimed at bolstering a bid by Abramoff to buy a casino cruise line in Florida in 2000.

Abramoff is scheduled to report to prison next month for his conviction on bank-fraud charges in the Florida case. His partner in that deal, Adam Kidan, is slated to report soon to a minimum-security prison camp at Fort Dix, N.J.

As of August, Ney had spent $296,000 in campaign funds to pay for legal expenses this year, according to newly filed campaign reports.

By age 62, Ney could be eligible for a pension worth about 20 percent of the $165,100 congressional salary, or about $33,000 a year.

Earlier this year, Ney's committee passed ethics legislation to strip convicted lawmakers of their pensions, but the bill died in the House. Ney championed the provision, saying it was designed to hold "members of Congress and those they work with to the highest standards in order to ensure that those who abuse the public trust will be dealt with accordingly."

No Early Foley Complaints, Head Of Pages Says (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 13 — Representative John Shimkus, who has been chairman of the Congressional page program since 2001, said Friday that he was unaware of previous complaints about Mark Foley.

Mr. Shimkus, Republican of Illinois, said that had he known of the complaints about Mr. Foley, he would have handled concerns about Mr. Foley's e-mail messages to a page from Louisiana differently.

"There is stuff that everybody would have done differently," Mr. Shimkus said after testifying under oath for more than three hours before the House ethics committee. "Having 20/20 hindsight, a lot of things would have been different."

Mr. Shimkus said that he learned of concerns about Mr. Foley last fall and that he and the clerk of the House confronted Mr. Foley at a meeting in Mr. Foley's office.

Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned last month after a separate series of sexually explicit messages became known.

The ethics committee, which held a closed session, is investigating whether Republican leaders, particularly those inside Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office, had warnings before last year that Mr. Foley had a history of being overly friendly to pages.

A longtime adviser to Mr. Foley has testified that he asked Mr. Hastert's office to intervene at least three years ago, an account that the speaker's aides have denied.

As Mr. Shimkus left the hearing room in the Capitol basement on Friday afternoon, he declined to give details of his testimony, which was given to a bipartisan panel of four representatives and a team of investigators.

But speaking to reporters, Mr. Shimkus said, "The first time I had any indication that I needed to address Congressman Foley" was after being alerted to the e-mail exchange with the former page from Louisiana.

When asked whether Republican leaders had told him to exclude other members of the page board — a Republican, a Democrat and the House sergeant-at-arms — when ultimately confronting Mr. Foley last year, Mr. Shimkus replied, "I made the decision."

He did not elaborate.

It is the meeting in Mr. Foley's office late last fall, which Mr. Shimkus said ran no more than 45 minutes, that is of particular interest to the ethics committee. Mr. Shimkus said after the hearing on Friday that he and the clerk of the House, Jeff Trandhal, showed excerpts of the e-mail messages to Mr. Foley, who in Mr. Shimkus's account recoiled and promised to stop contact with the Louisiana teenager.

After the meeting, Mr. Shimkus said, he thought that Mr. Foley did keep his distance.

"I had no reason to believe there wasn't changed behavior," Mr. Shimkus said. "We would always do an end-of-the-year 'bye-bye' to the pages on the House floor, but Congressman Foley did not show this year. Historically, he always did.

"But this year, he wasn't there. So we thought the intervention may have been successful."

It was sexually explicit messages from years earlier, however, that led Mr. Foley to resign after ABC News acquired them. Those exchanges were a maddening disclosure, Mr. Shimkus said, and they have piqued his curiosity about whether anyone was familiar with previous reports of Mr. Foley's behavior.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

An Illinois lawmaker who as an overseer of House pages acted to stop former Rep. Mark Foley from e-mailing a Louisiana page in late 2005 testified for more than three hours yesterday before House investigators.

Rep. John Shimkus, who testified in private, told reporters later that in retrospect, he wished he had handled the episode last year differently.

"Having 20/20 hindsight, a lot of things would have been done differently," Mr. Shimkus said.

Mr. Shimkus has said he kept the two other House members overseeing the pages in the dark as he confronted Mr. Foley last fall. Mr. Shimkus, chairman of the House Page Board, has said he was following the wishes of the boy's parents by not telling the other two lawmakers of overly friendly e-mails sent by Mr. Foley to a former page.

A four-member ethics investigating panel, operating in closed session, is hearing key witnesses with knowledge of how Republicans handled several alarms raised about Mr. Foley's conduct over the past five years. The Florida Republican resigned Sept. 29 after he was confronted with sexually explicit instant messages sent to other former male pages -- not the episode that Mr. Shimkus testified about.

Mr. Shimkus said he testified to assist the investigators in finding out "who knew what, when and where."

Meanwhile in Arizona, a law-enforcement official said federal prosecutors have opened a preliminary investigation into a camping trip that an Arizona lawmaker took with two former pages and others in 1996.

Rep. Jim Kolbe, Arizona Republican, took the former pages as well as staff members and National Park Service officials on a Fourth of July rafting trip in the Grand Canyon in 1996, his spokeswoman, Korenna Cline, said yesterday.

An accusation related to the trip was given to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Phoenix, but it was not immediately clear whether it was related to any contention of improper activity by Mr. Kolbe.

The official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, described the inquiry as preliminary. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department declined comment.

Miss Cline said the rafting party included five current staffers, two former pages and Mr. Kolbe's sister. Nothing inappropriate happened on the trip, she said. She did not know who the pages were or what year they worked for Mr. Kolbe, but she said they paid their own way.

At the time of the trip, Mr. Kolbe, the only openly homosexual Republican in Congress, served on a subcommittee that oversaw the national park system. He visited the park to look at National Park Service operations and fire reconnaissance.

Mr. Kolbe, 64, was pulled into the unfolding scandal involving Mr. Foley when he said this week that a former page had complained in 2001 or 2002 about e-mails the page had received from Mr. Foley that made him feel uncomfortable. Mr. Kolbe said he referred the matter to the House clerk and that someone from Mr. Kolbe's office confronted Mr. Foley.

Police Find No Report Of A Foley Dorm Incident (WP)

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Witness in Scandal Alleged Then-Congressman Was Detained Outside Pages' Capitol Hill Residence

U.S. Capitol Police said yesterday that they have no record of an alleged incident in which then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) supposedly tried to enter a Capitol Hill dormitory for teenage pages.

The purported nighttime incident has been cited by lawmakers and a key witness in the scandal that involves Foley's interactions with congressional pages and the House's handling of the matter. Unlike sexually graphic electronic messages that Foley sent to teenage boys, evidence of the alleged dorm incident has proved elusive.

Yesterday, acting Capitol Police Chief Christopher M. McGaffin said his staff conducted electronic and hand searches of files covering several years but found no record of the alleged incident in which a drunken Foley supposedly was detained outside the pages' dorm in 2003 or earlier.

"I can't find anything that was written, in the way of a report, that would establish that that did occur," McGaffin said in a telephone interview. "Having said that, I don't know, maybe it occurred and there wasn't a report generated."

McGaffin said the search was complicated by the fact that he has received no details on when the alleged incident occurred and exactly what happened. "If, obviously, a crime was committed, a report would have been generated," he said.

In a separate interview this week, Terrance W. Gainer -- who was Capitol Police chief from June 2002 to April of this year -- said he recalled no mention of such an incident during his tenure.

The absence of a police report adds uncertainty to investigations by the FBI and the House ethics committee into furtive behavior that led to Foley's abrupt resignation two weeks ago. A central question for the bipartisan ethics committee is whether House GOP leaders and others had early warnings of Foley's objectionable behavior that should have prompted inquiries among current and former pages. House leaders might cite the lack of a police report as an indication that the dorm incident never happened or that it was kept so quiet that they had no way of knowing about it.

Meanwhile yesterday, the chairman of the small group that oversees the House page program testified for more than three hours before the four-member ethics subcommittee conducting the inquiry. Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), head of the Page Board, later told reporters that he "answered their questions honestly and forthrightly."

In hindsight, he said, "a lot of things would have been done different." But by dealing with Foley quietly in late 2005, Shimkus said, he honored the wishes of the parents of a Louisiana boy whose e-mail exchanges with Foley triggered the eventual exposure of far more sexually explicit messages with other youths.

Shimkus, a longtime ally of Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), said it was his decision to have only one other member of the Page Board -- then-Clerk Jeff Trandahl -- join him in confronting Foley last November about the Louisiana e-mails. Two other board members -- Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.) and Rep. Dale E. Kildee (D-Mich.) -- have said they should have been alerted and allowed to help decide how to deal with Foley.

Shimkus has said that Foley deceived him and Trandahl by assuring them that his actions were innocent. They ended the November meeting by instructing Foley to cease contact with the Louisiana boy, which he apparently did. Critics say Republicans' eagerness to keep the Foley allegations quiet prevented them from launching inquiries that might have uncovered the lawmaker's more sexually explicit communications with former pages in other states.

In his e-mails to the Louisiana boy, Foley had asked for a photograph and asked what the boy wanted for his birthday. The youth and his parents found the requests troubling, but Shimkus has said he lacked enough information to take strong action against Foley. Trandahl has not spoken with reporters or the ethics committee.

Word of the Louisiana e-mails, Shimkus told reporters yesterday, "was the first time that I had any indication that I needed to address Congressman Foley."

Sources familiar with the investigation say that former Foley chief of staff Kirk Fordham, who met with the House ethics panel Thursday, told members that he believes the alleged page dormitory incident took place, and that it was a sign that Foley was showing unseemly interest in teenage pages. Fordham has said he asked Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, to intervene with Foley, and that Palmer reported he did so. Palmer has denied Fordham's account.

In an Oct. 3 letter to House Clerk Karen L. Haas, Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) said a fellow GOP lawmaker had cited "rumors that there was an incident within the last several years when then-Congressman Foley in an intoxicated state was stopped by the Capitol Police from entering the Page Residence Hall."

Hastert says he knew of no concerns about Foley's behavior toward pages until the day the lawmaker resigned, Sept. 29. Hastert's office has acknowledged that three of the speaker's aides knew of the Louisiana e-mails but that they dealt with the matter by consulting with Trandahl and without telling Hastert or Palmer.

Hastert has said his staff handled the matter appropriately.

Kolbe Camping Trip Being Investigated (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Talhelm

AP, October 14, 2006

Federal prosecutors in Arizona have opened a preliminary investigation into a camping trip that an Arizona lawmaker took with two former pages and others in 1996, according to a law enforcement official.

Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., took the former pages as well as staff members and National Park Service officials on a Fourth of July rafting trip in the Grand Canyon in 1996, his spokeswoman Korenna Cline said Friday.

An allegation related to the trip was given to the U.S. attorney's office in Phoenix, but it was not immediately clear whether it concerned any contention of improper activity by Kolbe.

The official described the inquiry as preliminary and far narrower in scope than the federal investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., who resigned two weeks ago amid reports about sexually explicit e-mails he sent to pages.

A second law enforcement official said the 1996 trip may be too old to investigate as a criminal action. Both officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. A Justice Department spokeswoman declined comment.

Cline said the rafting party included five current staffers, two former pages and Kolbe's sister. Nothing inappropriate happened on the trip, she said. She did not know who the pages were or what year they worked for Kolbe, but she said they paid their own way.

Beth Kolbe, the congressman's younger sister who was on the three-night trip, said nothing inappropriate happened and that she had not heard of any concerns from anyone until the story of the camping trip appeared in the media.

"It's preposterous," she said of any allegations that taking the pages along was inappropriate.

She said the group included the then-deputy park superintendent and two rangers, who served as guides and interpreters. She said it was too hot to sleep in tents, so everyone slept out in the open by the water.

At the time of the trip, Rep. Kolbe served on a subcommittee that oversaw the national park system. He visited the park to look at National Park Service operations and fire reconnaissance.

Kolbe, 64, is the only openly gay Republican in Congress.

He was pulled into the unfolding Foley scandal when he said this week that a former page had complained in 2001 or 2002 about e-mails the page had received from Foley that made him feel uncomfortable. Kolbe said he referred the matter to the House clerk and that someone from Kolbe's office confronted Foley himself.

Kolbe, who is retiring this year after 22 years in the House, was a page from 1958 to 1960 for Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater.

He served on the board that oversees the page program between 1995 and February 2001. He frequently offers his home to former pages, interns, constituents and colleagues visiting Washington.

He is traveling in Europe and has declined interviews. Cline said he had not hired a lawyer in the matter.

Ex-Pages' Trip With Rep. Kolbe Examined (WP)

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

The U.S. attorney's office in Phoenix has opened a preliminary investigation of a 1996 camping trip that included Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) and two 17-year-old boys who had participated in the congressional page program, law enforcement officials said yesterday.

One official cautioned that the inquiry was based on allegations from one unidentified source that has not been substantiated. The allegations involve Kolbe's behavior toward one of the ex-pages, the official said.

The three-day trip down the Grand Canyon also included several Kolbe staffers and National Park Service employees, according to NBC News, which first reported the investigation. Kolbe's office said in a statement to NBC that "there is absolutely no basis and no truth" to any allegations of inappropriate behavior, and that the trip included five Kolbe aides, two former pages and Kolbe's sister.

Kolbe is one of several lawmakers who have become enmeshed in the scandal over former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

Kolbe said this week that a former page alerted his office several years ago about e-mails from Foley "that made him uncomfortable," and that the complaint was taken to Foley's office and the House clerk. Kolbe, a former member of the House Page Board, said he did not see the messages but was told they were sexually explicit.

Kolbe is the only openly gay Republican member of Congress. He is not seeking reelection next month.

FBI Investigates Rep. Curt Weldon (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Justice Department is investigating whether Republican Rep. Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania traded his political influence for lucrative lobbying and consulting contracts for his daughter, according to sources with direct knowledge of the inquiry.

The FBI, which opened an investigation in recent months, has formally referred the matter to the department's Public Integrity Section for additional scrutiny. At issue are Weldon's efforts between 2002 and 2004 to aid two Russian companies and two Serbian brothers with ties to strongman Slobodan Milosevic, a federal law enforcement official said.

The Russian companies and a Serbian foundation run by the brothers' family each hired a firm co-owned by Weldon's daughter, Karen, for fees totaling nearly $1 million a year, public records show.

Karen Weldon was 28 and lacked consulting experience when she and Charles Sexton, a Weldon ally and longtime Republican leader in Delaware County, Pa., created the firm of Solutions North America Inc. in 2002. Both are registered with the Justice Department as representatives of foreign clients.

Word of the inquiry, which has been closely held within the Justice Department and the FBI, comes from two individuals with specific knowledge of the existence of the investigation. They both declined to be identified because of the confidentiality of criminal investigations.

Spokesmen for the FBI and the Justice Department declined to confirm or deny that an inquiry is under way.

William Canfield, a lawyer who represented Weldon when a Los Angeles Times report prompted the House ethics committee to briefly explore the issue two years ago, said the congressman is unaware of a Justice Department investigation and is confident that none exists.

"Is there is an inquiry going on in the Justice Department?" Canfield asked. "The answer is no. . . . Curt knows nothing about this, his chief of staff knows nothing about it and I know nothing about it. I think we would have heard about it."

Canfield said Weldon, a 10-term House member who's vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and active in U.S. foreign affairs, dismissed the report as "crazy" while campaigning for reelection in a tight contest in Philadelphia's southwestern suburbs.

But McClatchy Newspapers' sources said the FBI only over the last few months obtained evidence suggesting that the congressman may have broken the law. One of the sources, a federal law enforcement official, said that Weldon had not yet been told about the inquiry.

The official said that the FBI recently sought the assistance of federal prosecutors in pressuring an unidentified person to provide evidence about the 59-year-old congressman. The attempt to "squeeze" this individual appeared to be an early step, the two sources said.

It is uncertain whether the current investigation will blossom into a full-blown inquiry that will result in criminal charges being filed. It is possible at this stage of the investigation that nothing will come of it. But the FBI typically does not seek the involvement of the Justice Department unless it finds substance to the evidence it has gathered.

Weldon, his daughter and Sexton all declined to respond to requests for an interview.

Joseph Fioravanti, a Media, Pa., lawyer representing Karen Weldon, sent a letter to McClatchy Newspapers declaring that "there is no investigation" and charging that a reporter was "harassing" and "baiting" her by leaving phone messages requesting comment.

Disclosure of the inquiry three weeks before the congressional elections presents a new headache for Republicans, who are already reeling from a series of scandals as they fight to retain House and Senate majorities.

In late September, Republican Congressman Mark Foley of Florida resigned after emails disclosed inappropriate messages to young male congressional pages. On Friday, Ohio Republican Rep. Robert Ney pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges relating to a corruption probe. Last month, Ney announced he wouldn't seek reelection. Two other Republicans, Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California and Tom DeLay of Texas, also have quit amid scandal.

In the Pennsylvania race, a recent poll showed that Weldon, who is vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and chairman of its Tactical Air and Land Forces Subcommittee, is locked in a statistical dead heat with his Democratic challenger, retired Vice Adm. Joe Sestak.

On Oct. 4, First Lady Laura Bush tried to give Weldon a boost, praising him at a fundraiser in Springfield, Pa., for supporting President Bush's tax cuts, backing legislation to conserve natural resources and being "a champion" of U.S. troops.

Weldon, the ninth child in a blue-collar family, worked as a firefighter and schoolteacher before turning to politics and becoming active in foreign policy issues. He has made more than 30 trips to Russia to push for closer relations with the United States.

Weldon is founder and chairman of the congressional U.S.-Former Soviet Union Energy Caucus and founder and co-chairman of an inter-parliamentary exchange with Russia, pressing for a partnership that will contribute to "peace and stability in the world." He also has met with senior officials in Libya and even in North Korea.

In 2004, The Los Angeles Times published a lengthy report that described the meteoric rise of Solutions North America, the consulting firm set up by Karen Weldon and Sexton.

The Times tracked Weldon's parallel efforts on behalf of the firm's three foreign clients, quoting Weldon and his top aide as denying any impropriety.

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a Democratic-leaning watchdog group, responded to the report by calling on the House ethics committee and Attorney General John Ashcroft to open investigations.

When the ethics panel did not act, Weldon insisted that the committee look into the allegations to clear his name. Canfield said he wound up sending a thick stack of documents to support Weldon's arguments that he did not discuss his daughter's clients with her and that his assistance to the three foreign interests was unrelated to Solutions' contracts.

Canfield said the panel conducted an informal inquiry and apparently dismissed the matter because he's heard nothing in more than two years. A spokesman for the committee, which rarely talks about its inquiries, did not respond to a request for comment.

What caused Karen Weldon to set up a lobbying firm is unclear. The Times reported that Philadelphia lawyer John Gallagher, who has worked with Representative Weldon on building relations with Russia, took credit for delivering Sexton and Weldon their first client: the Moscow-based Itera energy group.

According to the Times, Justice Department filings, congressional records and interviews by McClatchy Newspapers:

Rep. Weldon and a bipartisan congressional delegation had visited Itera in May 2002 during an official trip to Russia. Itera was drawing scrutiny at the time because of allegations that it had bought assets from a state-run energy giant for hundreds of millions of dollars below their true value.

Two months before Weldon's visit, the U.S. Trade and Development Agency scrapped plans to award an $868,000 grant to Itera to study gas deposits in Russia because the firm refused to identify all of its owners.

But Weldon, at a news conference after returning from Russia, called on the Bush administration to release the grant. The Philadelphia Inquirer reported in 2004 that Weldon also complained to presidential adviser Karl Rove and to then-energy secretary Spencer Abraham about the company's treatment by the U.S. government. The grant was never approved.

On Sept. 30, 2002, Itera signed a $500,000, one-year contract with Solutions North America, a deal that included a $170,000 payment up front. It also gave Solutions a 10 percent "finder's fee" for any sales it generated, an arrangement barred by federal contracting regulations.

On Sept. 24, 2002, six days before Solutions got the contract, Weldon introduced a House resolution encouraging "improved cooperation with the Russian Federation on energy development issues." That night, assisted by his daughter's firm, he hosted a dinner at the Library of Congress honoring Itera's chairman - an event attended by nearly 30 members of Congress and 18 members of the Russian Duma, that country's parliament.

On Jan. 10, 2003, Solutions landed a second client: a one-year, $20,000-a-month contract to represent a Russian firm that had designed a "flying saucer" drone to deliver supplies to war zones. Payments, however, would start only if Solutions landed some business for the firm, Saratov Aviation Plant. Another 10 percent finder's fee was included.

The congressman visited Saratov in Russia later that month, reportedly accompanied by his daughter. Weldon was impressed with the potential of the unmanned aircraft and contacted the Naval Air Systems Command, headquartered at the Patuxent River Naval Air Station in Maryland.

A Navair spokesman, Rob Koon, said Karen Weldon met with John Fischer, Navair's director of research and engineering sciences, in May 2003 to pursue the matter without Fischer knowing she was representing Saratov.

That September, at a meeting in Russia, Navair's Fischer and a Saratov executive signed a three-page letter of intent to work together on the new aircraft. But Navair spokesman Koon said the talks ended on Oct. 30, 2003.

Solutions got its third foreign client, the Serbian Karic Foundation, after Weldon took on the unpopular job of seeking a U.S. visa for Dragomir Karic and reportedly, one for his brother, Bogoljub.

In the early 1990s, the Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control had listed the Karic brothers among parties whose U.S. assets were frozen because of their close ties to Milosevic, who died in his cell last spring while facing war crimes charges stemming from the genocides in Bosnia. Recently, the Serbian Ministry of Internal Affairs issued an international warrant for the arrest of Bogoljub Karic as part of a tax evasion investigation.

The Karic Foundation agreed to pay Solutions $20,000 per month, to assist with its humanitarian work, including setting up a U.S. branch.

Solutions later paid more than $2,300 for Mike Conallen, who was Weldon's chief of staff at the time, to travel to Belgrade, Yugoslavia - a trip approved by Weldon, records show. Conallen later reimbursed the firm because members of Congress and their aides are barred from accepting money from foreign agents.

The Times quoted Conallen as saying he phoned the State Department so many times pushing for visas for the Karic brothers that he didn't have to say why he was calling. Conallen said he was surprised to learn of the current Justice Department inquiry, but declined further comment.

In late 2003, Sexton and Karen Weldon set up a new firm, Solutions Worldwide Inc., but ended their representation of Saratov even before the news stories broke.

Rep. Weldon Probed Over Contracts For His Daughter (WP/MCT)

Mcclatchy Newspapers

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

The Justice Department is investigating whether Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) traded his political influence for lucrative lobbying and consulting contracts for his daughter, according to sources with direct knowledge of the inquiry.

The FBI has formally referred the matter to the department's Public Integrity Section for additional scrutiny. At issue are Weldon's efforts between 2002 and 2004 to aid two Russian companies and two Serbian brothers with ties to former Yugoslavian president Slobodan Milosevic, a federal law enforcement official said.

The Russian companies and a Serbian foundation run by the brothers' family each hired a firm co-owned by Weldon's daughter, Karen, for fees totaling nearly $1 million a year, public records show.

Karen Weldon was 28 and lacked consulting experience when she and Charles Sexton, a Weldon ally and longtime Republican leader in Delaware County, Pa., created the firm Solutions North America Inc. in 2002. Both are registered with the Justice Department as representatives of foreign clients.

Word of the inquiry, which has been closely held within the Justice Department and the FBI, came from two people with specific knowledge of the existence of the investigation. They both spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the confidentiality of criminal investigations.

Spokesmen for the FBI and the Justice Department declined to confirm or deny that an inquiry is underway.

Two years ago, the Los Angeles Times examined Curt Weldon's parallel efforts in Congress on behalf of the Russian and Serbian clients of his daughter, prompting the House ethics committee to briefly explore the issue.

Weldon, his daughter and Sexton all declined to respond to requests for an interview.

FBI Is Said To Be Probing Weldon Over His Influence (PHI)

By Todd Mason And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 14, 2006

The FBI is investigating whether U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon (R., Pa.) used his influence to help his daughter win consulting contracts, sources say, a development that could influence his close race for reelection.

Weldon's campaign denied that an investigation was underway. "Our attorney tells us it is preposterous," said Michael V. Puppio Jr., his campaign manager.

"The allegation in a tight race like this does the damage," Puppio said last night. "You owe a duty to dig a little deeper."

Weldon, who has served 10 terms in Congress, is running neck and neck with retired Navy admiral Joe Sestak.

The investigation, based in Washington, has progressed beyond the preliminary stages, people familiar with the case told The Inquirer yesterday. McClatchy Newspapers broke the story.

FBI spokeswoman Deborah Weierman in Washington declined comment. Weldon's lawyer in Washington, William B. Canfield III, could not be reached at work, at home or by e-mail last night.

Charles Sexton, a political ally of the congressman and a business partner of his daughter, said the timing of the leaks is "awful strange."

"No one has contacted me," he said. "People can look at us all day long. There is no wrongdoing."

Sexton and Karen Weldon, 32, formed a public relations firm, Solutions North America, in 2002, and won $1 million in contracts from two Russian energy firms and a Serbian family with ties to Slobodan Milosevic.

That business dealing was first reported in 2004 by the Los Angeles Times. Sources said the FBI and Justice Department investigation was based on the Times story.

The Inquirer reported in 2004 that Weldon had lobbied federal officials on behalf of one of those firms, Itera, a huge and controversial Russian natural gas company. Weldon also complained to Karl Rove, President Bush's top political adviser, about Itera's treatment by the federal U.S. Trade and Development Agency.

Itera paid $500,000 to Karen Weldon and Sexton's firm. The contract was signed in Sept. 30, 2002, six days after the congressman helped arrange a dinner at the Library of Congress to honor Itera and Igor Makarov, the firm's chief executive officer.

Itera had a controversial past; Western investors in the former Soviet Union contended that the firm's rapid growth was a result of improper business deals.

Weldon was a student of the Soviet Union, and has frequently traveled to Eastern Europe.

The business dealings of Weldon's family and friends are already an issue in the hotly contested Seventh Congressional District race. A recent poll showed Weldon locked in a statistical dead heat with Sestak. The Seventh District covers most of Delaware County and parts of Chester and Montgomery Counties.

Sestak declined to comment yesterday.

However, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, in a direct mailing this week, accused Karen Weldon of getting help from "Daddy."

"In Washington, politics is a family affair, and Curt Weldon sure knew how to steer our tax dollars into his own family's pockets," the flyer said.

Karen Weldon "has not lobbied me or any other congressman," Weldon told The Inquirer's editorial board Thursday. "My kids are allowed to seek employment," he said.

Weldon said he presented the question to the House ethics committee, which declined to pursue it.

The question dogs his campaign. At a recent fund-raising breakfast featuring Laura Bush at Springfield County Club in Delaware County, an enthusiastic Republican crowd greeted Weldon's references to his children with polite silence.

Yesterday, Sestak adviser David Landau said the investigation "raises in a very dramatic fashion that accountability and ethics issues are taking center stage."

"There is a pattern here," Landau said. "You have this whole K Street mentality," he said of a key Washington address for lobbyist firms.

At the editorial board meeting, Weldon defended his party's handling of ethics issues. "Congressmen have gone to jail," he said.

The scandals surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff and Reps. Duke Cunningham, Robert Ney and Mark Foley have hampered Republican candidates in this election.

Every investigation is different, but it is not uncommon for agents probing alleged corruption, drugs and organized crime to spend months, even years, working covertly on a case before the suspects learn that they are under scrutiny.

Sexton, a longtime Delaware County GOP leader, once operated a private security firm that provided security to the Kuwaiti Embassy in Washington.

Ex-governor to be jailed during appeal

Former Gov. George Ryan must surrender to prison early next year after a federal judge on Friday refused to let him remain free on bond while his appeal winds through court.

In a 32-page ruling issued Friday evening, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer rejected claims by the defense that Ryan's conviction was likely to be reversed on appeal.

The judge also refused to let Ryan's co-defendant, Lawrence Warner, put off prison pending his appeal.

Both Ryan and Warner learned of the adverse ruling in calls from Tribune reporters. Ryan declined comment, while Warner said he was disappointed but not surprised.

Warner's lawyer, Edward Genson, said he would seek to have the U.S. Court of Appeals review Pallmeyer's ruling. Attorneys for Ryan were unavailable for comment.

If the judge had ruled in their favor, Ryan and Warner could have remained free on bond for two years or more before their appeal was decided.

Ryan 72, who was sentenced to 6 1/2 years in prison, is scheduled to surrender to prison on Jan. 4. Warner, 67, is to begin his nearly 3 1/2-year prison term on Jan. 16.

The federal Bureau of Prisons has yet to announce where the two will serve their sentences.

Ryan has requested that he do his time in a federal prison camp in Oxford, Wis., while Warner sought a prison camp in Yankton, S.D., in order to attend an alcohol-treatment program there.

A federal jury convicted Ryan in April of steering millions of dollars in state business to Warner and other friends in return for vacations, gifts and other benefits to Ryan and his family.

Defendants in Chicago's federal court rarely remain free on bond pending appeal, but Ryan's lawyers argued that the controversial finish to the trial raised significant legal questions that warranted their release on appeal.

Eight days into deliberations, Pallmeyer excused two jurors who had concealed their arrest records during jury selection months earlier, added alternates in their place and ordered the jury to start deliberations anew.

The fact that she had publicly agonized over the decision, calling it a "close call," didn't qualify Ryan for bond, the judge ruled. "Countless decisions made by a district court in the course of a trial ... are `close calls' when made," she wrote.

Prosecutors opposed Ryan's remaining free, saying it would erode public confidence in the justice system. Furthermore, the defense is unlikely to win on appeal, the government argued.

Judge To Ryan: Go To Prison Jan. 4 (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, October 14, 2006

Former Gov. George Ryan has to report to prison Jan. 4, a federal judge ruled Friday, rejecting his request to remain free as he appeals a public corruption conviction.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer ruled Ryan must begin serving his 6½-year sentence even though defense lawyers argued they have a strong case for appeal.

"We're very pleased with the court's decision," U.S. attorney spokesman Randall Samborn said.

Ryan's lawyers did not immediately return a call for comment. Ryan also could not be reached for comment. Ryan's lawyer, Dan Webb, previously said that the prison term was like a death sentence for his client because he would be nearly 73 by the time he begins serving.

Defense lawyers had argued that Ryan shouldn't have to go to prison right away because they believe serious questions remain over Ryan's verdict. Deliberations were interrupted after eight days when two jurors were removed for failing to disclose criminal backgrounds.

'Investigated each allegation'Two new jurors were swapped in, and the newly formed jury convicted Ryan and businessman Lawrence Warner on 22 counts. Pallmeyer later threw out two of the counts but upheld the conviction. Ryan's trial lasted nearly six months.

But Ryan's lawyers argued there was further juror misconduct, including other jurors who gave misleading answers on their questionnaires and weren't tossed.

Pallmeyer rejected defense contentions, including that material brought in to the deliberation room was inappropriate enough to taint proceedings, that the foreperson had outside discussions about deliberations, then lied about it, and that the newly formed jury could not truly start over on its deliberations.

"The court investigated each allegation at the time ... and concluded either that the incident did not constitute misconduct at all, or that the conduct did not prejudice the defendants," Pallmeyer wrote.

Pallmeyer previously said she believes the defense "significantly overstated the degree of juror misconduct in this case."

Judge Denies Appeal Bond, Tells Ryan He Must Go To Prison (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, October 14, 2006

CHICAGO - A federal judge dashed George Ryan's hopes of avoiding prison while his corruption case is on appeal and ordered the former governor Friday to start serving his sentence in January as scheduled.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer rejected Ryan's claim that misconduct by members of the jury at the close of the six-month trial made it likely a higher court would throw out the verdict and therefore the 72-year-old former governor should stay out of prison in the meantime.

"The court now concludes that these issues of juror misconduct do not support defendants' motions for release pending appeal," she said.

The highly detailed 32-page order effectively told Ryan, who was convicted in April along with co-defendant Larry Warner at the close of a six-month trial, to start serving his 6 1/2 -year sentence Jan. 4 as scheduled.

Pallmeyer also denied an appeal bond for Warner.

One of Ryan's defense attorneys, Timothy J. Rooney, said the defense team would have no comment on the judge's decision Friday night.

Messages seeking comment were left Friday evening at Ryan's home and cell phone numbers.

It was not known whether Ryan's lawyers would be able to go to the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in an effort to get an appeal bond.

Prosecutors had opposed any appeal bond for Ryan. Such bonds are very unusual. Judges are supposed to grant appeal bonds only if there is substantial likelihood that a higher court will throw out the verdict.

"We are pleased with the court's decision," said a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, Randall Samborn. He had no further comment.

Ryan was convicted of racketeering conspiracy, fraud, tax offenses and lying to FBI agents. Prosecutors say that as secretary of state he steered millions of dollars in state contracts to Warner and other insiders.

In return, he received rewards ranging from vacations in Jamaica, Mexico and California to a free golf bag, prosecutors argued.

Witnesses testified that state employees and taxpayer dollars were used to run Ryan's campaigns while investigations were killed to cover up the exchange of bribes and campaign donations for truck drivers licenses.

The trial's biggest fireworks came after deliberations began.

Two jurors were dismissed and replaced with alternates after it was discovered that they had not disclosed their police records on pre-trial questionnaires. The decision came eight days into jury deliberations.

But Pallmeyer said it wasn't any guarantee of a reversal on appeal.

"The court's decision to seat alternate jurors was admittedly a challenging one when made, but it does not rise to the level of the kind of 'toss up' or 'close call'" that would warrant appeal bond, she said.

It later was discovered that some of the other jurors had had brushes with the law but they were not dismissed. Pallmeyer concluded their omissions were less serious.

Ryan attorneys are planning to focus the appeal in part on another juror's action in bringing unauthorized legal papers into the jury room.

But Pallmeyer concluded the papers "had no prejudicial effect on the verdict" and therefore "does not present a substantial question warranting release pending appeal." She also brushed aside an alleged conversation about the case that another juror had with an outsider.

5 Years For Dixon (MCA)

Former state senator draws judge's criticism for lack of remorse in Tennessee Waltz sting

Former state senator Roscoe Dixon was sentenced to five years and three months in prison Friday by a judge who viewed him as unrepentant for his Tennessee Waltz bribery conviction.

U.S. Dist. Court Judge Jon McCalla handed down the sentence, the stiffest yet for a defendant in the FBI's undercover sting.

DOJ_NMG_0081262

Advertisement

It came after a three-hour hearing in a packed courtroom during which the judge found Dixon had shown no acceptance of responsibility.

"The court has been listening for words it has not heard -- 'What I did was wrong,'" McCalla told the veteran legislator. "I'm still listening for those words."

Dixon, 57, testified that he was sorry he had gotten involved in the investigation, but offered no apologies and continued to maintain he was entrapped, a defense the jury rejected this summer.

"I want to hold all my options to have the right to appeal," said Dixon, whose character witnesses included ministers, civic leaders and neighborhood activists. "I do want to say I'm sorry I caused my friends who are so proud of me to to have doubts about Roscoe Dixon. I too am human, but God is not through with me yet."

The former Democratic legislator will remain free on his own recognizance until he is notified when and where to report by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons, probably in several months.

The three-year-old Tennessee Waltz investigation, which prosecutors have said is ongoing, has resulted in the indictment of 12 elected officials and aides.

He is the third defendant to be sentenced to prison. Four others are awaiting sentencing and five others are set for trial.

Dixon was convicted June 8 on each of five counts of accepting payoffs from former associates and undercover FBI agents posing as crooked businessmen willing to pay for legislation favorable to their fictitious company, E-Cycle Management.

Many of the conversations and three money transactions totaling $9,500 were secretly recorded on audio and video that was shown to jurors during his seven-day trial. To show jurors he was predisposed to such conduct, prosecutors presented evidence that Dixon previously had accepted a $6,000 bribe which was not part of the indictment.

His catch phrase for agreeing to accept payoffs, as shown on the tapes, was "Keep Barry happy," a reference to aide and confessed bagman Barry Myers.

Dixon testified that he was set up and that he felt he was simply accepting financial support or campaign contributions with no favors expected in return.

Federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza acknowledged that Dixon had made valuable contributions to the community over the years as an elected official, but he said the ex-senator had betrayed the public trust and had shown in court "almost a defiance of the rule of law."

As defense attorney Coleman Garrett began expounding on the entrapment defense, that "that government manufactured this crime," McCalla quickly stopped him and delivered a sharp but carefully worded rebuke.

"This case occurred because a public official took money," the judge said. "The great disservice in this case is when public officials or legislators attack this sacred system. When a public official tells people to distrust the system, one that's worked well for hundreds of years, the corrosive effect on the community is great. That's wrong. Somebody has to say it."

McCalla then called the lawyers into his chambers for a private discussion that lasted about 15 minutes.

After the hearing, Garrett declined to say what was said behind closed doors but maintained that Dixon is still entitled to argue his defense of entrapment.

"What we're not giving proper deference to is the entrapment defense," Garrett told reporters. "The government is not sacrosanct. There's nothing wrong with challenging it."

McCalla sentenced Dixon to the low end of the federal guideline range of 63 to 78 months.

He ruled that the sentence was appropriate because Dixon had obstructed justice by testifying falsely, that he accepted multiple bribes totaling more than $10,000 and that he was a public official.

Ex-senator Dixon Sentenced To Five Years For Bribery (KNOXNS/AP)

By Woody Baird, Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), October 14, 2006

MEMPHIS - Former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon, the first lawmaker to go to trial in the bribery scandal called Tennessee Waltz, drew a sentence Friday of five years and three months in federal prison.

Dixon, 57, is the first lawmaker to go to trial in the public corruption investigation but the second to be sentenced.

Former state Rep. Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, pleaded guilty to bribery last year and was sentenced to one year in prison. Three other current or former state lawmakers are awaiting trial.

Judge Jon McCalla told Dixon and a courtroom full of supporters that statements of remorse can go a long way toward reducing a lawbreaker's punishment.

"I'm still waiting for those words," the judge said.

Dixon, a longtime Democratic lawmaker and community activist, told McCalla he hoped to get "consideration ... for my entire life."

"I'm sorry that I, too, am human, but God is not through with me yet," Dixon said.

After sentencing, Dixon continued to argue that he was tricked into taking money from FBI agents posing as crooked businessmen wanting a change in state law.

He said he declined admitting guilt because "I wanted to hold all my options open because I'm going to appeal."

Dixon, who is black, has argued that he was targeted by federal investigators because of his race.

McCalla said he saw "not one shred of evidence" of government wrongdoing and admonished Dixon for comments that could undermine the public's faith in the judicial system.

"That's wrong Sen. Dixon. That's wrong," McCalla said.

Undercover agents made bribes available to many lawmakers and other public officials, the judge said, and "some accepted and some did not. That's what happened."

After sentencing, Dixon was released without bond to await notice from federal officials on where he should report to prison. He has no chance of parole and will be on probation for two years after his release.

Dixon was convicted in June on five bribery and extortion charges carrying a statutory maximum punishment of 90 years in prison. But federal guidelines for a first-time offender called for a sentencing range of five years and three months to six years and six months.

McCalla refused defense requests to alter the mathematical formula on which the guidelines were based or to hand down a sentence below the lower range. He agreed with prosecutors on increasing the sentencing formula, saying Dixon lied in court and took numerous payoffs.

Dixon's indictment listed bribes adding up to $9,500, but McCalla agreed with prosecutors that the total was $15,500, including payoffs that preceded the Tennessee Waltz investigation.

Prosecutors said Dixon split those bribes with former associate Barry Myers, who pleaded guilty and testified against him.

"Public officials should recognize ... that they must be held accountable if they break the law," U.S. Attorney David Kustoff said. "Today's sentencing of Mr. Dixon demonstrates this very principle."

The Tennessee Waltz scandal rocked the state Legislature when indictments were made public last year and led to a special session on ethics reforms.

The investigation focused on an FBI front company, E-Cycle Management, which sought government help in setting up business in Tennessee. The investigation has led to charges against 11 defendants, including several local officials in Memphis and Chattanooga.

Overall, four defendants have pleaded guilty and two, including Dixon, have been convicted at trial. Among those awaiting trial are Sen. Ward Crutchfield, D-Chattanooga, and former Memphis Sens. Kathryn Bowers and John Ford, also Democrats.

Ex-Detective Is Given 7-Year Prison Term (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

In a Brooklyn courtroom packed with his family, friends and neighbors, a retired police detective who had admitted to stealing roughly $800,000 from drug dealers delivered a tormented apology yesterday, moments before a judge sentenced him to seven years in federal prison.

Sobbing as he described how a voracious gambling addiction drove his thefts and led to a separation from his wife, the detective, Thomas Rachko, 48, also spoke of his two sons, 11 and 13 years old, who were not in court.

He said the boys had read many times of his successes during his 20-year police career, only “to be forced because of my hideous actions to read about my disgusting behavior.”

“I just can’t believe I did what I did to them,” Mr. Rachko told Judge Carol B. Amon of United States District Court in Brooklyn.

A big man with close-cropped silver hair, he rubbed his hand over his face as his voice quavered.

“I am so sorry, but by the same token, your honor, I am here today to be punished,” he said. “I deserve to be punished. What I did was horrendous. I can’t believe I did it, but it is deserving of punishment.”

Mr. Rachko, who retired from the Police Department in 2002, had faced life in prison on narcotics conspiracy charges arising from his significant role in the department’s biggest scandal in a decade. His sentencing brought the criminal investigation to a close.

He was arrested on Nov. 26, 2003, just hours after he and his old partner, Julio C. Vasquez, were captured on videotape stealing $169,000 from a drug money courier. He began cooperating with the authorities almost immediately, and the theft unraveled a web of corruption — thefts of drug money and drugs that Mr. Vasquez helped sell for cash. As many as 10 current or retired police detectives and supervisors were implicated.

Mr. Rachko, who before he retired was assigned to the Northern Manhattan Initiative, a narcotics unit that focused on drug dealers in Harlem and Washington Heights, spent his drug plunder betting on horses. He sometimes collected his illicit take right outside Off-Track Betting parlors so he could go back in and gamble some more.

But he stressed to the judge that he was not seeking to lessen the gravity of his crimes by citing his addiction.

"I do not use gambling as an excuse for what I did, your honor," he said. "I knew when I did what I did I was doing wrong, and I was breaking the law. I just did not have the courage or the proper mind-set to stop. I knew because of the fact that for most of my years I was a good detective, I knew that I was going to get caught. But I just could not control myself."

He told the judge that his gambling addiction placed a tremendous burden on his family. He also apologized to his community, a Bronx neighborhood, whose residents turned out with his family to support him, filling every seat on the courtroom's polished wooden benches. He said he never bought anything for himself, adding that the dark gray suit in which he was sentenced was given to him as a gift 10 years ago.

"Yes, I was greedy for that money," he said. "Almost like a — a junkie would be for a bag of heroin. I just wanted that money to gamble."

His lawyer, Jeffrey Lichtman, had pleaded with the judge to look at some of the positive things Mr. Rachko had done, citing his work as a detective before he began committing crimes, and his extensive volunteer work in the Bronx.

The prosecutor, Adam Abensohn, an assistant United States attorney, said some of his colleagues had known Mr. Rachko before his arrest, and "liked him, trusted him and believed him."

Before pronouncing sentence, Judge Amon called his crimes a "horrible breach of the public trust." But she noted that he was remorseful and had cooperated, as detailed in a prosecution letter that enabled her to mete out a lighter sentence than the statutory minimum of 10 years and the maximum life term advised by sentencing guidelines.

The proceeding yesterday brought to an end the three-year investigation by the El Dorado Task Force, the anti-money-laundering unit of Immigration and Customs Enforcement of the Department of Homeland Security that videotaped the $169,000 theft, and by F.B.I. agents and the police Internal Affairs Bureau investigators.

Mr. Vasquez was sentenced to six years in prison. John Maguire, a retired lieutenant, was sentenced to 14 months, and Carlos Rodriguez, a former detective, was sentenced to two years. Another detective was fired after a police administrative hearing, and the department is seeking to fire two more.

After the sentencing, an F.B.I. agent who worked on the case shook Mr. Rachko's hand. Then, the retired detective, who will keep his police pension and pay a $10,000 fine after serving his prison term and five years of supervised release, walked into the courtroom gallery and held his wife in a long embrace as both wept. He then hugged several supporters who had filled the benches.

Ex-cop Gets 7 Years In Scheme (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 14, 2006

A tearful ex-cop begged for mercy Friday and got it when a federal judge in Brooklyn sentenced him to 7 years in prison, much less than the possible life term he faced for ripping off hundreds of thousands of dollars from drug dealers.

Thomas Rachko, 46, of the Bronx, told Judge Carol B. Amon that his compulsive gambling helped push him to steal the drug money over a five-year period in a scandal that implicated a number of other officers.

"Every time I got money, I gambled it away right away," Rachko told Amon. "And I now realize it wasn't so much to try to have that big win. I just wanted to gamble. I wanted the action."

Rachko, who retired from the NYPD in 2002, pleaded guilty in 2004 to charges that he was involved in a scheme in which he and others ripped off the dealers and hoarded the cash.

He was arrested in late November 2003 with then-Det. Julio Vasquez after they were both spotted by members of a drug enforcement task force taking cash from a drug trafficker in Queens.

Friday, defense attorney Jeffrey Lichtman reminded Amon that it had been Rachko who made the quick decision after his arrest to cooperate with investigators and led them to $68,000 stashed in a trash container in the Bronx.

Investigators said Rachko told them he pulled in about $800,000 from the scheme.

Because Rachko was perceived by prosecutors to have obstructed justice, he could have faced life in prison under federal sentencing guidelines. But Lichtman argued that, in the end. his client didn't obstruct justice and did nothing worse than Vasquez. Vasquez was sentenced earlier this month to 6 years in prison.

"This isn't a greedy man," added Lichtman.

Rachko, who often dabbed tears from his face with a handkerchief as Lichtman spoke, struggled to maintain his composure when he addressed Amon.

"My crimes, as terrible as they are, and my gambling addiction, in early 2003, caused me to be separated from my wife, Sandy, an unwanted separation by myself," said Rachko through sobs.

"I am here today to be punished. I deserve to be punished," said Rachko to Amon. "I humbly ask for your mercy today not only for myself, but for my continued recovery and for my children."

Amon said Rachko's crimes were "extraordinarily grave" and that he had a leadership role in the scheme. But she acknowledged that he was contrite and showed remorse.

In addition to the prison sentence, Amon fined Rachko $10,000. She allowed him to surrender to federal prison officials early next year. Rachko remains free on bail until then.

COP'S CRYING SHAME (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, October 14, 2006

October 14, 2006 -- A disgraced NYPD detective sobbed uncontrollably as he told a Brooklyn judge he robbed drug dealers not out of greed - but to feed his high-stakes gambling habit.

"I do not use gambling as an excuse for what I did," said Thomas Rachko, who gambled away roughly $800,000 in drug money he plundered over a five-year period until being busted for stealing $169,000 from a drug courier in Queens in November 2003.

"I knew when I did what I did I was doing wrong and I was breaking the law - but I just could not control myself," the retired 20-year veteran told Brooklyn federal court Judge Carol Amon, who sentenced him to seven years in prison yesterday.

He told the judge he was always looking for action, "almost like a junkie would be for a bag of heroin. I just wanted that money to gamble."

The hulking Rachko, 48, choked up as he explained how his "hideous actions" dishonored the NYPD and the people who live around him in the Riverdale section of The Bronx who showed up in droves and packed the courtroom to support him.

But he burst into tears when he apologized to his wife and two sons - who were not in the courtroom - for having "to read about my disgusting behavior."

Jeffrey Lichtman, Rachko's lawyer, pointed to many good things Rachko did as a cop and noted that he was the first to come forward and spill the beans about other crooked cops after he and former partner Julio Vasquez - who was sentenced last week to six years - were arrested.

"He deserves punishment, there's no question," said Lichtman. "But he also deserves compassion."

The judge apparently agreed, stating that, "I believe Mr. Rachko is remorseful and his statements are genuine."

She could have meted out a life sentence, but felt seven years was appropriate, since he pleaded guilty in June 2004 and will have to pay a $10,000 fine when he finishes five years' probation.

Rachko's court days may not be over, however.

Two convicted drug dealers freed following the arrests of Rachko and Vasquez have filed federal civil-rights lawsuits against the two rogue cops and the city.

Bertrand Canty and Nelson Belliard are seeking $56 million for false arrest, negligence, battery and other claims.

I Gambled Life Away, Sez Ex-cop Who Gets 7 Years (NYDN)

New York Daily News, October 14, 2006

A disgraced former NYPD detective told a federal judge yesterday his compulsive gambling led him to steal more than $800,000 from drug dealers.

Thomas Rachko, 48, was sentenced to seven years in prison after telling Brooklyn Federal Judge Carol Amon how gambling cost him his career and marriage.

"I just lost complete control of my mind and continued to gamble," Rachko said, sobbing. "Every time I got money I gambled it right away. And now I realize it wasn't so much to try to have that big win. I just wanted to gamble. I wanted the action."

Rachko was the ringleader of a group of corrupt narcs that robbed dealers of cash and drugs with impunity for years in upper Manhattan.

"I knew I was doing wrong and I was breaking the law; I just did not have the courage or the proper mind-set to stop," he said.

After his marriage fell apart, he gambled even more. "I was greedy for that money, almost like a junkie would be for a bag of heroin," he said.

Rachko was facing life in prison for his leadership role. But prosecutor Adam Abensohn said he deserved a break because he cooperated with authorities after he and his ex-partner, Detective Julio Vasquez, were caught in 2003 robbing a drug courier in Queens.

NYC Detective In Drug Scandal Gets 7 Years (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, October 14, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) _ A retired police detective who stole nearly $800,000 in drug money sobbed and apologized for his crime before a judge sentenced him to seven years in prison.

Thomas Rachko, 48, said he stole because he needed money to fuel a gambling addiction.

"I deserve to be punished," he told U.S. District Judge Carol Amon, before she rendered the sentence in a Brooklyn court. "What I did was horrendous. I can't believe I did it, but it is deserving of punishment."

Rachko, 48, could have gotten up to life in prison on the narcotics conspiracy charges.

The case was part of a damaging corruption scandal at the police department. Rachko and his one-time police partner, Julio Vasquez, were caught on tape stealing $169,000 from a drug courier.

Confronted with the evidence, Rachko, who retired from the police department in 2002, began cooperating with investigators and helped provide evidence that led to charges against several other police detectives.

Amon called Rachko's crime a "horrible breach of the public trust," but gave him credit for helping with the investigation, and ultimately less time than the 10 year minimum he would have faced if he had refused to cooperate.

Vasquez also cooperated and was sentenced to six years in jail earlier this month for stealing and reselling cocaine. He resigned after his arrest in 2003.

Vermont Student's Body Is Found (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

A University of Vermont student who had been missing since last weekend was found dead yesterday near a gorge about 15 miles from campus, and the police identified as a suspect a man she had borrowed a cellphone from in downtown Burlington, Vt.

Chief Thomas Tremblay of the Burlington police said the body of Michelle Gardner-Quinn, a 21-year-old senior from Arlington, Va., was found off the side of a road in Richmond, Vt., near a popular swimming site called Huntington Gorge.

Chief Tremblay said Ms. Gardner-Quinn's death was a homicide, and he identified Brian Rooney, 36, of Richmond as a "very likely suspect."

Chief Tremblay said Mr. Rooney had been arrested yesterday afternoon on charges unrelated to Ms. Gardner-Quinn's death. He said those charges, of sexual assault and lewd and lascivious conduct with a child, involved incidents in Caledonia County, about 75 miles from Burlington, before Ms. Gardner-Quinn's disappearance.

The disappearance of Ms. Gardner-Quinn prompted an exhaustive search by the police, the F.B.I. and legions of volunteers from the university community, many of them students shocked at the prospect that a kidnapping might have occurred in a city normally considered safe.

She was last seen about 2:30 a.m. last Saturday while walking on Main Street in Burlington with Mr. Rooney, whom she had not met before. The police said she had been at bars celebrating a friend's birthday and was walking back to campus when her cellphone battery died and she stopped Mr. Rooney to ask to use his.

A surveillance camera at Perrywinkles Fine Jewelry store captured images of Ms. Gardner-Quinn and Mr. Rooney on Main Street.

Man Questioned in Death Of Senior From Arlington

The body of a missing college senior from Arlington was found yesterday off a rural road near the University of Vermont. Police said that the man with whom she was last seen six days ago was arrested on unrelated sex assault charges and was being questioned about her death.

DOJ_NMG_0081267

Burlington Police Chief Thomas Tremblay said the body was tentatively identified as that of Michelle Gardner-Quinn, 21. The body was discovered about 15 miles southeast of downtown Burlington, near a swimming hole popular among college students and residents, Tremblay said.

He said it was not yet known how Gardner-Quinn was killed or when her body might have been left at the spot. Police said they are investigating her death as an apparent kidnapping and homicide.

"We are not done yet," Tremblay said in an afternoon news conference at Burlington's City Hall. "There is still more work to be done."

Gardner-Quinn -- whose disappearance last Saturday was the focus of an intense investigation that fanned across several nearby communities -- was last seen walking from Burlington's downtown area toward campus, about five blocks away.

A surveillance camera captured her walking with Brian Rooney, 36, a construction worker who lent her his cellphone so she could call friends after the battery in her phone died, police said.

Rooney, of nearby Richmond, Vt., has not been charged in Gardner-Quinn's slaying, Tremblay said, although he was being interviewed by detectives last night. Tremblay said Rooney was charged yesterday with sexual assault and lewd and lascivious conduct with a child in Caledonia County, about 80 miles east of Burlington. He declined to elaborate on the charges.

Rooney is to be arraigned Monday on those charges, Tremblay said.

The disappearance and death of Gardner-Quinn was at least the third such incident in the past year involving a female college student. The body of University of Virginia student Elizabeth M. Hafter, 22, was found Oct. 1 along the Blue Ridge Parkway with a single gunshot wound to the head after she had been missing a few days. And in September 2005, Virginia Commonwealth University freshman Taylor Behl was found slain in rural Mathews County. Behl, 17, of Vienna, was found one month after she was reported missing from the Richmond campus.

Yesterday, Tremblay urged anyone with information about Gardner-Quinn's case to call authorities. He said an autopsy was scheduled for this weekend.

After several days with few leads, the investigation quickened midafternoon yesterday. While Vermont State Police canvassed the swimming hole, authorities cordoned off a half-block in a residential neighborhood in Burlington not far from where Gardner-Quinn was last seen.

Using various tools, they dug out an area in the back yard of a house where concrete had been poured this week, according to the Associated Press and Burlington television stations. The house was somehow connected to Rooney, they reported.

Gardner-Quinn, a senior majoring in Latin American studies and environmental science, was reported missing after she failed to show up for a planned dinner with her parents last Saturday. They had traveled to Burlington for parents' weekend at the college.

Gardner-Quinn was a 2003 graduate of H-B Woodlawn Secondary Program, an academically rigorous magnet school at which students have a large say in the curriculum.

Tommy Lang, 21, a University of Vermont senior who grew up with Gardner-Quinn, told the Associated Press yesterday that nothing seemed amiss when she called him from Rooney's cellphone just before her disappearance.

"She sounded completely fine and normal and exactly the way she did when she left us," said Lang, who had been hanging out with Gardner-Quinn and others for a friend's 21st birthday celebration. "There wasn't anything that made me worry or made me suspicious that anything was going on."

Yesterday, after posting numerous optimistic messages online praying for Gardner-Quinn's safe return, friends began leaving messages of mourning.

"Michelle you were one-in-a-million," wrote her friend Elizabeth Oliphant on Facebook.com, a social networking site popular among college students. "I am heartbroken for your family -- they will stay in my thoughts and prayers for a long time. You will be missed dearly."

Gail Fendley, a longtime family friend, said in a telephone interview yesterday that she considered Gardner-Quinn a part of her family. Her son, Ian Willson, 22, had grown up with Gardner-Quinn, and the two had dated in recent years. Yesterday, Fendley sat sobbing inside her vehicle, parked on a street in Richmond, Va., where her son attends college.

"It's not that every life doesn't matter, but this is one who would've made the world a better place," Fendley said. "I just can't imagine how someone could hurt our Michelle."

Worst Fears Come True In Vt. Search (BOS)

Student's body is discovered; area man held

DOJ_NMG_0081268

BURLINGTON, Vt. -- Hikers near a rural gorge yesterday found the body of a University of Vermont student who disappeared a week ago while walking back to her dormitory on a downtown Burlington street, police said.

Police said 21-year-old Michelle Gardner-Quinn had apparently been slain, and identified Brian L. Rooney, 36, of nearby Richmond, as the suspect in a crime that has deeply unnerved this bucolic college town. Rooney, who police say is the last person seen with Gardner-Quinn, was arrested yesterday on unrelated sexual assault charges.

As ashen-faced Burlington Police Chief Thomas Tremblay announced ``with a heavy heart'' that the six-day search for Gardner-Quinn had ended, the outgoing student's friends sobbed, their worst fears realized.

``I don't even know what I'd say,'' said Adam Briere, 19, a close friend.

University of Vermont president Daniel Mark Fogel said he was devastated. ``All of us are filled with intense anguish and sorrow at the terrible news and the loss of one of our students,'' he said in an interview.

While awaiting autopsy results to confirm the identity of the body and cause of death , police would not describe how Gardner-Quinn had been killed, say whether she had been sexually assaulted, or say how long she had been dead. More crime scene processing is needed before Rooney could be linked to Gardner-Quinn's death, Tremblay said.

The student was reported missing last Saturday after she failed to show up for an outing with her parents, who had been visiting Burlington from Arlington, Va. Gardner-Quinn, who majored in Latin American history and environmental studies, had transferred in September from a college in Baltimore.

As her parents kept vigil in Burlington, Vermont police, FBI agents, and National Guard troops, augmented by eager students and other volunteers from the university, scoured Burlington and the surrounding area.

But yesterday's discovery came about through a phone call from a group of hikers alerting authorities to a body in an area that had not been searched, the bank of Huntington Gorge, a popular swimming hole in Richmond, about 15 miles from Burlington. On Tuesday, police searched a house near where the body was found that they said was related to Rooney.

Rooney had been the focus of the investigation for days, though until yesterday police had refused to identify him or call him a suspect. Police had interviewed him and knew his whereabouts for most of the week before his arrest yesterday.

Gardner-Quinn made a call from Rooney's cellphone, and a jewelry store surveillance camera captured the two walking on Main Street in downtown Burlington at roughly the same time, police said. Yesterday, police asked for the public's help in tracking the whereabouts of a red Jeep Cherokee belonging to Rooney. Police said they have searched the vehicle, but urged anyone who might have seen the Jeep between last Saturday morning and Monday morning to call investigators.

Rooney's former father-in-law described him as an erratic and abusive man unable to hang on to jobs and chronically behind on child support payments.

``He's the scum of the earth,'' Roger Martin of Craftsbury, Vt., said in an interview this week. ``He'd make my daughter do things she didn't want to do. . . . If she didn't do it, he'd say he'd hurt himself.''

Rooney was $13,000 behind in child support to Martin's daughter, with whom he has an 8-year-old girl, Martin said. He also said that Rooney often sniffed gasoline and aerosol cans to get high.

Rooney, most recently employed as a construction worker, has been accused of violence toward women in the past, court documents show.

A 23-year-old former girlfriend sought a restraining order in November 2005, alleging that Rooney ``has been sexually and emotionally abusive.''

``I don't feel safe going anywhere by myself, because he shows up everywhere I go,'' wrote the woman, with whom Rooney had another child. ``Brian is always driving by my house, following me, calling.''

Rooney will be arraigned Monday on charges of sexual assault and lewd and lascivious conduct with a child, police said. The alleged crimes happened in Caledonia County and Essex County, about 80 miles from Burlington, before Gardner-Quinn's disappearance, but police said they only discovered them while investigating Rooney this week.

The child sex charge stemmed from an action in 1998, according to Essex County State's Attorney Vincent Illuzzi.

Gardner-Quinn's disappearance prompted a sense of vulnerability in Burlington, where three colleges dominate daily life. Confirmation of her death, which quickly rippled across the city yesterday afternoon, appeared to deepen those concerns.

Women around campus said they would be more cautious, particularly at night.

``I'm definitely not going to walk anywhere alone,'' said Kerrie Keller, an 18-year-old freshman from Maine. ``My parents called me and asked me please not to walk anywhere alone.''

At J.P.'s Pub, where Gardner-Quinn was celebrating a friend's birthday in the hours before she vanished, bartender Amy Delorme pulled the missing person fliers off the walls after news of the body's discovery.

``I saw it on the TV, so I just took them down,'' she said, shaking her head. ``People are just so sad.''

Autopsy Performed On Vt. College Senior (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

BURLINGTON, Vt. -- A man authorities are investigating in the case of a University of Vermont senior who was found dead along a ravine was being held without bail on unrelated charges Saturday while an autopsy was performed on the victim.

Brian L. Rooney, a construction worker from Richmond with a record of several arrests, was taken into custody Friday, the same day hikers happened upon the body of Michelle Gardner-Quinn near Huntington Gorge, a popular swimming hole.

Gardner-Quinn had disappeared nearly a week earlier while walking to her dormitory.

The cause of her death had not been released. The autopsy was ongoing Saturday but results would not be released this weekend, said police Lt. Kathleen Stubbing. She said it would likely be at least a week before any charges can be brought in the case.

Meanwhile, a memorial service for Gardner-Quinn was scheduled for Sunday night at the University of Vermont in Burlington.

Rooney, 36, was arrested Friday on unrelated charges of sex abuse elsewhere in Vermont. He was jailed without bail on those charges Saturday, pending a Monday arraignment. He had not been charged in Gardner-Quinn's case, but is considered the prime suspect in her disappearance and death, Police Chief Thomas Tremblay said.

Gardner-Quinn, 21, of Arlington, Va., was last seen alive in the early morning of Oct. 7 as she walked up Main Street after celebrating a friend's birthday at downtown bars.

Authorities said that in a chance encounter she asked Rooney to borrow his cell phone to make a call because the battery in hers had gone dead. She made the call and was seen, on surveillance video from a jewelry store camera, walking alongside Rooney.

Gardner-Quinn was reported missing later that day when she failed to make a dinner date with her parents.

Because of the surveillance video, Rooney had been the focus of the investigation.

Days later, Rooney was seen with cuts on his hands when he stopped at Walt's Game Room, a candy store and pool parlor in Winooski, where he was a regular customer, owner John Barton said Saturday. It was either Monday or Wednesday, Barton said.

"He looked very down and depressed," said Barton, who asked Rooney about police activity at the house where he was staying.

"I asked him what the deal was with the FBI and police and everything going around. He said he was the guy who had lent the missing girl his cell phone," Barton said. "He basically said `I was walking up the street with her and when I got halfway up she went one way and I went the other and I don't remember anything after that.'"

Barton said he noticed two or three cuts on Rooney's right hand but thought they may have been suffered on the job because they were scabbed over.

A woman who lives upstairs from the Winooski apartment where Rooney was staying said Saturday he came home drunk late Wednesday and told her he did something wrong with "the girl from the college."

"He came up and he was drunk, crazy," said Amy Stewart, 25.

"He said he did something wrong with that girl. That's all I know. I say `Tell me more, tell me what's going on,' and he said he not going to tell me anymore," she said.

Rooney was charged with sexual assault in Caledonia County, 80 miles north of Burlington, and with lewd and lascivious conduct with a child in neighboring Essex county, where he previously lived, authorities said.

His stepfather said Saturday he doesn't believe Rooney was involved in Gardner-Quinn's disappearance.

"We've got all the faith in the world in him," said Ronald Skinner, whose Richmond home was searched Tuesday as part of the investigation.

According to court records and interviews, Rooney has had minor scrapes with the law. He had been arrested several times for driving without a license and once for disorderly conduct. He has also had arrests for leaving the scene of an accident and burglary, according to Caledonia County State's Attorney Bob Butterfield, who did not know the ultimate disposition of those charges Saturday.

159-Year Sentence Upheld But Called Absurd (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

In the case of a mentally disturbed robber, a justice says courts are hamstrung by Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0081270

A federal appeals court in San Francisco on Friday upheld a 159-year prison term for a mentally disturbed woman with no criminal history after one judge angrily concluded the nation's rigid sentencing laws left the panel with no options but to affirm the "irrational, inhumane and absurd" sentence.

The 3-0 ruling by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals came one year after Marion Hungerford, 52, of Billings, Mont., received the sentence for a string of robberies at Montana casinos and bars from April to July 2002.

The robberies, according to the 18-page opinion written by Judge Susan P. Garber, began when Hungerford and her male roommate, Dana Canfield, were both unemployed and decided to rob a convenience store to pay the rent.

"Marion said she was going to have to go on a crime spree," Canfield testified at the trial. "And since she has problems walking and stuff, I decided that I would do it."

A jury found Hungerford not guilty of that first robbery and one other, but authorities alleged they were only the start of a string of crimes.

She was convicted on one count of conspiracy, seven counts of robbery and seven counts of using a firearm because her accomplice was armed with a .22-caliber revolver.

In rejecting her appeal of four of the robbery and firearms convictions, the court found sufficient evidence that she knowingly took part in the holdups. "There is no evidence that [Hungerford] took any affirmative action to withdraw from the ongoing conspiracy," the court said. "To the contrary, she continued to accept and spend the proceeds of all the robberies and worked purposefully to conceal the crimes."

Though affirming Hungerford's conviction, Judge Stephen Reinhardt decried the sentence handed down in the case as a "predictable byproduct of the cruel and unjust mandatory minimum sentence scheme adopted by Congress."

Although she never touched a gun, Reinhardt noted, Hungerford was sentenced to five years on the first count of using a firearm and 25 years on each of the three other counts because the law gave the trial judge "no choice or discretion, except to impose the statutory mandatory sentences."

"What the judge was not permitted to take into account when sentencing Hungerford should shock the conscience of anyone who believes that reasonable proportionality between a crime and the sentence is a necessary condition of fair sentencing," Reinhardt wrote.

The judge, he said, was not allowed to consider numerous mitigating factors, including Hungerford's "severe form of borderline personality disorder, which can alter one's perception of reality in a manner similar to schizophrenia" and had led to numerous suicide attempts.

Nor, Reinhardt said, was the judge permitted to consider a psychiatrist's testimony that Hungerford suffered from other mental problems, that she was financially desperate after her husband of 26 years left her, or that no one was injured in the robberies, which netted less than $10,000.

Most important, Reinhardt wrote, Hungerford's "extremely limited role" in the crimes proved ultimately irrelevant to her sentence.

Indeed, he noted, it was her accomplice who brandished the gun and committed the robberies and yet he was sentenced to 32 years after pleading guilty.

"Not only is the sentence [for Hungerford] cruel, it is absurd," he wrote. "The case at hand is precisely the type of case that should make Congress question what worthy ends are served by a cruel and inflexible sentencing scheme."

Hungerford's attorney could not be reached Friday. A Justice Department official had no comment on the ruling but said the department "is committed to the prevention of gun crime and the vigorous enforcement of our nation's gun laws."

Law Enforcement Gathering To Bring Thousands To Hub (BOS)

By April Simpson, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, October 14, 2006

More than 14,000 law enforcement professionals will gather in Boston starting this weekend for a conference that will feature some of the nation's highest-ranking officials as speakers .

The International Association of Chiefs of Police, the world's largest nonprofit organization of police executives, will kick off its annual conference and exposition today at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center. Although this will be the association's 113th conference, it will be the first in New England, said John Boyle, a Boston Police Department spokesman.

Speakers include Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III, and Marine General Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. More than 750 exhibitors will showcase police products, such as vehicles, mobile command centers, and helicopters, Boyle said.

DOJ_NMG_0081271

There will be international delegates from Europe, Asia, and the Caribbean, said Wendy Balazik, an association spokeswoman. ``We all have the same goals of protecting our communities, and coming together to exchange ideas is beneficial for a law enforcement officer, no matter where he or she is from."

From today until Wednesday, participants may attend workshops on topics such as career physical fitness and responding to speeding complaints.

Tomorrow, 1,000 runners will participate in the 25th annual 5K Police Chase, with proceeds to benefit the Boston Police Department's Kids at Risk Program. The race begins in Copley Square, takes runners through Fenway Park, and ends at the Boston Marathon finish line.

The convention is expected to result in more than $16 million in direct spending, with an additional $10 million in indirect spending. Attendees are expected to fill more than 6,000 rooms in about 30 hotels, Boyle said.

Compared with previous events at the center, this conference ranks 11th in size for attendance, and second in hotel room nights booked, said Bridget Perry, a convention center spokeswoman.

CIVIL LAW:

Activist Pursues Claim That L.A. Port Illegally Funded Maersk Facility (LAT)

By Dan Weikel, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

He says officials spent $1.2 billion on a terminal for the giant shipper when the money was earmarked for other use.

A harbor area activist filed an appeal Friday in an attempt to revive a federal lawsuit alleging that the Port of Los Angeles misappropriated $1.2 billion in government funds to build a giant cargo terminal for the world's largest shipping line.

Stanley D. Mosler of Rancho Palos Verdes is challenging decisions by U.S. District Judge S. James Otero, who dismissed the false-claims case in August, saying that Mosler no longer had an attorney and that he was unqualified as a layperson to handle a lawsuit on behalf of the United States.

A few weeks after the decision, Mosler hired a lawyer, Alan Gutman, but Otero refused to reinstate the case, saying it was too late.

Otero noted in his ruling that Mosler had been warned earlier that he should obtain counsel.

Mosler was represented for three years by attorney Milford Dahl, who bowed out in February 2005, saying the case would be too costly for him to pursue. Mosler then proceeded on his own, hoping to get the case to trial.

"The elusive quality in Judge Otero's order is justice," Mosler said. "The dismissal was not on the merits but because I could not afford to match the port's spending in legal fees. I trust that the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals will rule that having money is not a necessary element to access our federal courts."

Filed in March 2002, Mosler's case alleged that port officials had engaged in a "bait-and-switch" maneuver when they shifted long-standing plans to relocate crude oil and other hazardous shipments to a man-made island that would be built away from populated areas to improve harbor safety.

Mosler said in his suit that port officials decided to turn the island into a massive container facility for Maersk Inc., leaving only 15 acres — instead of hundreds of acres — for petroleum and chemical terminals.

At issue was whether the port violated federal agreements to build the so-called energy island project and misappropriated $108.6 million in federal grants and nearly $1.1 billion in harbor revenue to construct what is now known as Pier 400, which was completed in 2004.

In their defense, port officials said the plans for an energy island changed because there was no market for oil and petroleum terminals. Tenants resisted the idea as too costly while crude oil and other hazardous shipments were declining.

Port officials also said that 15 of the more than 500 acres of the man-made island are still available for hazardous shipments. They also argued that the Army Corps of Engineers, which participated in the project, was told of the changes and signed modifications to the original plans.

A former corps commander in Los Angeles at the time has said, however, that he was unaware of the changes in the energy island project. A corps official also said the agency has not been able to find written records that show the port officially notified the corps of the shift in uses or that the corps OKd such changes.

After Otero dismissed the case, U.S. Department of Justice attorneys notified the court in late August that they were concerned that the lawsuit was not decided on the merits.

They stated in court papers that Mosler's failure to obtain counsel did not extinguish the federal government's right to intervene in the case in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0081272

Because federal funds were allocated to the terminal project, the U.S. government has a right to recover damages should they be awarded in Mosler's case. The Justice Department has yet to intervene.

Bankruptcy Filings Drop After Changes In Law (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The ranks of people seeking to erase their debts have thinned in the year since the biggest changes in U.S. bankruptcy laws in a quarter-century took effect.

At a public session at the U.S. trustee's office in Alexandria, Va., on a recent morning, only about half the 50 or so chairs were occupied in a room that used to be jammed with anxious people and their attorneys.

Most were there seeking to file under Chapter 7 of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code, which wipes the debt slate clean after certain assets are forfeited.

After an eight-year campaign by banks, retailers and credit card companies, Congress changed the law to require for the first time an income-based test for measuring a debtor's ability to repay obligations. The new law took effect Oct. 17, 2005.

Those deemed to have insufficient assets or income can still file a Chapter 7 bankruptcy. But those with income above their state's median who can pay at least $6,000 over five years are forced into Chapter 13, in which a debt repayment plan is ordered.

In Virginia, where the median annual income is $43,000, more cases are ending up in the latter category.

"It's designed to make life miserable for anybody who owes money," said Lawrence Brooke, an attorney in Alexandria. "It's a help-the-banks, squish-the-little-guy law."

Brooke is one of several lawyers in northern Virginia who have abandoned consumer bankruptcy work since the new law took effect.

"I won't have anything to do with it," he said.

Brooke said the paperwork hurdles for debtors to qualify for Chapter 7 have become insurmountable for many, and the workload and aggravation for attorneys have increased.

The income test for Chapter 7 means more forms for people to give their lawyers — tax returns and pay stubs — and more questions from a bankruptcy trustee in the mandatory public sessions that already had probed into details of a person's mortgage, bills, life insurance, child support obligations and car payments.

"It's a whole different game now," said Gordon Peyton, one of the trustees in Alexandria. "It's much harder to file bankruptcy now."

There were 263,660 personal bankruptcies filed nationwide in the first half of this year, down from 851,683 in the first six months of 2005 and 809,867 in the same period in 2004, according to the American Bankruptcy Institute, an organization of bankruptcy judges and lawyers.

Chapter 7 filings accounted for 58.8% of this year's first-half total, down from 75.8% in the first half of 2005. Filings under Chapter 13 debt reorganization jumped to 41.1% from 24.1% a year earlier.

Peyton, who used to preside over three or four of the so-called Section 341 sessions on the Thursdays it was his turn, says he now holds only two. His one-on-one interviews of the people filing, who sit across from him at a table after raising their right hand and being sworn in, can take 12 minutes or more — compared with an average of 35 seconds or so before the law took effect, he said.

"It's gotten so tricky. There are a lot of pitfalls," said Peyton, a private attorney appointed as a bankruptcy trustee.

Bankruptcy lawyers say the required changes have meant more work for them, and they are charging clients more. Fees in some cases in northern Virginia have jumped from $750 or $1,000 to $1,500 or more.

In addition, under the new law people seeking bankruptcy protection are required to take credit counseling courses, for which they must pay. "It really does price a lot of people out of the market," said Nora Raum, a lawyer in Arlington, Va.

The American Bankers Assn. disputes that, noting that the bankruptcy law allows courts to waive filing and credit counseling fees for low-income debtors.

Proponents of the law say it has created a more balanced system that eliminates abuse and provides debt relief at the level at which people truly need it. They argue that bankruptcy frequently has been the last refuge of gamblers, impulsive shoppers, divorced or separated fathers avoiding child support, and even multimillionaires.

But some experts predict that bankruptcy filings will eventually rebound. There was a huge rush of filings by financially strained consumers between the enactment of the legislation in April last year and the Oct. 17 deadline for the new means test and other requirements. Personal bankruptcies soared 30% to a record high last year, surpassing 2 million for the first time at 2,039,214.

Then came the precipitous drop.

Filings "will come back," said John Hartgen, spokesman for the American Bankruptcy Institute. After the shakeout period, with the underlying causes of indebtedness, such as job layoffs, still prevailing, equilibrium should return, he said.

Air America, Home Of Liberal Talk, Files For Bankruptcy Protection (NYT)

By Jeff Leeds

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 13 — Air America Radio, the liberal talk network started two years ago in a bid to counter the influence of conservative radio personalities like Rush Limbaugh, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection on Friday.

The network and its corporate parent, Piquant LLC, filed after an owner of stations that carried Air America programming took legal action to freeze its bank accounts as part of a dispute over unpaid bills. Last month the network's backers said they would no longer provide cash to subsidize its operating losses, according to an affidavit filed by Air America in connection with the bankruptcy.

United States Bankruptcy Court Judge Robert Drain approved motions on Friday that will let the company continue to pay salaries and remain on the air. The judge also approved a loan of $900,000 from Democracy Allies, an entity formed by current investors in the network, including Rob Glaser, chief executive of the media and entertainment company RealNetworks. Its full proposed loan of $2.6 million is to be considered at a later hearing, said Tracy Klestadt, a lawyer representing Air America.

Mr. Glaser, who has been perhaps the network's biggest champion, had no comment on the filing, a spokesman said. He is also the company's largest secured creditor and is owed $9.8 million, according to bankruptcy court filings.

Air America, whose broadcast talent includes the comedian Al Franken, has struggled financially since it went on the air in the spring of 2004. According to court papers, the company lost $8.6 million in 2004 and $19.6 million last year, and has lost $13.1 million so far in 2006.

Scott Elberg, who became the network's chief executive on Monday, said in a statement, "Nobody likes filing for bankruptcy; however, this move will enable us to concentrate on informing and entertaining our audience during the coming months."

The longtime music industry executive Danny Goldberg stepped down as chief executive in April, after serving for about a year.

The executive shuffle, which has also included the departure of the company's president and its chief operating officer in recent months, is but one sign of the turbulence that has kept Air America off balance almost from the start.

Rumors of a bankruptcy filing had surfaced last month, though the company dismissed them at the time. Friday's filing, people with knowledge of Air America's business affairs said, was prompted when a radio station owner that carried Air America programming, Multicultural Radio, restricted its accounts last month after the network failed to pay $550,000 due under a previous settlement agreement. In 2004, a few weeks after Air America went on the air, Multicultural pulled the network's programming off stations in Los Angeles and Chicago, in a battle over payments for airtime, and the two sides have butted heads repeatedly since.

While the network's future appeared uncertain, industry executives were quick to deny any suggestion that the filing reflected lack of listener interest in the so-called progressive talk format. Air America says its programming is carried on 92 stations nationwide and reaches 2.4 million listeners a week.

"Whatever happens with Air America, the format is here to stay," said Amy Bolton, vice president and general manager of talk programming for Jones Radio, which syndicates programs by left-leaning hosts like Ed Schultz and Stephanie Miller. Ms. Bolton noted that Mr. Schultz's program had achieved big ratings increases on stations in San Diego, Albuquerque and Miami.

Jones, working with the radio giant Clear Channel Communications and an advocacy organization led by the former Clinton administration official John Podesta, this week started a national competition to identify new radio talent for the format. While certain progressive stations have achieved ratings success, Ms. Bolton noted, the format as a whole still lacks the roster of popular hosts that lead the conservative presence on radio.

The biggest of them, Mr. Limbaugh, said on the air yesterday that Air America's money woes did not surprise him.

"It was doomed to fail," Mr. Limbaugh said, according to news wire reports. "They were not a broadcasting concern to begin with. ... They went into business to affect elections."

Air America's Parent Files For Chapter 11 (WSJ)

By Sarah Mcbride

DOJ_NMG_0081274

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

The parent company of Air America Radio, the liberal radio network founded two years ago and home to personalities such as Al Franken, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection.

Piquant LLC ran into its latest setback when onetime partner Multicultural Radio Broadcasting Inc., which is owed about $550,000, had Piquant's bank account frozen at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., exacerbating an already difficult financial position.

"Nobody likes filing for bankruptcy; however, this move will enable us to concentrate on informing and entertaining our audience during the coming months," said Scott Elberg, Piquant's chief executive, in a statement.

The filing will give the company financial breathing room, helping it to reorganize and negotiate better terms with creditors.

The company said it had assets of $7.8 million, and short-term liabilities of $19.8 million. A number of individuals have invested in the company, including RealNetworks Inc. CEO Rob Glaser, who is the company's largest secured creditor with $9.8 million in claims. Other claimants include Citigroup Inc.'s Citibank, with $2.5 million in unsecured claims, and Clear Channel Communications Inc., with $558,333 in unsecured claims.

Air America's programming remains on the air at about 90 affiliates around the country. A distribution agreement with Clear Channel Communications accounts for 24 of those affiliates through its "Progressive Talk" network of stations.

Launched as a counterpart to conservative talk shows, Air America hasn't taken off in a big way, in part because of difficulty finding strong host stations in many cities.

Air America Files For Bankruptcy, Will Stay On The Air (WT/AP)

By Seth Sutel, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

NEW YORK -- Air America Radio, the liberal talk and news radio network that features comedian Al Franken, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection yesterday but will stay on air as it reorganizes with funding from its investor group.

The network had denied rumors a month ago that it would file for bankruptcy protection.

Air America spokeswoman Jaime Horn told the Associated Press that the filing became necessary only recently, after negotiations with a creditor from the privately held company's early days broke down.

The filing and a shuffle of the network's executives marked the latest turbulence at Air America, which has struggled financially since going on air two years ago. In April, Danny Goldberg stepped down as chief executive officer and was replaced by an interim chief executive from a management consulting firm.

"Nobody likes filing for bankruptcy," said Scott Elberg, who yesterday was appointed CEO of the network. "However, this move will enable us to concentrate on informing and entertaining our audience during the coming months."

Air America has struggled financially since its inception. Documents filed with the bankruptcy court show that the company lost $9.1 million in 2004, $19.6 million in 2005 and $13.1 million so far in 2006.

Air America owes Mr. Franken $360,750, according to the court documents. Mr. Franken was traveling and unavailable to comment but would do so Monday, Miss Horn said.

The network also features shows from liberal talk-show host Randi Rhodes and syndicated shows from Jerry Springer and Portland, Ore.-based talk-show host Thom Hartmann.

Miss Horn declined to name the creditor that negotiations broke down with, but the company had tussled earlier with a business partner, MultiCultural Radio Broadcasting Inc., which is also a creditor to Air America's parent company, Piquant LLC.

The network will operate in the interim with funding from Democracy Alliance LLC, its investor group, which includes RealNetworks Inc. CEO Robert Glaser.

Mr. Glaser had formerly served as chairman of Air America and owns 36.7 percent of the company. He is also owed $9.8 million, according to documents filed yesterday with U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York.

Mr. Glaser resigned as a director of Piquant effective yesterday morning, said Tracy Klestadt of Klestadt & Winters LLP, which represents Piquant.

The new CEO, Mr. Elberg, who had worked at WKTU and also was a former general manager of the radio station WLIB in New York, has been with the network since May 2005.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Department Sues Philadelphia Over Voting Rights (AP)

AP, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — The U.S. Department of Justice announced Friday that it had filed a lawsuit against the city of Philadelphia alleging violations of the rights of Hispanic and Spanish-speaking voters.

The complaint filed in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania alleges that the city failed to provide Spanish-language assistance at the polls to most Spanish-speaking voters in recent elections, the department said.

Federal authorities also said the city prevented Spanish-speaking voters from receiving assistance from people of their choice, even in cases where bilingual assistance was otherwise unavailable.

Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division, said in a statement that federal officials hope to reach agreement with city officials quickly "to begin essential remedial measures in time for the 2006 federal elections."

City representatives did not immediately return a message left at an after-hours number on Friday.

Justice Department To Help Troubled Clarksville Police Department (AP)

AP, October 12, 2006

CLARKSVILLE, Tenn.- With 12 discrimination lawsuits filed against the Clarksville Police Department, the mayor has asked a federal official for some help.

Walter Atkinson, who works for U.S. Department of Justice's Community Relations Service, will lead a group of citizens and officials to survey the police department and come up with suggestions to help solve its problems. The group will not investigate the specific lawsuits against the city.

"This is going to be as much a PR push" as an information-gathering process, said group member David Shelton, of the Clarksville Human Relations Commission.

Mayor Don Trotter said it should take several months before recommendations for the department are finalized.

The meetings, which will include interviews with police officers, are closed to the public, but the recommendations will be "very, very public," Shelton said.

The group began meeting Sept. 22. Its most recent meeting was on Wednesday.

Discrimination lawsuits have cost the city more than $300,000 in legal expenses thus far. A majority of the suits allege racial discrimination, but at least one female officer has sued claiming gender and age discrimination.

Two cases have been settled out of court for $265,000, three cases were lost in federal court on appeal, one case was dismissed, and six cases still are pending.

The city negotiated a retirement package for Police Chief Mark Smith earlier this year after nine of the lawsuits had been filed.

Feds, Centier Settle Redlining Allegations (NINT)

By BRIAN WILLIAMS And MARK FITTON, Times Staff Writers

Northwest (IN) Times, October 14, 2006

LAKE COUNTY: Bank will invest $4.3 million in minority lending efforts

The federal government and Whiting-based Centier Bank have reached a $4.3 million agreement to settle allegations the bank engaged in redlining, or discriminating on the basis of race or national origin.

The Justice Department alleged Centier violated the Fair Housing Act and Equal Credit Opportunity Act by unlawfully failing to equally market and provide products and services to predominantly black and Hispanic neighborhoods in Gary, East Chicago and Hammond.

Although it acknowledged its settlement with the government, the locally owned bank "strongly denies any suggestion that it has previously excluded minority communities from its banking efforts," Centier said in a news release.

However, the release said, Centier management feels "equally strongly about its desire to provide significantly enhanced services to residents and businesses in minority neighborhoods."

Centier President and CEO Michael Schrage told The Times the bank was surprised by the Justice Department's action and still does not agree with the allegations, but decided to enter into the agreement to avoid the delays and costs of litigation.

Characterizing the negotiations with the Justice Department as "amiable," Schrage said the Justice Department action had made Centier "more diligent in reaching out to underserved areas."

The agreement would accelerate the bank's plans for expansion into the area in a three-year period rather than five, he said.

The consent decree filed in federal court in Hammond will prohibit Centier from discriminating on the basis of race, color or national origin in any aspect of residential real estate or credit transaction, according to the Justice Department. Once approved by the court, the agreement will resolve the allegations.

Under the settlement, the government said, Centier will:

-- Open new offices and expand existing operations in previously excluded areas.

-- Invest $3.5 million in a special financing program.

-- Spend at least $875,000 for consumer financial education, outreach and promotion in previously excluded areas.

Schrage said the bank will expand the size of its East Chicago branch office and will add two new branches in Gary in the next two years under the terms of the agreement.

In addition to physical expansion, the East Chicago branch will have a full-time loan officer and a full-time Hispanic lender within six to nine months, Schrage said. The Indianapolis Boulevard location will add a conference room, which will be available to community aid organizations, and a second office.

In Gary, a second, full-service branch is expected to open within nine months. Schrage anticipates it being on Broadway, but said a location hasn't been finalized. A third Gary branch is planned for opening in 2008, he said.

No new locations were on the drawing board for Hammond, he said.

The Justice Department said the bank fully cooperated with its investigation into lending practices and agreed to settle the matter without litigation. Wan J. Kim, an assistant attorney general in the civil rights division, commended Centier for its cooperation.

Centier also cited statements of appreciation and support from Habitat for Humanity of Lake County, Neighborhoods Inc. and the Urban League of Northwest Indiana.

The allegation

The government claimed Centier unlawfully failed to equally market and provide products and services to predominantly black and Hispanic neighborhoods in Gary, East Chicago and Hammond.

The response

Centier President and CEO Michael Schrage said Centier does not agree with the allegations, but came to terms with the government and will accelerate its efforts to invest in and reach out to minority communities.

The terms

Centier will open new offices and expand existing operations in previously excluded areas; invest $3.5 million in a special financing program; spend at least $875,000 for consumer financial education, outreach and promotion in previously excluded areas.

Attorney General Looked To For Help (BRAH)

By Melanie Marquez

The Bradenton Herald, October 14, 2006

BRADENTON - A beating months ago that led to the death of a 72-year-old man has the Bradenton police chief looking to the attorney general of the United States for help, calling the chief law officer in the country the "last hope" for justice.

After review of the case, the state attorney's office for the 12th Judicial Circuit declined to prosecute Jamaal Lambert, 25, in the death of James Ervin Barfield, saying Lambert was acting in self-defense when he beat Barfield during an argument on May 10 near a downtown apartment building Barfield owned.

Barfield was taken to Manatee Memorial Hospital where he died two weeks later.

Police Chief Michael Radzilowski wants Lambert prosecuted for the death, which was ruled a homicide by the medical examiner's office, and he's calling the state attorney's decision not to prosecute an error.

In a letter Radzilowski sent to the U.S. Department of Justice on Monday, he asks Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to review the case for "possible prosecution of any criminal or civil right violation."

As of Friday afternoon, there was "nothing open in the civil rights division," said Cynthia Magnuson, spokeswoman for the Justice Department.

The fight between Barfield and Lambert happened in the 1300 block of Third Avenue West, where Lambert's girlfriend rented a unit from Barfield. Lambert was staying there while his girlfriend was in jail, according to his arrest report.

Barfield was visiting a tenant, a 35-year-old woman he was romantically involved with, according to the review by the state attorney's office.

DOJ_NMG_0081277

Barfield was intoxicated and started yelling obscenities and racial slurs at Lambert before threatening to get a gun, according to the report. He drove away from the scene after Lambert had smacked him several times to the ground. Barfield drove to the Bradenton Police Department to report the incident and officers used the Baker Act to admit Barfield to the hospital.

The medical examiner's office ruled Barfield's death a homicide, caused by a beating, according to police officials.

In its decline statement, the state attorney's office said Barfield had the onset of cirrhosis of the liver and later developing pneumonia, which they referred to as "the direct cause of death."

Police contend Lambert was the aggressor and should have been charged with manslaughter.

Judge Orders Jail Explanation (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, October 14, 2006

GULFPORT - A federal judge has ordered the Harrison County jail to explain what it is doing to hire more corrections officers.

The order, filed Thursday by U.S. District Judge Walter J. Gex III, addresses a lingering issue of staffing problems at the Harrison County Adult Detention Center. The last time the judge questioned the jail's staffing level via court order was in 2003, when the officer-to-inmate ratio was 1-to-10. The U.S. Justice Department, which has oversight to monitor improvements at the jail, recommends a ratio of 1-to-5.

The ratio is about the same today as it was in 2003. The jail needs to hire about 65 additional corrections officers. It has about 100 jailers to oversee 950 to 1,000 inmates.

Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. on Friday said his new warden has "a good plan of action" for hiring and he believes it will meet with approval. Payne said he has beefed up advertising to include television commercials featuring Don Cabana, appointed warden two months ago.

"We're having the same problem with hiring that many South Mississippi employers have faced since Hurricane Katrina," Payne said.

The court order gives the jail until Oct. 26 to provide a supplementary report to answer questions on staffing issues. The report is in addition to the quarterly report the jail is required to submit to the Justice Department.

Payne said staffing levels were up until the hurricane struck.

However, issues surrounding the fatal beating of inmate Jessie Lee Williams Jr. in February also have affected manpower and morale, Cabana said after his appointment two months ago. Two former jailers face criminal prosecution in the Williams case and a related civil lawsuit is pending.

Payne said he hired Cabana to bring about positive changes and he believes he is seeing results.

Seven corrections officers have been hired in the past couple of weeks, according to the latest personnel report approved by county supervisors.

Starting pay for entry-level corrections officers is about $10.40 per hour.

Pay is a potential drawback, said Cy Faneca, the sheriff's attorney.

"It's a dangerous job for not a lot of money," Faneca said.

Gex's order asks for details on plans to fill vacant jailer positions and the number of applications received, applicants interviewed and those hired.

Gex is the judge who signed the 1995 court order requiring the jail make improvements in inmate rights, jail conditions, medical care, security, training, staffing and other issues. The consent agreement came after U.S. Attorney Janet Reno in 1993 filed a complaint condemning how the Harrison County jail treated inmates and various related issues.

Students Arrested In Third Day Of Protest At College For The Deaf (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 13 — The authorities at Gallaudet University, the nation’s only liberal arts university for the deaf, moved on Friday to end a three-day siege by protesters by arresting the students opposing the board’s choice of the next president.

The campus police went into an area where about 100 protesters sat with arms interlocked, arresting them one by one and handing them over to Washington police officers who had blocked off the street along a side entrance to the university where the student protesters had gathered. As organizers had rehearsed in days leading up to the confrontation on Friday night, students went limp when arrested. They were then carried away by three or more officers.

Mark Goldstone, a lawyer for the protesters, said the police arrested about 60 students in two hours, and arrests continued late into the night.

"This is our school, not yours," one protester shouted from the back at the arresting officers while others demanded, in sign language, that the departing president of the university, I. King Jordan, appear before protesters.

"Go get the drug dealers," the protesters shouted at the police, "leave the students alone."

As night fell in the hours before the arrests began, students vowed to continue their protests.

"We're going to be here every day, over and over again, until she resigns," said Christopher Corrigan, a 19-year-old junior from Frederick Md., who was the first to be arrested.

The protesters are demanding the immediate resignation of Jane K. Fernandes, the former provost who was named last spring to succeed Dr. Jordan as president. Students have complained that the selection process was skewed and that Dr. Fernandes lacks leadership qualities. Dr. Fernandes met Friday with four protesters and Mr. Goldstone for more than an hour, but they found no resolution to the standoff that has paralyzed this university for a week.

Dr. Fernandes has said repeatedly that she will not resign, saying it would set a bad precedent, and the current president and the board have stood firmly behind her.

Mr. Goldstone said the protesters were adamant in their demand that Dr. Fernandes step down, and she was equally resolute in refusing to do so.

But students were also determined, even welcoming the prospect of arrest Friday, which one protester, Leala Holcomb, 19, from Freemont, Calif., said would demonstrate their commitment to the world beyond the campus. "We want to get arrested to show we are firm in our conviction," Ms. Holcomb said, adding, "It is a pretty loud statement."

Gallaudet Rally Broken Up (WT)

By Matthew Cella, Gary Emerling And Katie Nichols, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

Police last night arrested dozens of student demonstrators who had blocked the gates of Gallaudet University's Northeast campus for three days in protest of the administration's choice for university president.

The students were uncooperative but peaceful -- forming human chains and forcing campus police and Metropolitan Police officers to separate them, lift them and drag them to a waiting fleet of vans.

The crowd jeered and howled as each student was carried off. By late last night, police had arrested about 90 protesters.

Police first said the students would be transferred to the department's training academy in Southeast and charged with unlawful assembly, which carries a maximum penalty of 90 days in jail and a $250 fine.

Later, officials said the charge would be incommoding -- a lesser infraction for which students could pay a $50 fine and be released or schedule a court appearance.

The arrests were made at a side entrance to the campus on Sixth Street Northeast and began at about 8:50 p.m., almost two hours after police and university officials issued a final warning to the demonstrators to disperse.

"I deeply regret being forced to take this action," said outgoing school President I. King Jordan. "I realize it may lead to arrests, but the protesters have left me no choice. Gallaudet University has exhausted all means of communication in negotiating with those who have disrupted the university's educational processes and held the campus hostage to their demands."

Mr. Jordan issued the final warning at about 7 p.m., after an hour of negotiations between student leaders and incoming President Jane K. Fernandes. Mrs. Fernandes briefly went out among the protesters in front of the main gate of the campus on Florida Avenue Northeast at about 2 p.m. She invited student leaders to meet and discuss their issues, while asking them to reconsider their protest. Neither side budged.

Students opposed to Mrs. Fernandes' appointment as president first took over Hall Memorial Building last week to demand that she resign. Early Wednesday, the protesters barricaded the six entrances of the campus, which includes a nursery, and elementary, middle and high schools.

Mrs. Fernandes, who was named president in May, will officially replace Mr. Jordan in January.

Shortly before officials issued the warning, police took position around the Sixth Street campus gate. Students had agreed to lift a barricade of the side entrance late Thursday, then reneged. The protests will be allowed to continue at the school's other gates.

Welders removed one of the gates as police and students watched.

Meloyde Batten-Mickens, executive director of facilities and chief of the school's department of public safety, asked protesters not to block access to the school's gates and said the requests were "non-negotiable." She said those who interfered would be subject to arrests, criminal prosecution and expulsion.

Assistant Chief Gerald Wilson of the Metropolitan Police Department also addressed the students.

"The Metropolitan Police Department has gone to great lengths not to take sides in this issue," he said, advising the students on what they should expect.

Police issued several formal warnings before making the arrests and told protesters that those who did not resist would not be handcuffed. Handcuffing deaf people has been criticized because doing so takes away their only method of communicating.

Many of the 200 students who had formed the core of the protest group made their way from the front gate of the university to the side gate when it became apparent that the arrests would take place there.

Some shouted "arrest me" as police awaited the arrival of a light truck deployed to illuminate the area and ensure that the students would be able to understand the warnings given by sign-language interpreters.

Some students were defiant.

"I just want to see the best for Gallaudet," said Justin Jackerson, 19, through a sign-language interpreter. "I want to do this for Gallaudet. I know that I will not be alone."

Administrators canceled classes for the three days of the protest rather than call in police. Earlier yesterday, university officials said that arrests would be a last resort.

"We have to understand that inside the deaf community and the Gallaudet community [arrests] would be the saddest thing that could happen, and it would take a really, really long time to recover from that," university spokeswoman Mercy Coogan said.

Earlier yesterday, some students said they were anxious for classes to resume.

"I'm frustrated with the protests," said Jessica Loughran, 20, an international student in her third semester. "I know it's good for people to support, but I want my education."

After the Board of Trustees at Gallaudet, the country's largest school for the deaf, selected Mrs. Fernandes as its next president in May, protests followed until summer break, including objections from 67 percent of the faculty.

The protesters said there was a lack of diversity among the finalists in the selection process. Mrs. Fernandes, who is deaf, said some people think she is not deaf enough.

Gallaudet students engaged in similar arguments and protests in 1988, until a president-elect resigned and the board hired Mr. Jordan, who became the first deaf president at the 142-year-old university.

Gay Marriage Losing Punch As Ballot Issue (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

DENVER, Oct. 13 — The debate over same-sex marriage was a black-or-white proposition two years ago when voters in 11 states barred gay couples from marrying.

But this year shades of gray are everywhere, as eight more states consider similar ballot measures. Some of the proposed bans are struggling in the polls, and the issue of same-sex marriage itself has largely failed to rouse conservative voters.

In some cases, other issues, like the war in Iraq and ethics in Washington, have seized voters' attention. But the biggest change, people on both sides of the issue say, is that supporters of same-sex marriage this year are likely to be as mobilized as the opponents.

The social conservatives, who focused on marriage in 2004 and helped President Bush gain re-election in some hard-fought states in the Midwest, have been offset by equally committed and organized opposition. Slick advertising, paid staff and get-out-the-vote drives have become a two-way street.

"The opponents of these measures have had a lot more time to organize and fund their efforts; that has made for a bit of a different complexion," said Julaine K. Appling, the executive director of the Family Research Institute of Wisconsin, which supports a constitutional amendment in that state defining marriage as between a man and a woman.

Proposals like Wisconsin's are also on the ballot in Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee and Virginia. And while most of the measures are expected to pass, their emotional force in drawing committed, conservative voters to the polls, many political experts say, has been muted or spent.

Recent polls in Arizona, Colorado, Virginia and Wisconsin, for example, have suggested only narrow majorities in support, in contrast to the 60 to 70 percent or more majorities in most states that voted on the issue in 2004. Two recent polls in South Dakota suggested that the same-sex marriage amendment might actually lose, while a third said it seemed likely to pass.

"As it stands right now, conservative turnout is not going to be as strong as it has traditionally been," said Jon Paul, the executive director of Coloradans for Marriage, which is supporting a ballot measure that would ban same-sex marriage.

Some pollsters say people might just be burned out on the subject of marriage and its boundaries.

"It doesn't seem to be salient to what most Tennesseans are concerned about right now," said Robert Wyatt, the associate director of the Middle Tennessee State University poll. The ballot proposal there will almost certainly pass, Dr. Wyatt said, but few people think it will drive turnout or swing the tight race for the Senate between Bob Corker, a Republican, and Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat. Both candidates support a ban on same-sex marriage.

Dr. Wyatt said efforts to stir enthusiasm among conservatives have mostly fallen flat.

"It's one of those things that's like preaching to the choir," he said.

The momentum against same-sex marriage at the ballot box has also been hurt by court cases that have upheld bans on same-sex marriage — notably rulings by the highest courts in New York and Washington this summer — by removing some of the urgency for constitutional amendments.

Here in Colorado, the debate has been complicated by the presence of two ballot measures on the subject that in essence work in opposite directions. One measure would add a ban on same-sex marriage to the Constitution, and the other would create a framework of legal rights for same-sex couples in civil unions.

Scholars who track gender-law issues say that gay rights groups and their allies have worked hard since the last election to create a middle-ground position on the question of partnership rights that could appeal to voters who might not vote for same-sex marriage.

The position, which has been repeated like a mantra across Colorado this year by advocates for the civil union proposal, holds that civil unions are not marriage and that if voters want to hold marriage apart as a separate institution for heterosexuals, that would be fine. But it is only fair and just, they say, that couples in other types of relationships have legal protections, too.

Opponents of the civil union bill say that the moderation line is a smokescreen and that same-sex marriage in Colorado will become a reality in fact, if not in name, if the civil union proposition is approved.

"It is nothing short of Orwellian doublespeak to say it is not marriage," State Representative Kevin Lundberg, a Republican from eastern Colorado, said at a recent forum in Denver on the ballot proposals.

Political analysts suggest that just like patrons perusing an old-fashioned Chinese restaurant menu, voters in Colorado considering the two measures might take one from Column A and one from Column B. Some people say they plan to do just that.

Joel Sidell and Dona Maloy — longtime unmarried partners who live in the Denver area — show how the lines have fractured. Mr. Sidell, 62, a retired police officer and a Republican, said he would probably vote for the ban on same-sex marriage and against civil unions.

"To me, it still does not seem right for a woman to be able to marry a woman and a male to marry a male," Mr. Sidell said. "I don't think it's the sanctity of the term. It just doesn't seem proper."

Ms. Maloy, 61, is a Democrat who said she planned to vote the opposite of her partner — no on the marriage amendment and yes to benefits for same-sex partners.

"I think that marriage is a personal thing; at least it is for me," she said. "Legally, I don't see why people can't all have the same rights."

The two major party candidates for governor in Colorado have also taken opposite sides on the marriage-civil union debate. The Democrat, Bill Ritter, has said he will vote for civil unions and against the constitutional amendment, while the Republican, Representative Bob Beauprez, has said he plans to vote against civil unions and for the same-sex marriage ban. Pollsters say those positions do not appear to be swaying the race, which Mr. Ritter has led by 10 to 15 percentage points in recent polls.

Tangled legal questions over parental rights, health care decisions and employer benefits have emerged in some states where efforts to ban same-sex marriage and civil unions were successful in the past, complicating calculations about how the bans play out in real life. The case of Lisa Miller and Janet Jenkins is one example.

Ms. Miller and Ms. Jenkins were joined in a civil ceremony in 2000 in Vermont, which allows same-sex contracts. Ms. Miller had a baby in 2002 through artificial insemination, and they raised the child together. Now they have separated, and both Vermont and Virginia, which does not recognize the validity of Vermont's civil union system, have claimed jurisdiction over the question of child custody.

Legal experts say the case is probably headed for the Supreme Court. In the meantime, Virginia's same-sex marriage ballot proposal would define marriage as between a man and a woman and also put into the Constitution the legal language at the heart of the custody battle: that civil unions formed in other states are invalid in Virginia.

That prohibition on civil unions is even too far-reaching for some opponents of same-sex marriage, said Larry J. Sabato, director of the University of Virginia Center for Politics.

"It's so sweeping, it's giving some people pause," Mr. Sabato said.

Meanwhile, gay men and lesbians continue to come out in ever greater numbers, especially in some of the states that will be voting on the marriage issue next month.

From 2000 to 2005, the number of people identifying themselves in Census surveys as being in a same-sex couple grew by 30 percent, to about 770,000, according to a study released this week by the Williams Institute at the University of California, Los Angeles, which tracks and researches gay legal issues.

Of the eight states with ballot measures, the study found that six had growth rates higher than the national average, led by Wisconsin, up 81 percent; Colorado, up 58 percent; Virginia, up 43 percent; and South Carolina, up 39 percent.

Conservatives like Mr. Paul of the Colorado marriage group say the low-key tenor of the same-sex marriage debate could change in a thunderclap if a court decision that appears to undermine traditional marriage boundaries is handed down before the election. The New Jersey Supreme Court has a case pending and could issue a decision before Election Day.

Ban's Foes To Run Ad Across Va. (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

An organization that opposes a ballot measure that would constitutionally ban same-sex marriage in Virginia is buying a TV commercial to run statewide, marking an intensifying effort to defeat the amendment.

The 30-second ad, which will begin appearing throughout the state today on CNN, shows an image of Virginia's 230-year-old Bill of Rights slowly being engulfed in flames. A narrator warns gravely that the amendment would "destroy" the spirit of the state's Bill of Rights, which served as the model for the U.S. Bill of Rights. A second ad will appear next week, officials said.

Sponsored by the Commonwealth Coalition, a group organized to defeat the amendment, the ad goes on to frame the organization's central argument against the amendment: Because of the wording, the measure will erode the rights of all unwed couples, including heterosexuals.

"Read all of Ballot Question One closely," the male narrator says. "Every unmarried couple could lose their rights. Like guardianship rights. And inheritance rights. . . . It goes way too far."

Proponents disagree, saying the ballot measure would ban only same-sex marriage and civil unions in Virginia. They have pointed out that there have not been cases of unwed couples losing such rights in any state that has passed similarly worded measures.

"We would have hoped that their TV ads would have answered the real question Virginians are being asked -- how should marriage be defined," said Victoria Cobb, executive director of the Family Foundation, a group that has helped organize support for the measure. "This is just another misleading campaign ad, and I don't believe Virginians will fall for it."

The ad's release three weeks before Election Day, Nov. 7, illustrates an expected scramble by both campaigns to sway voters on the issue. Cobb said the Family Foundation plans to run statewide radio commercials beginning two weeks before Election Day.

Dyana Mason, field director for the Commonwealth Coalition, said that it was unclear how long the opposition ad, which will cost the group $10,000 a day to broadcast, would air.

ANTITRUST:

AT&T-BellSouth Vote Is Delayed (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press

AP, October 14, 2006

FCC allows time to study concessions

WASHINGTON – The Federal Communications Commission has delayed a vote on the proposed buyout of BellSouth by AT&T until Nov. 3 at the latest after two Democrats asked for time to study last-minute concessions offered by the companies.

The commission was scheduled to vote on the $80.8 billion deal in a special meeting yesterday that never convened.

Commissioners Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein circulated a letter among reporters that said in the previous 48 hours, new proposals had been made regarding the buyout that raised “a number of significant questions and complex technical issues for us to consider.”

They asked that the proposals, which were offered by the companies through Chairman Kevin Martin's office, be made available to the public.

Martin responded in a letter, agreeing to make the proposals available for public comment for 10 days, and set a commission meeting for Nov. 3, though the vote may come sooner and may not require a public meeting. Martin is traveling to China today.

DOJ_NMG_0081282

The proposed deal already was under fire by consumer advocates and some lawmakers, who said it would go a long way toward re-establishing a communications monopoly that the government broke up more than two decades ago.

AT&T released a statement yesterday saying the company would discuss adding conditions to the deal “so long as they do not affect our ability to deliver merger benefits to customers and shareowners, given the intensely competitive environment in which we operate.”

The Justice Department approved the sale without requiring any divestment or other conditions on Wednesday. Despite the scale of the purchase, the Justice Department found no potentially adverse effects on competition.

Adelstein called the decision “a reckless abandonment of DoJ's responsibility to protect competition and consumers.”

Since the Justice Department's announcement, Martin and his staff had been working with AT&T to craft a compromise that would satisfy the two Democrats. AT&T's proposed concessions were made available for public inspection last night.

For the first 30 months following the merger, the company is offering a number of consumer-friendly items, including free digital subscriber line, or DSL, modems to customers who want to upgrade from dial-up service, and $10-per-month DSL service.

AT&T also offered to donate $1 million to foundations that promote public safety and put forth a number of guarantees promising to limit charges for companies that use other parts of its network.

The FCC's approval would have removed the final major regulatory hurdle in AT&T's bid to extend its dominance as the nation's largest provider of phone, wireless and broadband Internet services.

When the deal was announced in March, it was worth about $67 billion. But the rising price of AT&T's stock pushed the value to $80.8 billion.

FCC Delays Its Vote On BellSouth AT&T Discusses Protections Wanted By Consumer Groups (AJC)

By Marilyn Geewax, Cox Washington Bureau

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 14, 2006

Washington — AT&T Inc.'s proposed purchase of BellSouth Corp. was delayed Friday when federal regulators postponed a vote amid calls to attach consumer protections to the deal.

Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin ordered his staff to open another 10-day period for gathering public comments, and set a new meeting for Nov. 3.

Analysts said they still believed the deal would be approved. The debate, they said, is over what conditions the FCC will require.

Late in the day, AT&T disclosed a broad array of possible concessions it had discussed with the FCC, including the sale of stand-alone, high-speed Internet service for a limited period of time and the return of certain jobs that had been moved overseas.

Consumer groups have been pushing the FCC to require the new AT&T to:

> Let consumers subscribe to high-speed Internet service even if they don't have phone service with the company.

> Lease more lines to local phone and data service providers.

> Accept some restrictions against charging higher rates to online content providers who are not affiliated with them — also known as net neutrality protections.

"There is no need to rush this deal through," said Consumers Union spokeswoman Jeannine Kenney. She said the postponement will give the FCC time to have "a more open and transparent process" as they evaluate creation of what would be the nation's largest telecommunications company, with operations in 22 states.

'Reasonable conditions'

AT&T spokesman Michael Balmoris said in a statement that a delay "is not uncommon in these matters" and that the company believes the FCC soon will "complete its review, approve the merger and allow us to begin delivering the numerous benefits of the merger to consumers."

Balmoris said AT&T is willing to accept "reasonable conditions on the merger in order to obtain unanimous approval, so long as they do not affect our ability to deliver merger benefits to customers and share owners, given the intensely competitive environment in which we operate."

In a six-page letter to FCC Chairman Martin dated Friday, AT&T's senior vice president of federal regulatory affairs, Robert W. Quinn, listed a number of potential conditions that company officials had discussed in phone conversations with FCC officials on Thursday.

One would respond to a key demand of consumer groups: Let consumers in BellSouth's nine-state territory subscribe to high-speed Internet service without having to buy local phone service. The service would start within a year after the closing date of the merger and last for 2 1/2 years after the start date, the letter said.

Quinn's letter said net neutrality conditions had been discussed, as had the return to BellSouth territory of jobs that had been relocated to other countries. The number of jobs was not given, but BellSouth spokesman Jeff Battcher said the reference involved a "significant number" of customer service or technical support jobs now in India and elsewhere.

Martin, a Republican, has indicated he wants the acquisition to proceed with no strings attached.

But the two Democrats on the five-member commission, Jonathan Adelstein and Michael Copps, have been pushing hard to get consumer protections.

Shortly after noon Friday, more than an hour after the FCC meeting was to have begun, reporters were handed copies of a letter that Adelstein and Copps had written to Martin.

Long delay feared

The Democrats said the decision should be delayed because AT&T has made proposals in recent days that "raise a number of significant questions and complex technical issues for us to consider." They urged that the FCC "open this process to public comment."

Around 2 p.m., reporters were given a copy of Martin's reply. The chairman said he was willing to extend the comment period, but added that he hoped the Democrats would "avoid any further delay in our consideration of this transaction."

The two top members of Congress with jurisdiction over telecommunications matters, House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas) and Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) echoed Martin's concerns.

More than six months have passed since the merger application was filed in March, Barton and Stevens said in a joint statement, and the FCC "has conducted a thorough review."

"The commission has a responsibility to act expeditiously," they said.

The Democrats, although a minority on the five-member FCC, have an unusual amount of leverage in this case.

Martin is supported by a fellow Republican commissioner, Deborah Tate. Analysts believe the fifth commissioner, Robert McDowell, would also support his fellow Republicans.

But he has not been participating in the negotiations because of a potential conflict of interest. He previously worked as a lobbyist for Comptel, an association representing AT&T's competitors.

Competitors react

Comptel has urged the FCC to "protect consumers from the re-monopolization of the communications industry."

Also, NuVox Communications and XO Communications, two local phone companies that compete with AT&T, have filed an emergency motion with the FCC, urging disclosure of AT&T negotiations over conditions.

"The public has been denied the opportunity to counter AT&T's back-room advocacy," the companies said in a statement.

San Antonio-based AT&T needs only FCC approval to complete its $80.1 billion purchase of Atlanta-based BellSouth to create the nation's biggest telecommunications company. AT&T would also gain full ownership of Cingular Wireless LLC, the largest U.S. mobile-phone carrier, which it now owns jointly with BellSouth.

On Wednesday, the U.S. Justice Department signed off on the merger without conditions after concluding the deal would not hurt consumers. The deal has also won approval from each of the U.S. states with jurisdiction.

F.C.C. Delays Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Deal A Second Time (NYT)

By Ken Belson

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

The Federal Communications Commission delayed voting yesterday on AT&T's $80 billion takeover of BellSouth for the second time this week, because two commissioners declined to make a decision until public hearings were held.

AT&T and BellSouth have already won approval from their shareholders, state regulators and the Justice Department. The F.C.C. is the organization remaining that must endorse the deal.

On Wednesday, the Justice Department signed off on the purchase without imposing any conditions on the companies. That angered Michael J. Copps and Jonathan S. Adelstein — the two Democratic commissioners at the F.C.C. — who said more time was needed to assess how consumers and companies would be affected.

With their objections in mind, the commission rescheduled its vote on the merger to yesterday, from Thursday, to give the commissioners more time to negotiate. When they were unable to decide whether and what conditions to impose on the companies, yesterday's meeting was canceled and rescheduled for Nov. 3.

"Given the limited analysis from our leading antitrust authorities, it is all the more imperative that we now employ an open process to fully involve all affected parties, including the applicants, in order to get the public and expert review that is otherwise lacking," the Democratic commissioners wrote in a letter to the F.C.C. chairman, Kevin J. Martin.

DOJ_NMG_0081284

The negotiations are complicated further because one Republican commissioner, Robert M. McDowell, is expected to refrain from voting because of a potential conflict of interest. If he were allowed to vote, the Republicans would presumably be able to approve the merger faster because they would outnumber the Democrats, 3 to 2.

Industry analysts do not expect the commissioners to reject the merged company, which would be the primary local phone provider in 22 states. The company would also be the largest seller of telecommunications services to businesses and the owner of Cingular Wireless, the country's biggest cellphone provider.

The commissioners could suggest that the merged company sell broadband to customers as an individual product, not bundled with phone service, a commitment Verizon accepted when it bought MCI this year.

The F.C.C. could also require AT&T and BellSouth to sell some of their wireless spectrum and local phone and data lines to ease concerns that they have too big a share in certain markets. The F.C.C. could also impose conditions that would ban the companies from charging companies extra fees to gain priority access to their networks.

Michael Coe, an AT&T spokesman, said in a statement: "We are open to discussing with the Democratic F.C.C. commissioners reasonable conditions on the merger in order to obtain unanimous approval, so long as they do not affect our ability to deliver merger benefits to customers and shareowners, given the intensely competitive environment in which we operate."

The F.C.C.'s decision to put off voting on the deal initially sent both companies' stocks lower in trading yesterday. AT&T's shares finished unchanged at $33.60 while BellSouth's stock dipped 15 cents, to $44.13.

AT&T Makes Concessions On Merger (SAEN)

By L.A. Lorek, Express-News Business Writer

San Antonio Express-News, October 14, 2006

AT&T has agreed to make concessions to get unanimous Federal Communications Commission approval for its $80 billion merger with BellSouth.

Late Friday, the San Antonio-based company filed a six-page letter with the FCC saying it "would not object to the imposition of certain merger conditions" requested by the Democratic commissioners "in order to obtain expeditious unanimous approval of the merger."

The FCC delayed its meeting Friday on the proposed merger of AT&T and Atlanta-based BellSouth until Nov. 3 after the two Democratic commissioners, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, sent a letter to Chairman Kevin Martin saying they wanted more time to evaluate the deal.

"In the last 48 hours, new proposals were made for addressing the concerns raised in this proceeding," Copps and Adelstein told Martin. "These proposals raise a number of significant questions and complex issues for us to consider."

They recommended AT&T and BellSouth's new proposal be put up for public review. They also blasted the Justice Department for its "limited analysis" of the merger.

In response, Martin wrote a letter saying the FCC would give the commissioners 10 days to seek public comment on the proposed changes.

In its latest filing, AT&T agreed to provide $10 broadband service, called Digital Subscriber Line, or DSL, to new customers in its territory.

The company also pledged to provide 100 percent broadband access to its entire service area and to give free broadband modems to customers. It also offered a $1 million public safety grant to public entities in its coverage area.

In addition, AT&T discussed returning jobs from overseas to the BellSouth territory.

The company also mentioned network neutrality, or requiring AT&T to carry Internet traffic without charging customers more for different services or applications, according to the letter. AT&T didn't provide specifics on these issues in its letter.

AT&T, which has been working with Martin's office for the past few days to hammer out an agreement, ran out of time to gain final approval for the merger, which is not uncommon, said Mike Balmoris, company spokesman.

"We look forward to the Nov. 3 FCC meeting, when we expect the FCC to complete its review, approve the merger and allow us to begin delivering the numerous benefits of the merger to consumers," Balmoris said.

The Justice Department approved the merger without restrictions Wednesday.

Usually, the Justice Department is responsible for determining the competitiveness or anti-competitiveness of a merger, said Le Keough, an analyst with Frost Bank in Austin.

"It made it though the (Justice Department) with flying colors, but there seems to be some political hang-ups at the FCC," Keough said.

But Ben Silverman, telecom analyst with FindProfit.com in Princeton, N.J., said the deal isn't in danger.

"This is typical last-minute wrangling," Silverman said.

DOJ_NMG_0081285

Members of Congress and consumer groups have urged the FCC to wait until a federal court reviews two previous telecommunications mergers — the deal between AT&T and SBC Communications Corp. and the combination of Verizon Communications and MCI.

The merger of AT&T and BellSouth would create the nation's largest telecom company and consolidate Cingular Wireless, one of the nation's largest wireless providers.

The combined company would rejoin four of the Ma Bell companies created in 1984 when a court broke up AT&T over monopolistic concerns.

AT&T and BellSouth together would have more than 300,000 employees and revenue of $117 billion. The merger would also increase AT&T's service territory from 13 to 22 states — 18 of which have approved the merger.

AT&T's shares closed unchanged Friday at $33.60 and BellSouth's stock closed down 15 cents at $44.13.

FCC Puts Off Vote On Deal By AT&T (CHIT)

By Jon Van, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, October 14, 2006

Democrats get delay of BellSouth buyout

AT&T Inc.'s drive to win regulatory approval for its takeover of BellSouth Corp. stalled Friday as the Federal Communications Commission put off a decision on the matter until next month.

Acting earlier this week, the Justice Department approved the deal without condition, drawing harsh criticism from consumer advocates, some members of Congress and two FCC commissioners.

Those commissioners, Democrats Jonathan Adelstein and Michael Copps, sought a delay in FCC action on the case, arguing that AT&T's negotiations designed to win commission approval should be made public before a decision is made.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, who had advocated approving the merger without condition, accepted the Democrats' suggested delay and scheduled a meeting for Nov. 3 to consider the matter. Conditions on the deal needed to win the Democrats' support will be open for public discussion.

The stock transaction between AT&T and BellSouth is estimated to be worth about $80 billion and would give control of the nation's largest phone company and its largest wireless company to San Antonio-based AT&T, which was formerly SBC Communications Inc. before it took over AT&T last year.

A federal court review of two giant telecom mergers from last year—the SBC/AT&T deal and the takeover of MCI by Verizon Communications Inc.—is still pending. Judge Emmet Sullivan is considering evidence as to whether federal regulators gave those deals sufficient scrutiny to protect the public interest.

Senate and House leaders from both parties had asked the FCC and the Justice Department to delay their decisions on the AT&T/BellSouth deal until judicial review of last year's mergers was concluded. The antitrust division of the Justice Department ignored those requests, and the FCC appeared poised to do the same.

The FCC is controlled by three Republican commissioners, but its two Democrats have unusual influence on the AT&T matter because one Republican commissioner, Robert McDowell, is not participating in the decision. Before he was named to the FCC by President Bush, McDowell worked as a lobbyist for AT&T competitors who actively fought merger approval.

Democratic commissioners have asked for conditions to assure that AT&T will not use its increased market power in ways that harm consumers or competitors.

AT&T, which had pushed hard to get its merger approved this week, said it now expects approval next month. "We ran short of time to gain final approval," said Dave Pacholczyk, an AT&T spokesman, "which isn't uncommon in these matters. We look forward to the Nov. 3 FCC meeting."

Pacholczyk said his company believes the merger should be approved without conditions, but is open to discuss reasonable conditions that will win unanimous approval of the deal from regulators.

Analysts said they doubt that the FCC delay will prove a major obstacle to AT&T's deal, but that it was unexpected.

"This delay is a big surprise," said Jeff Kagan, an Atlanta-based telecom industry analyst. Kagan said he expects the deal will win approval, but with some conditions imposed.

"I think ultimately, it's not much more than a speed bump for AT&T," said David McCourt, chief executive of Granahan McCourt Capital LLC, a private investment firm specializing in telecom and media. "But I think that the Justice Department, acting so quickly, has injected more partisan politics into the matter than was necessary."

Microsoft To Tweak Vista For EU Agency (AP)

Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0081286

AP, October 14, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Microsoft Corp. is making several key changes to its coming Windows Vista operating system in an bid to soothe European antitrust worries, while keeping its worldwide distribution plans on schedule.

Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, said Friday that the company agreed to change how people can set their preferred search service if they upgrade to Microsoft's new Internet Explorer browser. The Redmond, Wash., company also has tweaked Vista's security system to address concerns it was favoring Microsoft's products over competing security offerings.

In addition, the company plans to have an international standards organization review a controversial new file format that will be included in Windows and the company's Office business suite. He said that was a step toward making the format available for other companies to license.

Even with the changes, which will be included in all versions the company ships worldwide, Microsoft said it plans deliver the long-delayed Vista to large businesses in November and consumers and small businesses in January.

The announcement follows many testy exchanges between Microsoft and European regulators, who remain embroiled in a long-running antitrust dispute over the current version of Windows.

But Smith told The Associated Press the changes announced Friday were the result of conversation, rather than litigation, between the two parties. EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes and Steve Ballmer, Microsoft's chief executive, spoke by phone Thursday.

The EU antitrust office, which this spring voiced concerns about the new Windows software, refused to back Microsoft's optimism that Europe's concerns had been met.

"The jury is out," a spokesman said.

Microsoft Makes Vista Changes (SEATIMES)

By Benjamin J. Romano, Seattle Times technology reporter

The Seattle Times, October 14, 2006

Microsoft is confident that changes it's making to Windows Vista will assuage competition concerns raised by European and Korean antitrust officials, and it plans to launch the new operating system on schedule around the world.

Last month, the company had raised the specter of a delayed launch in Europe, pending negotiations with the European Commission (EC) over features in Vista.

Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith struck a diplomatic tone Friday, saying the company received "clear guidance" during months of "constructive dialogue" with regulators at the commission, the administrative arm of the European Union. In response, it is making significant changes to three areas of the software: security, search and a new file format.

"Having made each of these changes, the company and [CEO] Steve Ballmer felt comfortable moving forward and felt confident that we are in compliance with our EU competition law obligations," Smith said during a conference call with reporters.

He said Ballmer spoke with European Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes on Thursday to inform her of the company's plans.

Wall Street viewed the news favorably, bidding Microsoft shares up 15 cents Friday to close at $28.37, a level it has not seen in nearly two years.

The company's comments strengthened investor confidence in the release schedule for Vista, due out for large business customers in November and for broad release in January. However, Vista is coming out more than two years later than originally planned.

"There's a timing issue," said Joe Wilcox, an analyst with Jupiter Research. "Microsoft wants to ship this operating system on time and it wants to ship it everywhere. And that puts Microsoft in a position to be more conciliatory."

Both Smith and the EC pointed out that there is no "green light" from the regulatory body, which does not approve products in advance.

Microsoft "must shoulder its own responsibilities to ensure that Vista is fully compliant" with competition rules and a 2004 anti-trust ruling against the company regarding the predecessor to Vista, the EC said in a brief statement Friday.

Fines and penalties stemming from that ruling have ballooned to nearly $1 billion. Microsoft is appealing.

The changes to Vista Microsoft announced Friday offer no guarantee that additional antitrust issues won't arise in the future.

"The commission will closely monitor the effects of Vista in the market and, in particular, examine any complaints concerning Vista on their own merits," the statement concluded.

Computer-security firms, among the most vocal complainants to the EC about Vista recently, withheld judgment on Microsoft's changes.

DOJ_NMG_0081287

"It's encouraging that they've said this," said Chris Paden, a Symantec spokesman. "It's a step in the right direction, but at the same time, security vendors are going to be wondering when" Microsoft will make technical details of the changes available for them to use.

McAfee, another security firm, did not return calls for comment.

Smith outlined the changes, which will apply to versions of the program sold in all markets, not just Europe.

Access granted

Microsoft is providing access to the kernel, or central part, of its code for 64-bit versions of Windows Vista, Smith said. A security feature called PatchGuard keeps the kernel inaccessible and unchanged. Previously, vendors had used access to the kernel for features of their own products.

Instead of removing PatchGuard, Microsoft built kernel-level application programming interfaces (APIs) so that security software vendors can still get access to parts of Vista they need, Smith said.

Microsoft also changed its Windows Security Center, a feature that sends alerts to users when, say, a firewall has been turned off or anti-virus software needs updating. Now, when a competitor's security product is installed, Windows Security Center will not duplicate alerts the competitive product may send.

Upgrade-process changed

In search, Microsoft changed the upgrade process to Vista and its Internet Explorer 7 browser to ensure that all search engines, such as Google, Yahoo! and its own Live Search, are on a level playing field.

Microsoft also agreed to submit its new file format — XML Paper Specification, or XPS, a competitor to Adobe's PDF — to a standards organization. Smith said it will also loosen the licensing terms under which the XPS format is available to other software providers for use in their own products.

He noted that the changes made at the EC's behest are one part of the global regulatory thicket Microsoft has navigated in building Vista.

"Windows Vista is probably one of the most heavily scrutinized products in the history of technology," he said, adding that Microsoft has worked with more than 20 government agencies on three continents.

Smith said that Microsoft has also been in discussions with the Korean Fair Trade Commission and plans to release a unique version of Vista to comply with its rules, on the same schedule.

Microsoft Makes Changes In Windows Vista To Suit Foreign Regulators (NYT)

By Paul Meller

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

BRUSSELS, Oct. 13 — Microsoft announced Friday that Windows Vista, the next version of its computer operating system, had been altered to satisfy regulatory concerns and would be introduced simultaneously worldwide. Less than a month ago, it had warned that antitrust problems could delay the introduction in Europe and South Korea.

A delay in one country or region would have serious consequences for software developers, computer manufacturers and retailers there. It would also create complications for Microsoft, which has always rolled out previous versions of Windows simultaneously around the world.

Steven A. Ballmer, Microsoft's chief executive, confirmed the global introduction of Vista in a phone conversation with the European competition commissioner, Neelie Kroes, late Thursday.

The new operating system will go on sale to large computer manufacturers next month and to the public in January.

In the statement issued Friday, Microsoft said it had altered Vista to address the concerns the commission has expressed about the new operating system over the last eight months.

Similarly, the concerns of South Korea's Fair Trade Commission have also been addressed, Microsoft said.

"We are excited to bring the security enhancements and innovative new features of Windows Vista to our customers and partners around the world, and we are committed to adhering to local law in every region of the world," Mr. Ballmer said in the statement.

Until now, Microsoft has resisted pressure to change Vista. Last month it accused the European Commission of not giving it clear enough guidance on whether Vista would pass muster under European antitrust law.

It also highlighted research that showed that hundreds of thousands of jobs in the European technology industry were at stake if Vista's introduction were delayed. Also last month, members of the European Parliament wrote to Ms. Kroes warning her of the harm she would be causing to European companies if she forced a delay.

The commission stood its ground, insisting that it was not up to regulators to approve Vista before its introduction. It repeated this message Friday. "The commission has not given a green light to Microsoft to deliver Vista," it said in a statement.

"Microsoft must shoulder its own responsibilities to ensure that Vista is fully compliant with competition rules and in particular with the principles laid down in the March 2004 commission antitrust decision concerning Microsoft."

In 2004, the commission found that Microsoft had violated antitrust rules by bundling its music and video player, Media Player, into Windows XP and ordered the company to release a second version of Windows with Media Player stripped out.

"We understand that the European commission doesn't give a green light to a product before it is launched, and that it is a company's obligation to be in compliance with antitrust law," Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, said in a conference call with journalists on Friday.

"Having made the changes we were advised to make, we are confident Vista is in compliance," he added.

Many of the problems with Vista identified by the commission echo the issues that resulted in the 2004 antitrust ruling. It alerted Microsoft to five potential antitrust problems in March, which were addressed in changes incorporated into the new operating system over the summer.

Last month, the commission pointed to three remaining problems, concerning Microsoft's plan to bundle into Vista an Internet search engine, security software and a fixed document format similar to the one sold by the software company Adobe.

Symantec, a leader in antivirus software, embarked on a huge public relations offensive, contending that Microsoft was effectively shutting it and other security software specialists out of Vista.

Two weeks ago, Microsoft addressed the main concerns of Symantec by agreeing to allow access to the heart, or kernel, of the Windows operating system to security products made by competitors. In the area of search, Microsoft changed Vista to allow users to choose their own search engine and make it the default Internet search tool on their computers.

In the area of fixed document formats, Microsoft agreed to the commission's demands that its new fixed-layout document format, called the XML Paper Specification, be scrutinized by an independent standards-setting organization. It also agreed to change the licensing terms to make its format more available to other software developers.

The commission said in a statement that it would "closely monitor the effects of Vista in the market" and would examine any complaints the new operating system might provoke "on their own merits."

Microsoft To Ship Vista On Schedule (MERCN)

By Dean Takahashi

The San Jose Mercury News, October 14, 2006

Microsoft said Friday that it would ship its Windows Vista operating system on schedule worldwide even as it addresses the concerns of European and Korean antitrust regulators as well as computer security firms.

The software giant will ship corporate versions of Vista in November and consumer versions in January, said Mary Snapp, vice president and deputy general counsel at Microsoft.

When the European Union raised concerns in March, Microsoft had warned it might have trouble making Vista available in Europe at the same time as other places.

``We are excited to bring the security enhancements and innovative new features of Windows Vista to our customers and partners around the world, and we are committed to adhering to local law in every region of the world," said Steve Ballmer, chief executive of Redmond, Wash.-based Microsoft.

Microsoft altered the operating system in several areas to respond to concerns of European and Korean regulators about ensuring fair competition, Snapp said. The company's changes address features related to security, search and document formats recognized by Vista.

The company also answered complaints from Silicon Valley-based security firms Symantec and McAfee.

The companies had accused the software programming giant of abusing its monopoly by controlling which security products can run on its new operating system. They say Microsoft blocked their ability to review the operating system's kernel, or core, and that Microsoft planned to confuse customers by offering its own security dashboard.

But Friday, Snapp said the company will allow security vendors to view the operating system's core by making available a key technology dubbed ``application programming interfaces."

In addition, the setup process for establishing security on the operating system will include options for choosing non-Microsoft security programs, Snapp said. When users click on the security center setup, they can choose Microsoft's solution as the default or choose options from other vendors.

Symantec representative Cris Paden said his company was aware of the concessions, but had yet to see the final detailed information needed to address their concerns.

``On one hand, it's encouraging that they're publicly committed to this, but we're being guardedly optimistic," Paden said. ``They haven't committed to a timeline and . . . it would be nice if they talked to us."

Microsoft will also make it possible for users to pick alternative search engines such as Google or Yahoo as their default. Changes such as these are important to third-party software companies because they fear that Microsoft's tight coupling of the operating system with its own software applications will give it an unfair advantage.

Google officials are awaiting Microsoft's impending release of the Internet Explorer 7.0 browser, which will hit the market ahead of the consumer version of Vista. That browser has a built-in search function, and Google wants to make sure users have a choice.

``We understand that Microsoft may make changes to the search default in IE7," said Ricardo Reyes, a Google official. ``But we haven't seen how it will be implemented yet."

In the past, conflicts on software bundling with Netscape and Real Networks led to years of litigation.

Finally, Microsoft said it would work with standard-setting groups to make the document formats recognized by Windows Vista available to other companies.

Bush Signs Bill For Great Lakes Habitats (AP-Y)

AP, October 14, 2006

President Bush has signed a bill to reauthorize up to $16 million a year for grants programs to restore habitats in the Great Lakes region.

The legislation signed into law Thursday would authorize $80 million over five years to restore fish and wildlife habitats, provide money for fish and wildlife projects and upgrade reports on the area's ecosystem.

The money won't be spent unless included it's included in separate appropriations bills, but supporters said it would build momentum for a comprehensive $20 billion plan to restore the Great Lakes.

"This is a victory for our Great Lakes and the people who enjoy its beaches, world-class fishing streams and national parklands," said Tom Kiernan, president of the National Parks Conservation Association.

The lakes make up about 95 percent of North America's fresh water and have been threatened by pollution, invasive species and the loss of habitat.

The measure aims to guard thousands of different species of fish and wildlife and 130 endangered or rare plants and animal species that have been identified within the region's ecosystem. It was led by Sens. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, and Carl Levin, D-Mich., and Reps. Mark Kirk, R-Ill., and Dale Kildee, D-Mich.

Overcrowding, Not Race, Is US's Immigration Problem (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

Some time in the next few days the 300 millionth American will be born or perhaps – so the joke goes – will cross illegally into the US from Mexico at night. Like many jokes, this one has a kernel of truth. In 1967, when America's population hit 200m, only five per cent of the country was foreign-born. Today that proportion has more than doubled. By 2043, when the US is projected to cross 400m, it is likely to be far higher. An increasingly large share will be Hispanic.

But America's population milestone is significant for reasons other than the politics of immigration. Samuel Huntingdon, the author of The Clash of Civilisations and the lesser-known Who Are We? The Challenges to America's National Identity, may or may not speak for large numbers of Americans when he warns of the "unique and disturbing challenge" posed to America's social fabric by the influx of Mexicans. But history is definitely not on his side.

As the Washington-based Brookings Institution points out in an excellent series on America's 300m landmark*, fears of being swamped by un-American foreigners are older than America itself. Writing more than 20 years before the American revolution, Benjamin Franklin warned that the influx of Germans into Philadelphia "will shortly be so numerous as to Germanise us instead of our Anglifying them".

Today more Americans describe themselves of German than of British descent yet almost all of them are able to do so only in English. The notion that America's newer "Latino" arrivals will somehow convert America into a Spanish-speaking country is barely less tenable than Mr Franklin's fears about Germans.

It is fairly certain, however, that Hispanic immigrants will energise America's economy in much the same way as their Polish, Jewish, Irish and Italian predecessors – or indeed as do their less numerous contemporaries from Africa and Asia. As President George W. Bush once said, perhaps with one eye on the Hispanic vote: "Hell, if they can make it through the Great Bend we want 'em."

It is true that America is becoming less white, assuming – as the US Census Bureau does – that you define Hispanics as non-white. Some Americans sublimate their fear of being swamped by darker skins by talking instead about the linguistic or cultural threat to the American way of life. But the very fact that only a tiny slice of rightwing nuts feel able to articulate their racial fears suggests that the tide is permanently against them.

Between 1980 and 2000 the proportion of Americans in racially mixed marriages doubled to six per cent. A quarter of Americans say they have a close relative of a different colour. In short, there is little reason to believe the character of America's current expansion is a serious threat to its long tradition of assimilating large numbers of newcomers from strange lands.

More interesting, but perhaps less appreciated, is what America's continued expansion means for its future quality of life – and, indeed, that of the rest of the planet. Nobody who drives through America's seemingly endless suburbs and "exurbs" can miss the tension between the country's vast open horizons and the increasing traffic gridlock around them. Nor can they fail to notice that it is America's sprawling urban environs, rather than the cities themselves, that are accommodating the country's growing numbers. It is true that America's population density is still less than a quarter that of continental Europe. But Europe's population growth has reached a virtual standstill. Besides, there are not too many Americans who aspire to live in North Dakota.

For the large majority of Americans living near or on its east or west coastlines, the reality of growing population density is hard to ignore. What were once isolated mountain escapes or unblemished patches of coastline are now jam-packed with resorts, second homes and, of course, snaking queues of traffic. So condensed have America's coastlines become that it is often hard to distinguish one built-up area from another because what falls in between is crammed with the same strip malls and chain motels as the last.

Imagine America a generation from now with one-third more freeways, out-of-town malls, refuse landfills, residential developments and sports utility vehicles than it has today. That, of course, is without mentioning the threat of global warming to which Americans disproportionately contribute. With 4 per cent of the planet's population, America contributes a quarter of the world's greenhouse gas emissions.

Like many others, I will raise my glass to the vibrant culture of diversity and optimism that is symbolised by America's latest notch on the population ladder. But, like growing numbers of mainstream Americans, I will also ask whether this is the latest sign of America's economic success or a reminder that growth cannot continue in this fashion indefinitely. It is a good question to which the answer is yes, and probably.

Science Ignored, Again (NYT)

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

The Bush administration loves to talk about the virtues of "sound science," by which it usually means science that buttresses its own political agenda. But when some truly independent science comes along to threaten that agenda, the administration often ignores or minimizes it. The latest example involves the Environmental Protection Agency's decision to reject the recommendations of experts inside and outside the government who had urged a significant tightening of federal standards regulating the amount of soot in the air.

At issue were so-called fine particles, tiny specks of soot that are less than one-thirtieth the diameter of a human hair. They penetrate deep into the lungs and circulatory system and have been implicated in tens of thousands of deaths annually from both respiratory and coronary disease. The E.P.A., obliged under the Clean Air Act to set new exposure levels every five years, tightened the daily standard. But it left unchanged the annual standard, which affects chronic exposure and which the medical community regards as more important.

In so doing, the agency rejected the recommendation of its own staff scientists and even that of its Clean Air Scientific Advisory Council, a 22-member group of outside experts that had recommended a significant tightening of the standards. Stephen Johnson, the agency administrator, claimed there was "insufficient evidence" linking health problems to long-term exposure. He added that "wherever the science gave us a clear picture, we took clear action," noting also that "there was not complete agreement on the standard."

One wonders how much evidence Mr. Johnson requires, and how "complete" an "agreement" must be before he takes action. A 20-2 vote in favor of stronger standards seems fairly convincing to us; likewise the unanimous plea for stronger standards from mainstream groups like the American Medical Association.

The environmental and medical communities suspect that the administration's main motive was to save the power companies and other industrial sources of pollution about $1.9 billion in new investment that the more protective annual standard would have required. But here, too, the administration appears to have ignored expert advice. Last Friday, the agency released an economic analysis showing that in exchange for $1.9 billion in new costs, the stronger annual standards could save as many as 24,000 thousand lives and as much as $50 billion annually in health care and other costs to society. Studies like these always offer a range of possible outcomes, but even at the lower end — 2,200 lives and $4.3 billion in money saved — the cost-benefit ratios are very favorable.

In the next year or so, the administration must decide whether to tighten the standards for another pollutant, ground-level ozone, which causes smog and is also associated with respiratory diseases. The scientific advisory committee has tentatively recommended that the ozone standard be tightened, citing new evidence of smog's adverse effects. This time Mr. Johnson should pay more attention to the scientists and less to the political strategists in the White House.

Medical Marijuana Advocate Faces New U.S. Indictment (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 13 — A leading medical marijuana advocate who successfully appealed his federal conviction this year has been indicted on new criminal charges that include tax evasion and money laundering.

The man, Ed Rosenthal, a well-known spokesman for the movement to legalize marijuana, was already facing a retrial on federal charges of growing marijuana for medical use. He is to be arraigned Monday in Federal District Court here on the new indictment, unsealed late Thursday.

It accuses Mr. Rosenthal, 61, of 14 felony charges that include cultivating marijuana plants; laundering $1,850, which the government says he got from selling the plants to medical dispensaries; and tax evasion. His tax returns, prosecutors said, omitted income from the sale of the plants.

Reached Friday at his home in Oakland, Mr. Rosenthal said he thought the efforts to prosecute him were part of a campaign to shutter medical marijuana sites in California and to subvert the state law allowing them.

"They want to shut me up," he said. "They are vindictive. They don't like anybody beating them, and they will go after you again and again until they wear you down."

The state and the federal government have been locked in a legal and cultural battle over the medicinal merits of marijuana since 1996, when California voters approved a ballot measure giving seriously ill patients the right to buy and use the drug with a doctor's prescription.

The Drug Enforcement Agency has been aggressive in investigating medical marijuana facilities. Last week, the authorities raided and closed five Bay Area sites, arresting 15 people.

A spokesman for the United States attorney's office, Luke Macaulay, would not comment on the new indictment, but said, "Drugs are a priority for the Justice Department, being that marijuana is illegal under federal law."

The new charges against Mr. Rosenthal are similar to those in a 2002 federal indictment. At the time, Mr. Rosenthal worked for the City of Oakland and was sanctioned under city and state laws to grow marijuana plants and sell them to dispensaries. He was convicted by a jury, but a federal appeals court overturned the decision, citing juror misconduct. He was granted a new trial, and prosecutors were moving forward, but the new federal indictment supersedes the earlier one.

Guilty Pleas By 2 Top Cali Cartel Figures Were 15 Years In Making (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

The guilty pleas by the two highest-ranking Colombian cocaine traffickers ever to appear in a U.S. courtroom had their roots in a hot summer morning 15 years ago when a drug-sniffing dog named Iowa found something suspicious.

The dog's alert on Aug. 26, 1991, led to the discovery at the Port of Miami of more than 12 tons of cocaine concealed in metal tubes that had, in turn, been hidden inside heavy concrete posts.

The shipment served notice to federal investigators that the Cali cartel had surpassed the better-known - and much more violent - Medellin cartel in controlling Colombia's cocaine trade and was employing ingenious new smuggling methods.

"It was electric, the atmosphere at the time," recalled Eddie Ryan, a federal prosecutor who worked the case until leaving Miami for Charlotte three years ago. "It was a huge load. This was a new game and they were better at it than anybody had ever been."

The investigation spawned by the big find would take many twists and turns and break new legal ground along the way.

DOJ_NMG_0081292

It culminated in the Sept. 26 guilty pleas to U.S. drug trafficking charges by brothers Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, the Cali cartel kingpins nicknamed "The Chess Player" and "The Master" who are now serving 30-year prison sentences. A total of 141 cartel members have been convicted or pleaded guilty for their roles in an organization once responsible for 80 percent of the world's cocaine.

For Ed Kacerosky, the Customs agent who led the investigation from its inception, that moment in a Miami courtroom wasn't his biggest in the case.

Far better, he said, came after a midlevel defendant briefly mentioned links between the Cali smugglers and operations in Guatemala. That would lead to a Miami frozen vegetable warehouse used as a front to smuggle cocaine and to a lawyer who ran the cartel's South Florida operations.

"You need to catch a break," said Kacerosky, 50, now a U.S Customs and Immigration Enforcement supervisory special agent. "You could be the greatest detective but you need to have a little bit of luck."

One of those breaks came after one of a dozen Cali associates waited a bit too late to throw his cell phone into the Miami River.

Kacerosky had identified the Miami-based operatives by decoding phone numbers seized from a man arrested for involvement in the load hidden in concrete posts. When he called the numbers, all of them were dead except one - and that one had called the replacement numbers for all his confederates.

"That was the first big success. That's what turned the tide in this whole case," Kacerosky said.

It was also the early days of cell phones - the big, clunky gray or black ones - and well before computers were in common use to crunch investigative data, Kacerosky said. "This was all first-time stuff," he said.

Information from that cell phone information led to the frozen vegetable operation that got weekly shipments from Guatemala - "I said 'bingo'" recalled Kacerosky - and to a lawyer named Harold Ackerman, who lived in a Miami Beach mansion. A wiretap was placed on his phone and investigators monitored 186 phone calls over a six-day period discussing Cali cocaine shipments, money laundering and so forth.

"That was just an absolute gold mine," Kacerosky said.

Ackerman was eventually convicted and sentenced to six life terms but won sentence reductions for his cooperation with federal prosecutors. Well before that, however, he provided another set of clues that helped unravel the cartel.

There were 24 employees listed in Ackerman's coded address book. All had fled Miami after Ackerman's 1992 arrest except a new hire named Raul Marti, who worked at the Taino Coffee Co. Investigators discovered that Taino was getting three or four shipping containers of "coffee" per month from Panama, which seemed suspiciously high.

Marti had no cell phone and didn't make many calls from his office. But four times a day, Marti would go to one of several banks of pay phones in Miami and use a prepaid phone debit card - cutting-edge technology in those days - to call numbers in Cali, Colombia.

Kacerosky was able to trace the cards' access numbers to a switching service in Miami that specialized in Colombian phone debit cards. So rather than trying to obtain difficult-to-get wiretap orders for dozens of pay phones, Customs investigators got warrants for the card numbers and monitored the calls through the switching service.

That led to hundreds of tapes of conversations between Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela and several Cali operatives and lawyers in the United States. Eventually, other Miami-based attorneys would join Ackerman in prison for convictions on such things as preparing false affidavits, paying hush money and relaying threats from cartel kingpins.

Those prosecutions, and the unprecedented search warrants approved in 1994 by the Justice Department for lawyers' offices, changed the way defense attorneys do business - especially the care taken to discover the source of a client's money.

"It really changed the landscape for the country on how lawyers had to look at their fees and had to protect themselves in addition to their clients," said David O. Markus, who represents Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela.

The case also provided important lessons for law enforcement. Perhaps the key, Kacerosky said, was that investigators didn't quit after arresting a trio of low-level people who had been hired to break open those original cocaine-laden concrete posts in 1991.

Investigators knew the Cali kingpins had a state-of-the-art warehouse filled with cutting tools and a dozen workers ready to slice open the posts and distribute the cocaine gradually. But the Rodriguez Orejuela brothers opted instead for three guys with sledgehammers, Kacerosky said, to test whether U.S. agents were on the trail of their big load.

It would have been easy to declare victory and go home after making that bust, but Customs, the Drug Enforcement Administration and drug task force other investigators did not.

"The No. 1 lesson is you never stop investigating," Kacerosky said.

Guilty Plea In Colo. House Bombs Case (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0081293

By Jon Sarche, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

(AP) - DENVER-A former air traffic controller accused of planting homemade bombs in March outside the Grand Junction homes of four co-workers and a Federal Aviation Administration official pleaded guilty Friday to one single count that could put him in prison for more than a decade.

Burke, 54, was arrested in Utah in April. He agreed to plead guilty to a charge of malicious damage to a building used in interstate commerce.

U.S. District Judge Robert Blackburn said the charge is punishable by five to 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000. Prosecutors said they will recommended a term of 10 years when Burke is sentenced on Feb. 2.

Burke had worked for Serco Group PLC, a British company that staffs air traffic control towers at airports in Grand Junction and 55 other locations. He was fired in 2004 after working for Serco for four years.

The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms has said the Grand Junction bombs were similar to a device that exploded at Serco offices in Murfreesboro, Tenn., in February.

No one was injured and only minor property damage was reported when three of the bombs in Grand Junction exploded. Two others were defused by bomb technicians.

IMMIGRATION:

Suit Over Illegals OK'd For Workers At Tyson Foods (WT)

By Steve Hirsch, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

A federal judge has ruled that workers can file a class-action suit against Tyson Foods Inc. for depressing wages by hiring illegal aliens.

Howard W. Foster, a Chicago lawyer for the Tyson employees, described the ruling in Winchester, Tenn., as a "very big step," allowing him to seek damages for thousands of workers at eight plants -- including one in Glen Allen, Va. -- instead of just the four original plaintiffs.

The case, filed in 2002 under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), is one of a growing number across the nation challenging illegal aliens in the workplace. In August, a temporary agency in California sued its competitors under the state's unfair-competition laws.

Mr. Foster has represented U.S. citizens seeking damages for wage depression caused by employment of illegal aliens in other cases, including one against Mohawk Industries and a class-action case against Zirkle Fruit Co., which has been settled.

"You can't bring these cases unless they get certified as class actions," he said yesterday.

"An individual person can't bring one -- it's not economically viable to do it. So it's important that it gets certified as a class action," he said.

An estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens are living in the United States, making up a large part of the nation's work force.

In April, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced a nationwide crackdown to target employers who "knowingly and recklessly" hire illegal aliens, and those who help them find jobs.

His announcement coincided with news that more than 1,180 illegal aliens had been arrested during raids at 40 IFCO Systems North America Inc. plants. The Houston company is the largest pallet services company in the U.S.

Yesterday, Tyson Foods described the judge's ruling as "procedural," adding that it was "not based on the merits of this case, which was actually dismissed by another judge back in 2002."

"We remain confident our company will ultimately prevail," Tyson spokesman Gary Mickelson said by e-mail.

"The plaintiffs' claims in this lawsuit are simply unfounded and largely based on federal charges our company has already successfully defended," he said, adding, "In 2003, a Chattanooga jury found the Springdale, Ark., company not guilty of violating immigration laws, confirming the company has made a concerted effort to hire properly and abide by the law."

U.S. District Judge Curtis L. Collier's order, issued Tuesday, schedules a Jan. 29 conference with lawyers. It is expected he will set a trial date then.

A federal jury in March 2003 acquitted Tyson and three former managers of conspiring to hire illegal aliens from Mexico and Central America for low-wage production jobs to boost profits. Two former Tyson managers who made plea deals were sentenced to one year each of probation.

DOJ_NMG_0081294

Before the case went to trial, four former employees at Tyson's Shelbyville, Tenn., plant sued. The lawsuit by Birda Trollinger, Robert Martinez, Tabetha Edding and Doris Jewell contends the company violated the RICO Act by knowingly hiring illegal aliens who were willing to work for wages below those acceptable to Americans.

In 2004, a three-judge panel of the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati overturned a lower-court dismissal of the four workers' case.

The lawsuit says Tyson relied on a network of recruiters and temporary employment agencies that brought illegal workers into the United States and supplied them with false identification.

Mr. Foster said Tyson employee pay, "probably $8 to $10 an hour," was depressed by the hiring of illegal aliens.

"We haven't stated exactly" by what amount wages were depressed, he said, adding that that would be determined by "experts."

The eight Tyson plants named in the suit are at Shelbyville; Corydon, Ind.; Gadsden, Ala., Blountsville, Ala., Ashland, Ala.; Sedalia, Mo.; Center, Texas and Glen Allen, Va.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Govt. Reports 788 Cases Of Lost Data (AP-Y)

By Stephen Ohlemacher, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Federal workers at 19 agencies have lost personal information affecting thousands of employees and the public, raising fresh concerns about the government's ability to protect sensitive information.

Most of the data was lost or stolen. In a few cases, it was accessed by computer hackers, according a report released Friday by the House Government Reform Committee. Government contractors were responsible for many of the security breaches.

In all, the committee reported 788 incidents involving the loss or compromise of sensitive personal information since Jan. 1, 2003. That was in addition to the "hundreds of security and privacy incidents" at the Department of Veterans Affairs, the report said.

"Data loss is a government-wide occurrence," the report said. "The vast majority of data losses arose from physical thefts of portable computers, drives and disks or unauthorized use of data by employees."

The committee asked all Cabinet agencies, the Office of Personnel Management and the Social Security Administration to report all losses of sensitive personal information since January 2003. The request came after a laptop with information for more than 26.5 million military personnel was stolen from a Veterans Affairs Department employee in May. Law enforcement officials recovered the laptop, and the FBI said Social Security numbers and other personal data had not been copied.

In many of the newly reported cases, the agencies still don't know the extent of the losses, the report said.

The Treasury Department reported the most incidents — 340 — including one in 2005 in which an IRS employee reported a missing computer drive nearly a month after he had last seen it.

The Commerce Department reported 297 incidents since January 2003. However, in a separate report released in September, the department acknowledged losing 1,137 laptops since 2001. Most of the lost computers had been used by the Census Bureau.

Among the other security breaches cited in the report:

_In August, a laptop containing personal information on 30,000 applicants, prospects and recruiters fell off a motorcycle driven by a Navy recruiter. Someone in a car apparently stopped and picked up the computer. A notification letter is being prepared for those affected.

_In 2004, a federal student aid contractor used a commercial shipping company to send personal information on 8,290 borrowers. The package was lost in transit, but the Education Department decided against notifying the affected people.

_A computer hacker used "malicious software" to access files containing personal information on 1,717 employees of the National Nuclear Security Administration in 2005. The Energy Department, which oversees the agency, said it has improved its computer defenses.

· Two employees of a contractor for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services stole records containing information on about 1,574 Medicare beneficiaries "for the purpose of identity theft" in 2005. The affected people were notified.

DOJ_NMG_0081295

_A company that issues charge cards for the Interior Department lost data tapes containing information on 61,000 cardholders in 2005. The cards were issued under the General Services Administration's SmartPay program. Affected cardholders were notified.

_In July, six Justice Department employees submitted computerized attendance reports containing Social Security numbers. Those reports were then downloaded 220 times and viewed 7,772 times. The incident is being investigated.

Data Theft At Agencies Not As Uncommon As Hoped (LAT)

By Moises Mendoza, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

A House report deems the incidence of lost or stolen information more pervasive than thought. Most cases are outright theft, it says.

WASHINGTON — Incidents of lost or stolen personal data at federal government agencies are more widespread than previously thought, affecting all 19 federal departments and millions of citizens since 2003, according to a congressional report released Friday.

Most of the nearly 800 incidents of data losses have never been publicly reported. The "vast majority" were not accidental misplacements, but rather outright thefts of computers or data disks containing sensitive information such as Social Security numbers. In some cases the data were used inappropriately by employees and private contractors, the report said.

The House Government Reform Committee began investigating data losses after several high-profile security breaches, including the theft in May from an employee's home of a Veterans Affairs laptop containing the personal data of more than 26 million veterans.

Since then, several other agencies, including the Social Security Administration, the Internal Revenue Service and the Department of Health and Human Services, have revealed security breaches that affected thousands more individuals.

The report found that agencies are often slow to realize that data thefts have taken place or how many people were affected by the breaches. And it was unclear how often they have informed citizens that their data might have been compromised, the report added.

Committee member Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) said federal agencies were losing too much information and suffering too many breaches.

"Americans expect their private information to be protected," Waxman said in a statement. "But the reality is that federal security systems remain far too vulnerable."

According to the report, recent incidents included:

· The loss in March of a Defense Department portable data drive that included personnel records of more than 200,000 Marines who served from 2001 to 2005. The report said the department sent a notification letter to the Marine Cops and the affected Marines.

· The loss of a Department of Education magnetic tape containing the personal information of more than 11,000 student loan borrowers.

· An unauthorized breach of an Air Force database compromising personal data of more than 30,000 members of the military.

Other incidents of data loss were reported to the committee by the departments of Housing and Urban Development, Transportation, State, Treasury, Commerce and Veterans Affairs.

The Commerce Department, for example, reported 214 incidents of lost or stolen computers at the Census Bureau. Veterans Affairs officials reported their data on two large spreadsheets covering hundreds of security and privacy breaches, the report said.

In most cases, the report said, there was little evidence that thieves used the data to steal people's identities. However, the report did cite one identity theft scheme last year by a Health and Human Services contractor that affected more than 1,500 people.

A few incidents have involved hackers looking to use citizens' personal data for illegal purposes, the report said.

U.S. Careless With Citizens' Information (WASHTIMES)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

Personal files maintained by the federal government on all U.S. citizens "remain at risk," according to a House report released yesterday, which said the stored information is routinely lost because of carelessness, misconduct or theft.

"The federal government compiles and holds sensitive personal information on every citizen, including health records, tax returns and military records," said a report by the House Government Reform Committee.

"In many cases, agencies do not know what information they have, who has access to the information, and what devices containing information have been lost, stolen or misplaced."

The report said much of the information was lost when laptop computers were stolen, documenting the theft of more than 1,800 government-owned laptop computers -- including one belonging to the Defense Department and containing personal information on 30,000 applicants, recruiters and prospects that "fell off a motorcycle belonging to a Navy recruiter."

The committee, chaired by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, began an investigation into the government's ability to keep its files secure after the Department of Veterans Affairs' disclosure that computer equipment containing the personal information of 26.5 million veterans and active-duty members of the military had been stolen from the home of a department employee.

Since that time, several other agencies -- including the Social Security Administration, the Internal Revenue Service and the Department of Health and Human Services -- have acknowledged security breaches that affected thousands more people.

To develop what the committee called "a full picture of the risks posed by data breaches at federal agencies," it asked agencies to provide details about incidents involving the loss or compromise of any sensitive personal information held by the agency or a contractor since Jan. 1, 2003.

The report outlined a "wide range of incidents involving data loss or theft, privacy breaches and security incidents," noting that despite the volume of sensitive information held by the agencies, there is no requirement that the public be notified if it is compromised.

The committee found that data loss is a governmentwide occurrence, noting that 19 federal departments and agencies had reported at least one loss of personally identifiable information since January 2003. It said the agencies do not always know what has been lost or how many people could be affected by a particular data loss.

It also said that only a small number of the data breaches are reported to the committee were caused by hackers breaking into computer systems online, with the vast majority of losses resulting from thefts of portable computers, drives and disks, or unauthorized use of data by employees.

The committee also said that federal agencies rely heavily on private-sector contractors for information-technology management services and, as a result, many of the reported data breaches were the responsibility of contractors.

According to the committee, problems concerning the loss of personal information were found at Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, Education, Energy, Health and Human Services, Homeland Security, Housing and Urban Development, Interior, Justice, Labor, State, Transportation, Treasury, Veterans Affairs, Office of Personnel Management and the Social Security Administration.

The Identity Theft Scare (WP)

By Fred H. Cate

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Identity theft is getting a lot of attention these days -- from news stories about missing laptops and lost data to television commercials for fraud prevention and credit monitoring services. Congress has held hearings, and members have issued forecasts of an impending plague of identity theft. Rep. Edward Markey (D-Mass.), in a statement typical of many of his congressional colleagues, said that "Social Security numbers and date-of-birth information are pure gold in the hands of identity thieves, who quickly convert them into credit cards and cash equivalents to perpetrate massive frauds."

When a laptop was stolen from the home of a Department of Veterans Affairs employee this year, newspapers across the nation editorialized about the dangers facing the people whose data were on the computer. The Post alone published more than 40 stories and wrote that "26.5 million veterans were placed at risk of identity theft." The VA notified all 26.5 million of them and asked Congress for $160.5 million to cover the cost of one year of credit monitoring for the veterans.

Then the laptop was recovered -- the data untouched and the risk of identity theft shown to be nonexistent.

The happy ending to the VA saga should have come as no surprise. The fact is that few if any such breaches lead to identity theft or other consumer injuries.

A 2005 study by ID Analytics, which operates a nationwide fraud-detection network, found that even when the missing information included credit card numbers or other account-level data, the risk of identity theft was no greater than for accounts from which no information was lost or stolen. Two years after a theft, only one out of every 1,020 account holders whose information had been stolen -- less than one-tenth of 1 percent -- had been targets of any attempted fraud.

The reasons are not hard to discern.

DOJ_NMG_0081297

First, the term security "breach" is so broad that it includes cases, such as that of the VA employee, in which the target of the theft was equipment, not data. In fact, most security breaches involve the accidental loss of information or equipment rather than a deliberate attack on data.

Second, identity theft is most commonly the result of data being obtained directly from victims, not through security breaches. According to a 2005 Javelin Strategy & Research survey, for the half of victims of identity-based fraud who knew where their information had been obtained, the most common source was a "lost or stolen wallet, checkbook, or credit card."

Thirty-five percent of identity-theft cases in which the perpetrator was identified involved a "family member or relative," and 18 percent a friend or neighbor. That means that roughly half of all known identity thieves were not strangers. Another 23 percent of such cases involved dishonest employees. All together, three-fourths of identity theft cases did not involve access to the kind of third-party data obtained through a security breach.

Third, identify theft affects far fewer Americans than the hype suggests. Although the figure most commonly cited in the media is 10 million U.S. victims a year, in April the Justice Department put the number at 3.6 million for the second half of 2004.

But more than half of those cases (two-thirds, according to the Federal Trade Commission) actually involve credit card fraud. This is good news, because Congress long ago limited consumer liability for credit card fraud to $50, and the universal industry practice is to waive that charge.

The Justice Department estimates that there were only 538,700 cases of true identity theft (those in which personal information was used to open accounts in the victim's name) in the second half of 2004. The FTC received about 250,000 identity-theft complaints in 2005. Moreover, research shows that identity theft is on the decline.

The danger of the security breach frenzy is not merely that it exaggerates the risk of identity theft and the role that security breaches play but that it ignores greater threats, such as the involvement of organized crime and the emergence of new and harder-to-detect frauds, that menace our increasingly information-dependent society.

Outgoing Medicare Chief Cites Drug Savings (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

The Medicare prescription drug benefit is on pace to cost the federal government about $30 billion this year, far less than the $43 billion originally projected, outgoing Medicare chief Mark B. McClellan said yesterday.

The lower cost is a result of cheaper-than-expected premiums, fewer people than anticipated enrolling in the new coverage, and slower growth in drug spending, said McClellan, who is returning to the private sector next week after 2 1/2 years as administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

McClellan, 43, spent his last day having breakfast with a dozen reporters, conducting a conference call about Medicare's online tools for consumers and talking with his staff.

"And I've got a few boxes to pack up -- photos and things like that," said McClellan, who added that he was "probably just going to go home and collapse" at day's end.

The economist and physician previously served as commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration and as a member of the White House's Council of Economic Advisers. Leslie V. Norwalk, No. 2 at CMS, will take charge as acting administrator.

McClellan plans to announce an affiliation with a Washington think tank on Monday. The Texan said he is pleased that independent surveys show that 80 percent of people who signed up for the new drug benefit are satisfied with their plans. But what he is most proud of has been his emphasis on shifting Medicare toward better-coordinated, prevention-oriented care, he said.

"We have got to move in this kind of direction to have a sustainable, innovative, affordable health-care system," he said.

The lower costs, he said, are due largely to the competition among insurers to lure seniors to their plans. When Congress created the benefit, the average monthly premium was expected to be $37; it has turned out to be $24. And instead of rising to $40 next year as projected, the average premium should be $26, he said.

A House Democratic analysis, however, concluded that the average monthly premium in 2007 will be about $29, and that some beneficiaries will see far steeper increases. The analysis calculated that the average cost of the lowest-priced plan will rise 44 percent, to $13.58.

McClellan has called the analysis "misleading" because it does not account for seniors who have drug coverage through HMO-style Medicare Advantage plans.

Another factor in holding down costs is enrollment. There are 43 million people on Medicare, the federal health insurance program for the elderly, and actuaries estimated that 38 million would seek the new drug coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0081298

Instead, about 23 million seniors enrolled in drug plans directly through Medicare, and 7 million others got coverage through employers that received a Medicare subsidy to continue private drug plans for their older employees and pensioners, officials said. An additional 5 million seniors get drug coverage through the Department of Veterans Affairs, and about 2.5 million are covered through the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program.

Predictions that many employers would drop their plans and send older workers or retirees to Medicare for drug coverage did not come to pass, McClellan said.

Finally, costs were lower than predicted because about 60 percent of the prescriptions filled under the new benefit were for generic drugs, compared with the national average of about 52 percent, he said.

The drug benefit's costs are projected to climb to $48 billion next year, in part because people who enrolled as late as this May will be on the books for all of 2007. But because that estimate does not reflect the latest cost data from the plans, McClellan doesn't expect it to stick.

"I think it's unlikely that we're going to see anything but a significant reduction in that $48 billion projection," he said.

White House Denies Book's Allegations (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

A former Bush aide claims that evangelical Christians were embraced for political gain at the White House but derided privately as "nuts," "ridiculous" and "goofy."

The allegations — denied by the White House on Friday — are in a new book by David Kuo, a conservative Christian who was deputy director of President Bush's Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives until 2003.

The book describes Kuo's frustration at what he felt was lackluster enthusiasm in the White House for the program, which seeks to steer more federal social service contracts to religious organizations. Details from the book, "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction," were reported by MSNBC ahead of Monday's publication date.

Kuo singled out staffers in the office of Karl Rove, Bush's top political adviser and deputy chief of staff, as particularly condescending toward evangelical Christians, viewing them as necessary to help win elections but ridiculing them behind the scenes.

Kuo also described how officials from the faith-based office were systematically dispatched to hold large events in areas where there were key House and Senate races before the 2002 elections.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said he had not yet seen the book. But he said Rove was asked if he made the comments and replied he had not. Kuo, however, doesn't single out anyone by name as making the condescending comments.

"These are people who are friends. You don't talk about friends that way," Snow said.

Bush's spokesman also said there was no attempt to exploit the office to score political points, and that the president had specifically directed it not be politicized.

Snow denied Kuo's charge that the White House's religious charities program wasn't given the status it deserved, saying Bush's personal commitment to the policy was solid. Kuo has complained publicly in the past that the White House did not push hard enough for promised federal funding for religious groups to help the poor.

Snow read from what he called a "very warm letter" Kuo wrote to Bush when he left the White House. Kuo told the president he was proud of what the initiative had accomplished and said "it's your staff's keen awareness of your unwavering support for this initiative that's made the difference."

Snow concluded that the reports on the book "seem at odds with what he was saying inside the building at the time he departed."

Kuo's account of how the faith-based office has been regarded inside the White House recalls that of another high-level alumnus of the program. John J. DiIulio Jr., the faith-based office's first director, who quit in 2002, told Esquire magazine that "Mayberry Machiavellis" led by Rove based policy only on re-election concerns. After his comments caused an uproar, DiIulio apologized for making what he said were rude remarks.

Conservatives Rally Against Bush Aide-Turned-Critic (WP)

By Alan Cooperman, Washington Post Staff Writer

ExposÃ© of White House Scorn for Evangelicals Is Disputed

Conservative religious leaders described themselves as shocked yesterday by a new book's charge that Bush administration staffers privately dismissed evangelical Christian political activists as "nuts" and "goofy."

DOJ_NMG_0081299

But their dismay was aimed at the book's author, former White House official David Kuo, rather than at President Bush or his senior advisers.

James Dobson, Charles W. Colson and other stalwarts of the conservative Christian movement defended the Bush administration and questioned the timing of the book's publication, a month before the midterm elections. Some suggested that Kuo had betrayed the White House.

"I feel sorry for him, because once you do something like this, you get your 15 minutes in the spotlight, but then after that nobody will touch you," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, a Christian advocacy group in Washington. "These kiss-and-tell books do more damage to the author than to the people they attack."

Kuo, who was deputy director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives in Bush's first term, alleges in the book, "Tempting Faith," that the Bush administration used its funding of religious charities to court evangelical voters in Machiavellian fashion.

The book is being published at a pivotal moment not just for Republicans who are battling to maintain control of the House and Senate but also for conservative Christian voters, whose support for the GOP has dipped in recent polls.

At 7 p.m. Sunday, evangelical leaders including Perkins and Dobson plan to broadcast a 90-minute television special from a Boston church to hundreds of other churches across the country in an attempt to keep religious conservatives from sitting out the election.

Called "Liberty Sunday," it will "highlight specific cases and stories where people's religious liberties have been threatened because of homosexual activism and gay marriage in Massachusetts," said Family Research Council spokeswoman Bethanie Swendsen.

At the same hour, CBS's "60 Minutes" will broadcast the first interview with Kuo about his book, which is scheduled to go on sale Monday. CBS and the book's publisher, Simon & Schuster, tried to keep a lid on the book's contents until the "60 Minutes" exclusive. But MSNBC host Keith Olbermann obtained a copy and began broadcasting excerpts Wednesday.

Conservative Christian leaders as well as present and former White House officials responded yesterday to the MSNBC report, noting that they had not yet seen the book itself.

White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters that the book's "assumption or insinuation seems to be that the administration takes lightly faith-based groups." That is "false," he said.

Asked whether the president's "faith-based initiative" was used for political purposes, Snow said flatly: "No." Snow also read from a letter Kuo wrote to Bush when he left the administration in December 2003, saying he was "proud of all the initiative has accomplished."

In the book, Kuo asserts that the faith-based office was hurriedly set up after Bush took office in 2001 by a transition volunteer who was given less than a week to roll out the initiative.

Kuo asserts that evangelical leaders were called "the nuts" by people in White House political strategist Karl Rove's office. "National Christian leaders received hugs and smiles in person, and then were dismissed behind their backs and described as 'ridiculous,' 'out of control' and just plain 'goofy,' " the book says, according to MSNBC.

Kuo previously has criticized the Bush administration for not carrying out the president's 2000 campaign promise to boost charitable giving at least $7 billion a year by extending charitable tax breaks to people who do not itemize income tax deductions.

In the book, he says the White House opted instead for cuts in the estate tax that eliminated the incentive for many wealthy people to make charitable donations. The "ultimate impact was to brutalize the very charities Mr. Bush once identified as his top priorities," Kuo says.

Beginning in 2002, the White House held ostensibly "nonpartisan" conferences about the availability of federal grants for religious charities. But Kuo alleges that the events were, in fact, designed to help vulnerable Republican incumbents.

Ken Mehlman, then the White House director of political affairs and now chairman of the Republican National Committee, "loved the idea and gave us our marching orders" to hold meetings in 20 congressional districts, the book says.

H. James Towey, who directed the faith-based office during Kuo's time there, said yesterday that "it sounds like he worked at a different White House than the one I worked for."

Towey added that he, not Mehlman, decided where to hold conferences. "If a congressman in a tight race invited me, I went," he said. "But that was true of Democrats as well as Republicans."

Dobson, the psychologist and radio host who heads the influential group Focus on the Family, issued a statement calling the book "a mix of sour grapes and political timing."

Colson, who founded Prison Fellowship Ministries, said he was "shocked and disappointed by what appears to be political timing to sell a book, and a very unfair characterization of the parties involved."

Jan LaRue, chief counsel of Concerned Women for America, a Christian women's group in Washington, said she sees "no reason to question the sincerity of this president" based on the accusations aired so far.

DOJ_NMG_0081300

"So, in Rove's office people of faith are mocked? Well, who in Rove's office did the mocking? It's easy to make allegations like that if you don't give the name, date, time," she said.

Perkins of the Family Research Council said he would not be surprised if derisive comments were made behind Christian leaders' backs.

"I have no misconceptions about how people in the Republican Party and the establishment view social conservatives. They are dismissive. I see how they prefer to work with fiscal conservatives," he said. "Having said that, I see it really as a marriage of convenience. We are not without significant gains by working with this administration."

Congressman Demands Retraction From WSJ (AP)

By Tim Whitmire

Associated Press, October 14, 2006

CHARLOTTE, N.C. (AP) -- A congressman in the thick of a tough re-election battle demanded Friday that The Wall Street Journal correct and retract statements in an article that said he slipped projects benefiting his own business interests into the federal budget, a claim he called libelous.

Rep. Charles Taylor said he would sue the newspaper if it does not meet his demands, made in a letter written by Asheville lawyer Robert B. Long Jr. and released by Taylor's office.

Taylor is demanding that the Journal retract a front-page article published Wednesday titled "Seat in Congress Helps Mr. Taylor Help His Business." It said he added "earmarks" to legislation to widen two highways near property he owns, to give millions to nonprofit groups run by his business partners and supporters, and to provide $3.8 million for a park in front of a downtown Asheville bank he owns.

Written by John R. Wilke, the story cited congressional, corporate and real-estate records. Taylor described it as "full of misinformation and unsupported falsehoods."

A Wall Street Journal spokesman was unable to immediately confirm that the newspaper had received Taylor's letter and therefore could not comment.

Taylor, a veteran Republican from Brevard who is one of Congress's wealthiest members, is in a fierce re-election battle with Democrat Heath Shuler, a former NFL quarterback. Although Taylor's district in far western North Carolina leans conservative, many analysts have rated the race a tossup.

In a summary, Taylor identified 15 statements in the article he said were false. He said he owns no property near one of the highways mentioned, and that the other road project is needed for the safety of area residents, not for the timberland he owns "miles away."

He said another earmark the story attributed to him - a much publicized grant of $500,000 to fund a teapot museum in Sparta - actually came from Rep. Virginia Foxx, a Republican who represents the district that includes Sparta.

Strategist In Chief (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

No political figure is more vital to the self-esteem of the Democratic Party and its faithful than Karl Rove. Ever since Rove rose to national renown with George W. Bush some six years ago, he has provided sweet relief for Democrats otherwise ill equipped to explain Bush's successes. For the president's critics, it is axiomatic that Rove is supremely diabolical and inscrutably brilliant, since they're also pretty sure the president himself is neither. I doubt any political consultant has sold more books without writing one himself.

Just ask James Moore and Wayne Slater, two veteran Texas political reporters who have tracked Rove for years. In 2003 they published their first Rove book, the best-selling "Bush's Brain," a trenchant chronicle of Rove's triumphant efforts to turn Bush into a winning presidential candidate. Now they've returned with a blistering sequel, "The Architect: Karl Rove and the Master Plan for Absolute Power," promising a close look at Rove's strategy to cement today's thin Republican majorities into enduring ones.

Much of the master plan will sound familiar to anyone who subscribes to a newspaper. The Republicans must court and mobilize the party's religious conservative base with wedge issues like gay marriage; discourage unionization and defang the trial lawyers, key sources of Democratic cash and ground troops; build a finely tuned grass-roots machine that can overpower the Democrats during elections and bolster Republican initiatives in between them.

Put the pieces together, the authors argue, and Republicans can control Washington for a generation. "Democracy, to Karl Rove, is like a very large board game," they write. Monopoly, I'm guessing. One of the conceits of "The Architect" is that Rove's hand is behind practically everything Republican officials say and do, no matter how minor or conventional. (The strategy of "tort reform," for example, long predates Rove's appearance on the scene.) Though Rove frequently disappears from the narrative for pages at a time, the authors invariably suggest that the lack of apparent fingerprints merely proves his cunning. Of new Labor Department regulations requiring unions to reveal more of their finances, for example, the authors write that a union lawyer "could not prove Rove's involvement, but there were connections." The appointee who drafted the rules previously worked for the chairman of the Republican National Committee, who in turn "took his orders from Karl Rove."

"The Architect" rapidly descends into self-parody. Take the authors' account of meetings where Rove cooked breakfast for the Bush re-election team. "Rove's speciality was his scrambled eggs — eggies, he called them — which he announced with great fanfare were prepared with a special ingredient, most likely cream," they write breathlessly. "As in everything, Rove pursued his cooking with manic, relentless attention." By then, it's clear "The Architect" isn't chiefly an explication of Rove's master plan. Rather, it's an indictment of the man himself as a cynical and manipulative hypocrite who will do anything to win. (Unsurprisingly, few of Rove's confidants appear by name in this book, and the only original quotations from Rove appear to be drawn from interviews he agreed to for "Bush's Brain.")

Rove's sole interest in religion, Moore and Slater charge, is to exploit the anger and alienation of religious conservatives "as a political tool." Likewise, he has no particular beef with gays, but found that demonizing them gets Republicans elected. I suppose it is to illustrate the party's insincerity on this issue that the authors devote much space to discussing the bachelorhood, confirmed and otherwise, of various Republican officials. But the book veers into thoroughly unappealing territory when the authors insinuate, in a chapter all the more lurid for its pretense of sympathy, that Rove's adoptive father, Louis Rove, left Karl's mother because he was gay. As Louis Rove lay on his deathbed in the summer of 2004, Moore and Slater write, "his son was in the midst of launching the antigay issues campaign that was to lead to the re-election of George W. Bush."

It's what happened after Bush's re-election, though, that ultimately compromises "The Architect." Social Security privatization, the centerpiece of Bush's much-touted "ownership society," was a political disaster. Iraq is turning into an albatross. Bush has endured some of the lowest approval ratings of any president since Richard Nixon, and voters appear even less enchanted with his allies on the Hill. Even some prominent conservatives, dismayed by growth in the size of government and the deficit spending that has fueled it, are fuming.

Meanwhile, the Republican Party's battles over immigration have repelled Hispanic voters, and the administration's handling of Hurricane Katrina reversed whatever gains Bush had made among blacks. Rove once hoped to build a new big-tent party that could thrive as ethnic and racial minorities become a majority of the electorate. He's had to settle for a narrower and more self-limiting coalition built around white religious conservatives, their fear of what Democratic rule would bring and the genuinely impressive machinery he's built to muster them on Election Day.

It's worked for two elections now, and it may well work for a third. But machines can be imitated. Demographics cannot; nor can the kind of substantive policy accomplishments that ultimately bind voters to a party over the long term. The authors depict the decline in Rove's fortunes toward the end of their account, but they never really square it with their belief in his near infallibility. "Karl Rove would almost certainly design a plan to make his problems disappear," they write. "The architect never runs out of ideas." Soon we'll see just how sturdy his creation is.

Cheaper Gas Lifts Spending By Consumers (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

Lower gasoline prices encouraged Americans to spend more on clothing, furniture and building materials, and propelled consumer confidence to the highest level in more than a year, according to reports released yesterday.

The largest decline ever in gas-station receipts pushed overall retail sales down 0.4 percent in September, the Commerce Department said. Excluding service stations, purchases climbed 0.6 percent, three times the gain in August.

In addition, the University of Michigan reported that its consumer sentiment index jumped to 92.3 in October, from 85.4 the prior month. It was the highest reading since July 2005.

According to the Commerce Department, sales excluding autos, gasoline and building materials, which the government uses to calculate gross domestic product figures, increased 0.8 percent in September, the most since January. The gain was twice as much as in August.

Sales excluding autos fell 0.5 percent in September after a 0.2 percent rise. No change was forecast by economists. Sales at automobile dealerships and parts stores were unchanged last month after a 0.4 percent decline in August.

Purchases at nonstore retailers, including online and catalog sales, increased 1.1 percent in September after falling 0.2 percent the month before. Sales at department stores increased 1 percent after no change.

The data suggests that housing has yet to take a big bite out of consumer spending. This week, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, Richard W. Fisher, said that "it's important not to over-fixate on housing" because "the rest of the economy is running on all pistons."

A healthy labor market is sustaining consumer spending. The unemployment rate fell to 4.6 percent last month, matching a five-year low, and workers' average hourly earnings rose 4 percent from September 2005, matching the biggest gain in five years, the Labor Department said this month.

Economy Benefits As Gas-Price Drop Spurs Outlays (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

Consumers took much of the money they saved at the gas pump last month and spent it elsewhere, giving the economy a critical boost at a time when overall growth appears to be slowing.

The Commerce Department said Friday that retail sales in September eased 0.4% from the previous month, primarily due to a 9.3% plunge in gas-station revenue precipitated by a big drop in oil prices.

Consumers impressed economists with their quick turnaround in spending money saved at the pump. Read a handful of economists' reactions2 to the September retail-sales report.

Economists were unfazed by those declines, though, because virtually every other kind of retailer benefited from consumers having some extra spending money. Apparel stores saw particularly strong gains, and retail sales excluding the volatile gas and automobile industries posted a robust 0.8% increase last month.

"Overall, this report is encouraging evidence that consumer spending has not been much affected by the slumping housing market," said David Resler, chief economist at Nomura Securities International Inc.

Many economists said consumers, supported by a strong labor market and solid wage growth, are still increasing their spending at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of 3% or more. That's proving to be especially critical now that the economy appears to be settling into a period of slower growth, damped by a decrease in residential construction, higher interest rates and a wider trade deficit.

In a recent speech, Federal Reserve Vice Chairman Donald Kohn said "the economy could be in the process of registering several consecutive quarters of growth below its potential rate."

The potential rate, generally considered to be about 3% a year, is widely seen as the fastest pace at which the economy can expand without sparking a damaging surge in inflation. Periods of below-potential growth in the past have led to recessions, but Mr. Kohn said "several features of the current financial situation," such as historically low interest rates and easy credit availability, suggest "this time will be different."

The average economist surveyed recently by WSJ.com said the economy grew at a modest annual rate of 2.3% in the third quarter, with some saying it grew as slowly as 1.5% or less. On average, economists predicted growth for the next year would stay below the economy's potential rate. The government will release its estimate of third-quarter economic growth in two weeks.

The biggest drags on the economy now are the decline in residential construction, which is subtracting about one percentage point from economic growth, and the widening trade deficit. Economists said a slowdown in inventory accumulation could prove to be another negative factor.

Separate data released by the Commerce Department on Friday showed that business inventories grew by 0.6% in August, slightly slower than the 0.7% gain in July.

Aside from solid consumer-spending growth, the economy is getting strong support from business investment and commercial construction. Strong corporate profits have paved the way for businesses to buy equipment, and significant price appreciation in residential real estate in recent years is helping cushion the blow from the weakening housing market on consumer spending.

Another plus is the drop in oil prices, which is helping to reduce inflationary pressures and boost consumers' moods. These effects could be seen in two other reports released Friday. The Labor Department said import prices fell 2.1% in September, the first decline in six months, primarily thanks to a 10.3% fall in petroleum prices.

Meanwhile, the University of Michigan said its preliminary index estimate of consumer sentiment in early October soared to 92.3 from 85.4 in September, marking the highest level of consumer confidence in more than a year.

DOJ_NMG_0081303

Consumers with more money to spend increased buying of nondurable goods like clothing and restaurant meals more than they did on durables like cars and kitchen appliances, according to data from the retail-sales report.

Revenue at clothing stores in September rose 3% from August, but sales at motor-vehicle and parts dealers fell 0.5% over the same period. Sporting goods, music, book and hobby stores saw their sales increase 1.1% in September, but revenue at furniture stores grew by a more modest 0.2%.

"Durables tend to be bigger-ticket items and are often financed, so higher financing rates will likely make consumers think twice about laying down the plastic for these purchases," said Gina Martin, an economist at Wachovia Corp. "In contrast, an extra $50 at the pump translates fairly easily to picking up an extra sweater at the mall or an extra dinner out."

Savings At Pump Fueling Shoppers (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Bolstered by falling gasoline prices, consumers headed back to the malls to shop in September, and with confidence rebounding sharply this month, strong sales are forecast for the all-important holiday period.

Overall, retail sales fell by 0.4 percent in September, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. But that decline was skewed by the good news that gasoline prices plummeted last month, sending sales at service stations down by a record 9.3 percent.

Excluding service stations, retail sales posted a solid increase of 0.6 percent, the government said, as consumers used the money they saved on gasoline to spend on other items.

"Households continue to empty their wallets at a very rapid pace," said Joel Naroff, chief economist at Naroff Economic Advisors, a private forecasting firm.

A second report yesterday showed that consumer confidence, which had been depressed by surging gasoline prices, posted a strong rebound in October.

The University of Michigan's confidence survey rose to 92.3 in October, according to a preliminary reading, up from 85.4 in September. The October confidence level, the best showing in 15 months, was far better than economists had been expecting.

Signs of strength in the consumer sector lifted spirits on Wall Street, sending the Dow Jones Industrial Average up by 12.81 points to close at 11,960.51. It was the Dow's sixth record close in the past two weeks and put the blue-chip index tantalizing close to the 12,000 mark.

Analysts said the rise in confidence, which is being fueled by falling gasoline prices, should translate into solid consumer spending during the upcoming holiday sales season and help keep the nation from stumbling into a recession.

Since peaking above $3 per gallon in early August, the nationwide average for regular gasoline has fallen by 78 cents per gallon.

Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, said this decline is like a huge tax cut that will give consumers nearly $100 billion more to spend on other items.

The economy skidded to a sharp slowdown in the spring under the impact of soaring gasoline prices, rising interest rates and a cooling housing market, raising fears of a possible recession.

Now, with gasoline prices falling and the Federal Reserve putting its two-year credit-tightening campaign on hold, economists think growth will slow in the second half of the year but a recession will be avoided.

Mr. Behravesh said the overall economy, which grew at a 2.6 percent rate in the spring, probably grew by just 1.8 percent in the third quarter but should rebound to around 2.5 percent growth in the final three months of this year.

"Wage growth is improving; the stock market is doing well; and gasoline prices are down. All of this is very good news for the consumer," he said.

For September, retail sales jumped 1.1 percent at department stores and were up an even larger 3 percent at specialty clothing stores, the biggest increase in this category in 11 months, as cooler weather last month put shoppers in the mood to buy the new fall clothing lines.

Oil Price Drop Cheers US Consumers (FT)

By Daniel Pimlott In New York And Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

The sharp fall in oil prices last month left US consumers with more money to spend on other goods and services and gave them a more hopeful outlook on the state of the economy, according to data released on Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0081304

The firm underlying retail sales figures and an unexpectedly strong upswing in consumer confidence further diminish the prospect that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates any time soon.

The reports came after Michael Moskow, the president of the Chicago Fed, said in a speech Thursday night that he still believes that "the risk of inflation remaining too high is greater than the risk of growth being too low."

The Michigan consumer sentiment index jumped to its highest reading in over a year on Friday, beating analysts expectations.

Overall retail sales fell 0.4 per cent, compared with analysts expectations of a 0.2 per cent rise. But the decline was entirely due to a sharp fall in spending on gasoline.

"The sales report had a weak headline figure but were strong underneath," Mike Pond, treasury and inflation link strategist at Barclays. "That's no real surprise given the price of gasoline has fallen. But the data points to stronger consumer spending in the final quarter of the year."

Resilience in consumer spending will weigh heavily on the Fed's policy-making Open Market Committee.

"Maybe the Fed not only won't cut rates, but might have to tighten them," said Richard Gilhooly, senior bond strategist at BNP Paribas. "That's not the view in the marketplace at the moment but if we continue to get data like today that could change."

Overall inflation is likely to have fallen thanks to the 12 per cent drop in gasoline prices last month, and the Fed hopes that lower energy prices will also over time reduce the pressure on firms to "pass through" higher energy costs to consumers.

However, some analysts argue that the core rate, which excludes the volatile energy and food prices, may not decline as rapidly as expected if businesses feel shoppers can afford higher prices.

"If the transfer of purchasing power to the consumer is sustained, we will see a increase in pricing power for the retailers," said Mr Gilhooly.

Retail sales rose by 0.6 per cent, excluding gasoline sales. Taking out sales of cars and parts, which can also fluctuate widely from month to month, retail sales rose by 0.8 per cent, following gains of 0.4 per cent in August and 0.6 per cent in July.

The Deathwatch For Cheap Oil (NYT)

By Paul B. Brown

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

THOSE falling prices at the gasoline pump may only be temporary. Indeed, they could signal the start of an era in which, forecasters say, "the death of cheap, abundant crude might unleash war and plunge the world into a second Great Depression."

"Peak oil is a reality," says Willem Kadijk, a hedge fund adviser quoted by Bloomberg Markets magazine. He is just one of many who believe that global oil production is now at or near its peak, and the only place to go is down.

"Once the flow crests and starts to decline, and some geologists say it already has, oil will no longer be able to slake the world's growing thirst for energy," Deepak Gopinath writes in summarizing the argument. "The result will be the oil shock to end all oil shocks."

The price of a barrel of crude oil, which closed yesterday at $58.68, "will spiral to $200 — and keep rising," he writes.

Representative Roscoe G. Bartlett, a Maryland Republican, has formed the Congressional Peak Oil Caucus to draw attention to the issue. "The world has never faced a problem like this," he told the magazine.

The nation's oil companies dispute the assertions. An Exxon Mobil spokesman says the company's geologists expect global oil production to keep rising for at least the next two decades.

ON SECOND THOUGHT If you think ethanol is a simple answer to solving our gasoline needs, think again, argues Consumer Reports in this month's cover article, "The Ethanol Myth."

"Despite the avid support of the Bush administration and major American car companies," E85 — a commonly used blend of 85 percent ethanol and 15 percent gasoline — "is unlikely to fill more than a small percentage of U.S. energy needs," the magazine says.

Reasons for the pessimism are that ethanol costs more, is hard to find outside the Midwest — only about 800 gas stations out of 176,000 nationwide sell E85 — and provides fewer miles to the gallon. The magazine tested ethanol on a Chevrolet Tahoe and found that the fuel economy dropped "27 percent when running on E85 compared with gasoline, from an already low 14 m.p.g."

At the time of the test, the average retail price of E85 was $2.91 a gallon, which meant the 27 percent fuel-economy penalty would have caused drivers to pay "$3.99 for the energy equivalent of a gallon of gasoline."

A FAR BIGGER BANG The Rolling Stones, fronted by their 63-year-old lead singer, Mick Jagger, are heading into the home stretch of what will be the most commercially successful rock tour of all time, Rolling Stone reports.

By the time the tour ends in Hawaii next month, the band will have sold nearly two million tickets for a total of $256 million in revenue, according to the magazine, which cited figures compiled by Pollstar.

DOJ_NMG_0081305

The “Bigger Bang” tour, which began last year, set a record during its 2005 leg when it recorded $162 million in 43 dates, “so this fall’s tour ... could be considered a victory lap,” Brian Hiatt writes.

“We’re kind of looking at it like we’re Lewis and Clark — we’re playing the Wyomings and Montanas,” said Keith Richards, the guitarist.

Michael Cohl, a promoter, said the tour could continue next year, although no dates are scheduled.

In case you were wondering, U2’s 2005 “Vertigo” tour is the second-highest-grossing tour ($138.9 million); the Stones own third place with the “Voodoo Lounge” tour in 1994 ($121.2 million); Bruce Springsteen and the E Street Band grossed $115.9 million in their 2003 tour; and U2 rounds out the top five with $109.7 million in 2001 during its “Elevation” tour.

FINAL TAKE Even assuming that the growing number of companies devoted to space travel are successful, becoming a rocketman (or woman) is going to cost you at least $200,000. However, Popular Mechanics reports that for $295 “you can launch a photo of yourself — or some other keepsake — into space on Bigelow Aerospace’s Genesis II spacecraft, due to launch early next year.” Not surprisingly, the company plans to sell space for corporate advertising as well. Clinton Touts Oil Tax Measure At UCLA Rally (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

The former president tells a crowd of 5,000 that Prop. 87 would allow the state to do something remarkable -- save the planet.

Accusing oil companies of lying about the cost of Proposition 87, former President Clinton on Friday called "bogus" their contention that approving a tax on oil revenues would trigger higher gas prices for California motorists.

During a rally at UCLA, the former president said the state ballot measure would help California move toward less expensive, cleaner forms of energy by funding research into alternative fuels.

Gas prices are lower in other states that already have oil taxes like the one proposed by Proposition 87, Clinton added.

"California is being given an opportunity and an obligation to do something remarkable — to save the planet, improve our national security, create the next generation of good jobs for the American people," Clinton said.

The measure on the Nov. 7 ballot would impose up to $485 million a year in taxes on companies that extract oil from California land, with the money going to finance research and development of alternative energy. Over its life, the measure would raise $4 billion for grants and loans to projects developing alternative fuels and more energy-efficient vehicles.

With opponents, led by oil companies, pumping more than $52 million into the campaign to defeat the state ballot measure, supporters brought Clinton into the state just days after launching a television ad campaign in which his former vice president, Al Gore, said the measure would reduce the state's dependence on foreign oil and clean the air.

Clinton, still popular in a state that he twice won in presidential elections, will be featured in a new round of ads that were filmed during Friday's rally in front of a cheering crowd of 5,000, many of them students.

Opponents of Proposition 87 noted Friday that support for the measure is sagging, and predicted that the involvement of Clinton and Gore would not be enough to save a proposal that they say would create an unaccountable bureaucracy.

"The proponents can bring in big names from outside California who will leave the state before the election," said Al Lundeen, communications director for No on Proposition 87. "It's those of us who live here who will have to live with the negative impacts of Proposition 87."

A Field Poll on Oct. 4 found voters split on the measure, with 44% supporting and 41% opposing. It led in an earlier poll, 52% to 31%.

The involvement of two national political figures should provide a "modest boost" to the Proposition 87 campaign, but it is rare that the involvement of outsiders, including former presidents, makes a big difference in state initiative races, said John J. Pitney Jr., a professor of government at Claremont McKenna College.

"This is an effort to pump up the Democratic base of voters. It's a very smart move, because these are the folks the base will respond to," Pitney said.

Most of the $45.7 million raised so far by the measure's supporters has come from venture capitalists and Hollywood figures, including real estate heir and environmentalist Stephen L. Bing, whom Clinton acknowledged Friday as a friend.

Clinton arrived at the rally in a hybrid Mercury Mariner and, before appearing on the outdoor stage, met privately with a group of children who suffer from asthma made worse by air pollution.

"They are paying the price for our addiction to oil," Clinton said later during the rally.

The former president directly addressed opponents' contention in radio and television ads that already high gas prices would get worse if an oil tax was imposed.

DOJ_NMG_0081306

If oil companies "really thought you were going to pay for this, would they be spending all that money trying to convince you to vote against it?" Clinton asked.

He said that other states, including his native Arkansas, charge an oil extraction tax and that gasoline is less expensive in many of them.

"It never makes any difference in the price," Clinton said, adding that the price is set in the markets.

Opponents said the comparison with other states is not fair because California already has other taxes that are higher, so a new tax would make California an even more expensive place to pump oil.

Economists cited by the opposition have concluded that the proposed tax would result in oil companies bringing in more oil from out of California.

"If you are reliant on sources outside the state, it ends up costing more in the long run," Lundeen said.

Another Record Week For The Dow (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

The Dow Jones industrial average inched to another record close yesterday, giving it three consecutive weeks of triple-digit increases.

The Dow spent much of a quiet session in the red after the strong surge Thursday in which it broke through 11,900 for the first time. Thursday's advance came amid optimism over the health of corporate earnings, and yesterday's gain put the Dow 12,000 benchmark within closer reach.

The average's gain yesterday was the Dow's sixth record close in two weeks. Still, stocks showed little overall movement as traders were unimpressed with a profit report from General Electric and brokerage firms issued negative comments about Home Depot.

Oil prices, which have supported stocks as they have fallen in recent weeks, moved higher, holding the major indexes to modest gains.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 12.81 points, or 0.11 percent, to 11,960.51, passing the record close of 11,947.70 set Thursday.

Broader stock indicators also advanced. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 2.79 points, or 0.20 percent, at 1,365.62, and the Nasdaq composite index was up 11.11 points, or 0.47 percent, at 2,357.29.

Bonds fell, with the price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note down 7/32, at 10019/32, and the yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, rising to 4.80 percent from 4.77 percent late Thursday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices fell.

Crude oil settled up 82 cents at $58.68 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The markets were caught off guard yesterday by a 0.4 percent decline in retail sales last month. The decline, reported by the Commerce Department, was largely a result of a 9.3 percent decline in spending on gasoline. Spending did increase in other areas, however.

"I think this morning's retail sales figure was actually positive once you parse out all the details," said Mike Malone, a trading analyst at Cowen & Company, referring to a drop in spending on gasoline that enabled consumers to spend elsewhere. "For all the talk of the death of the consumer, that is definitely not manifesting itself."

The University of Michigan's preliminary consumer sentiment figure for October was a stronger-than-expected 92.3. In September, the figure was 85.4.

In corporate news, G.E. reported a 6 percent increase in its third-quarter profit, matching Wall Street's expectations, and turned in better-than-expected revenue. G.E., which was down 24 cents at $35.98, held back the S.& P. 500, which is weighted by market capitalization.

Home Depot declined $1, or 2.64 percent, to $36.90 after several brokerage firms issued negative comments on the company, the nation's largest home improvement chain. Home Depot, one of the 30 stocks that make up the Dow, announced plans on Thursday to shake up its executive structure to try to improve performance.

The furniture maker La-Z-Boy fell $1.14, or 7.6 percent, to $13.86, after the company lowered its quarterly earnings and sales forecasts for all three of its divisions, citing a weak retail environment.

Viewpoint, which provides Web search and advertising services, was down 26 cents, or 25.5 percent, at 76 cents a share after cutting its full-year revenue forecast amid soft ad spending and customers' product delays.

FMS Financial rose $4.85, or 18.1 percent, to $31.60 after Beneficial Mutual Bancorp agreed to purchase the company, the parent of Farmers and Mechanics Bank, for $28 a share, or about $183.2 million in cash and stock.

Big 12000 Mark Stays Out Of Reach For Dow (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

As the Dow Jones Industrial Average flirts with a close above 12000, a familiar pattern has emerged. It edges closer to that benchmark, then pulls back.

What happens once it tops that milestone may be less predictable.

The Dow scratched up a small gain Friday, touching another new record close. But it ended short of a fresh 1,000-point benchmark, held back by data showing surprisingly weak retail sales in September. The blue-chip average rose 12.81 points, or 0.1%, to 11960.51, up 0.9% on the week and up 12% for the year.

Friday's finish was the sixth record close for the Dow in nine days. Before the average crossed its old January 2000 peak for the first time early this month, it flirted with that mark for several weeks. Beginning in late September, it crossed the record several times on an intraday basis but closed shy of it.

Strategist Chris Johnson, of the research firm Schaeffer's Investment Research, said the Dow's tentative approach to 12000 echoes the recent chase of the old record, with some investors taking an opportunity to take money off the table before pushing the blue-chip average higher later.

"As soon as the buzz about a record died down a little, it finally pushed through," said Mr. Johnson, who expects the average will make it to 12000 soon. "The real question is how long can it last afterward, and what follows."

The Dow historically performed well following its initial breaches of 1,000-point benchmarks, according to the data firm Ned Davis Research, rising an average of 1.8% in the first month and 14.2% twelve months after such milestones.

But the most recent milestone, which came amid the dot-com bubble, was an unpleasant exception. After the Dow finished above 11000 for the first time in May 1999, it was off 4% just a month later and remained in the red 12 months later, off 1.8%. If 12000 comes soon, it will have taken more than seven years to rise the next 1,000 points.

Some market watchers, like Standard & Poor's strategist Sam Stovall, believe the market is due for a similar pullback now. "It would be good for the market to have a bull-market correction soon, just to make sure it doesn't get ahead of itself," Mr. Stovall told clients in a recent briefing.

For the moment, other indexes are following the Dow higher, for the third straight week of gains.

The broad S&P 500-stock index gained 0.2%, or 2.79 points, to finish at 1365.62, its highest level in more than five-and-a-half years. The S&P is up 1.2% on the week and 9.4% for the year. The technology-focused Nasdaq Composite Index gained 0.5%, or 11.11 points, to 2357.29, up 2.5% on the week and 6.9% for 2006.

Keeping the stock market's mood subdued Friday were fresh data from the Commerce Department showing that U.S. retail sales fell 0.4% last month, contrary to Wall Street's expectation for a small rise. Also, crude-oil prices rose. Contracts for November delivery gained 71 cents, or 1.2%, to end at $58.57 a barrel, off 2% on the week at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose, and bond prices fell: The 10-year note slipped 7/32 point, or $2.19 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.806%.

The dollar strengthened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 119.67 yen, compared with 119.40 yen late Thursday. The euro fell to $1.2510, compared with $1.2554.

GE Earnings Point To Solid Economy (WSJ)

By Kathryn Kranhold

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

Net Rises 6.2% as Strength Of Industrial Unit Benefits From Infrastructure Projects

Robust third-quarter financial results from General Electric Co.'s industrial units suggest that the global economy is weathering both high oil prices and a slowdown in the U.S. housing market.

Overall, GE reported results that met expectations but disappointed some investors. But GE's industrial units posted a 14% increase in revenue and an 18% jump in profit, bolstered by strong sales of power turbines, locomotives and aircraft engines, among other products.

Chairman and Chief Executive Jeffrey Immelt said the global economy is "solid" and GE is benefiting from increased spending on infrastructure projects. "We're seeing great growth around the world," he said in a conference call. For the current quarter, GE projected that revenue would increase 10% and profit would rise 11% to 14%.

DOJ_NMG_0081308

For the third quarter, the Fairfield, Conn., company said net income grew 6.1% to $4.96 billion, or 48 cents a share, from $4.67 billion, or 43 cents a share, a year earlier. The year-earlier results include GE's insurance business, most of which has been sold. GE said profit from continuing operations grew 10% to $5.06 billion, meeting analysts' expectations.

Revenue grew 12% to $40.8 billion. GE had estimated quarterly sales at more than $40 billion; analysts had estimated about $39.9 billion.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

Money & Investing editor Jon Hilsenrath2 discusses GE's earnings report, calling it a mixed bag of positives and negatives.

GE's results were hampered by disappointing results in its commercial-finance unit and continued weakness at its NBC Universal entertainment unit. Operating profit at NBC fell 10%, as projected.

On the other side of the ledger, though, sales at GE's biggest division, infrastructure, increased 20%, and operating profit jumped 24%. The infrastructure unit includes aircraft engines, power turbines, and oil-and-gas and transportation equipment.

GE's health-care and industrial units reported 19% and 10% increases in operating profit, respectively. Across the company, GE said orders grew 15%, faster than revenue, suggesting strong future results.

"Industrial businesses were the real horses here," said Stephen Tusa, an analyst with J.P. Morgan. "These are the high-value businesses where investors want to see the growth."

Even within the industrial units, there were some caution signs. The energy group reported a lower-than-expected profit margin of 14.8%, compared with 20% for the rest of infrastructure.

The energy group is selling more power turbines but Mr. Immelt said prices fell 2% in the quarter. And GE's plastics business continued to be hit by high raw-material prices, reporting operating profit fell 23% to $152 million.

Take a peek8 at what to expect in the quarterly reports of other major companies.

Chief Financial Officer Keith Sherin called the revenue results "a good news story," noting that strong equipment sales will translate into future revenue for GE's services businesses.

Still, investors fretted over the weakness in GE's commercial-finance unit and an unexpectedly low tax rate that lifted profits. Profit at the commercial-finance unit rose 6% to $1.29 billion, short of GE's projection of 10% to 15% growth.

Mr. Sherin said some transactions that were expected to close in the third quarter were not finalized.

3RD-QUARTER REVENUE

By division, in billions

For the third quarter in a row, GE benefited from a lower tax rate than projected. Its financial units reported an 11% tax rate, below GE's projection of 13%. The industrial tax rate was 22%, below analysts' expectations of about 24%. Mr. Sherin said the lower rates lifted profit by about $120 million, or one cent a share.

In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, GE fell 24 cents, to $35.98, the fourth consecutive quarter that GE shares fell on the day it posted financial results. Since posting second-quarter results in July, however, GE shares are up 12%.

General Electric (FT)

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

The US economy is proving resilient – at least if one focuses on the right set of core measures. Excluding autos, gasoline and building materials, retail sales rose by 0.8 per cent during September. The data are volatile but fit the rosy macro-economic picture painted by General Electric, a bellwether if there ever was one.

Incidentally, GE has long mastered the art of drawing attention to flattering measures. On Friday, it trumpeted its strong organic revenue growth, with earnings from continuing operations up 10 per cent. But underlying trends were less impressive. Consolidated sales from continuing operations rose 12 per cent but costs increased even faster, leaving pre-tax profits up just 5 per cent. Minimising taxes remains one of GE's key strengths but there seems to be rather weak operating leverage in the conglomerate's core activities.

GE also suffered from higher raw materials costs in plastics. The turnround at NBC appears on track but has yet to lead to rising profits. Meanwhile, rather spectacular infrastructure equipment sales are depressing margins now but should lead to lucrative service contracts next year. GE's results are also becoming more intelligible. But with the shares up 10 per cent since the last results and half its profits coming from financial services, investors have every reason to tread carefully.

G.E. Reports That Earnings Rose Sharply In The Quarter (NYT)

By Claudia H. Deutsch

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

General Electric, buoyed by strong equipment sales overseas that more than counteracted weak performance in the plastics and NBC Universal units, said yesterday that it earned $5.059 billion in the third quarter of 2006, a 10 percent rise over the period last year. Revenue rose 12 percent, to $40.86 billion from $36.37 billion in the 2005 quarter.

Earnings per share from continued operations, after a $100 million loss from discontinued insurance operations, came in at 49 cents a share, a penny more than last year and in line with Wall Street expectations. G.E. reaffirmed that it would earn $1.97 to $1.99 a share for the year.

"We're finishing up on a solid year, with all the critical metrics heading the right way," Jeffrey R. Immelt, G.E.'s chairman, said on a conference call.

Investors reacted tepidly to yesterday's report, sending G.E. shares down less than a percent, to $35.98. But G.E. shares, which had been stagnant for most of the year, rose 13 percent in the last two months, and analysts do not anticipate a sell-off now.

"They had broad-based 10 percent organic growth, and that is reassuring," said Deane M. Dray, an analyst at Goldman Sachs with a buy rating on G.E. shares. Mr. Dray had anticipated 8 percent growth.

Keith S. Sherin, G.E.'s chief financial officer, noted that equipment orders were up 15 percent, boding well for the year.

"We promised to grow two to three times G.D.P., and this is the seventh quarter we made good on that promise," he said in a telephone interview after the morning call with analysts. "We've invested in technology; we've focused on the customer; we've put insurance in the rearview mirror; and we've invested in growth as a process. Investors are finally responding to those changes."

Investors may also have reacted well to G.E.'s buyback program; the company has repurchased $7.1 billion of its shares this year.

Still, the quarter was not devoid of disappointments. Profit at GE Commercial Finance, which rose 6 percent, fell short of the 10-to-15-percent growth the company had projected. The reason, Mr. Sherin said, was that some deals that were expected to close in the third quarter would instead close later in the year.

Profit at NBC Universal, which is still struggling with prime-time viewership, declined 10 percent in the quarter. Although Mr. Sherin insisted that the unit was poised for a turnaround, he conceded that "NBC is still a work in progress."

And at G.E.'s plastics business, which was unable to raise prices despite soaring costs for raw materials like benzene, operating profit declined 23 percent, to $152 million.

"High commodity prices are a double-edged sword that hurts G.E.'s plastics business even as it helps G.E.'s oil and gas services businesses," said Daniel J. Rosenblatt, an analyst at Marble Harbor Investment Counsel, which owns G.E. shares.

Several analysts suggested that G.E. put plastics on the auction block.

"There is such a strong private equity market out there; this could be a good time for them to sell it," suggested Richard Tortoriello, an analyst with S&P Equity Research who rates G.E. a buy.

In the conference call and news release, Mr. Immelt stressed that G.E. would invest only in the more specialized, higher margin plastics in the portfolio. But he was careful not to suggest a sale of the unit — or to rule out the possibility of one.

Mr. Sherin was similarly circumspect. "We are not currently working on selling plastics," he said, but acknowledged that "there may be pieces of the plastics portfolio that we can use to free up some capital."

Not all investors relish a sale, though. Until this year, many analysts were clamoring for G.E. to sell its consumer businesses, which were then lackluster. Instead, G.E. focused on more expensive appliances. And, appliance sales are up 18 percent this year.

"Just because a business is at the bottom of a cycle doesn't mean that G.E. should jump ship," Mr. Rosenblatt said.

Some analysts also questioned why some of the quarter's upside surprises did not translate into higher-than-expected earnings. G.E.'s tax rate was lower than Wall Street had anticipated. And most analysts had expected revenue to fall shy of $40 billion.

"When revenues are above expectations, earnings would normally also be above expectations," said Timothy M. Ghriskey, chief investment officer at Solaris Asset Management, which does not own G.E. shares. "Were there increased costs? Lower productivity? More marketing and research expenditures? We just don't know."

DOJ_NMG_0081310

The answer is none of the above, Mr. Sherin said. Most of the unexpected sales strength was from infrastructure equipment like turbines, which are among the lower-margin items in G.E.'s portfolio.

Trusting A Promise To Care (LAT)

By Molly Selvin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

Some elderly clients aren't getting the long-term benefits they had counted on. As liabilities grow, some insurers leave the market.

To avoid becoming a financial burden to her children and grandchildren, Vera Smith bought long-term care insurance. Like a growing number of Americans, the 87-year-old retiree saw it as a sensible way to cover care-giving costs not included in Medicare and conventional health insurance.

But almost two years ago, Smith's insurer stopped paying benefits, contending that she violated the policy's terms by moving in with her daughter after she became too frail to take care of herself. That forced Veray Smith, the daughter, to quit her supervisory job and sell her mother's South Los Angeles house so she could afford to stay home with her.

"I'm the full-time caregiver now. It's hard," said Veray, who along with her mother has sued the insurer for bad faith. The insurer, Penn Treaty Network America Insurance Corp., declined to comment.

Consumer advocates and insurance regulators say that lawsuits and complaints like the Smiths' are likely to mushroom in the coming years as more baby boomers and their ailing parents make claims on long-term care insurance.

Sales of such policies grew 65% from 2000 to 2004, but actual and projected payouts have already caused a shakeout that could leave some policyholders with huge bills worried that insurers can't or won't pay. Some insurers who underestimated their potential obligations have sharply hiked their premiums or abandoned the market.

Insurers have denied long-term care claims for a variety of reasons, lawyers say. They have, for example, rejected as inadequate documentation from seniors too sick or distracted to be diligent record keepers. Or they have rescinded policies, saying the individual didn't fully disclose a preexisting medical condition on his or her application.

In response to multiplying consumer complaints, some states are requiring more training for sales agents and limiting insurers' ability to raise premiums, along with other restrictions.

The growing popularity of long-term care insurance "puts pressure on us as regulators to ensure that policies live up to their promise to pay," said Sandy Praeger, the insurance commissioner of Kansas and vice president of the National Assn. of Insurance Commissioners.

Industry representatives say the popularity of these policies speaks to their value for consumers and public confidence that carriers will make good on their promises.

"This product is rigorously regulated" by all 50 states, "each of them representing consumers," said Laura Moore, senior vice president for long-term care insurance at John Hancock Life Insurance Co., one of the largest participants in the market.

But experts say it's hard to predict the future of the market because these policies are fairly new and relatively few policyholders have needed to make claims so far.

For example, Moore said, just 1% of John Hancock's policyholders have claimed benefits. But the company is confident in its financial assumptions and its ability to make good on every policy, she said.

More than 6.1 million Americans were covered by long-term care policies in 2004, up from 5 million in 2002 and 3.7 million in 2000, according to the National Assn. of Insurance Commissioners. Employers have fueled the boom by offering group rates on care policies.

Policies typically cover care-giving, such as home nursing services, up to a fixed amount, such as $100 or $150 a day. But the policyholder must meet certain disability criteria, perhaps severe cognitive impairment or requiring help with dressing or bathing.

Premiums are based on an individual's medical history and the age at which the policy is purchased. For instance, a person in his or her late 40s who buys a typical employer-sponsored group policy can expect to pay premiums of $1,200 a year, Moore said. Annual premiums could rise to $2,000 for an individual policy and higher for an older person or someone with a history of diabetes, cancer or other chronic disease.

But financial pressures have forced some companies out of the long-term market, including CNA Financial Corp., Transamerica Corp. and Fortis Insurance Co., although regulations require that the policies they sold be honored.

Complaints about long-term care policies rose to 2,472 nationally in 2005, up from 2,175 in 2004 and 1,755 in 2003, according to the national insurance commissioners group.

The Smiths' case, regulator Praeger said, is a lesson to those considering a long-term care policy. "You want to make sure it has the most flexibility possible and that help can be delivered in the most settings possible."

DOJ_NMG_0081311

Vera Smith moved to Los Angeles from Tennessee in 1945 with $1 in her pocket, her daughter said, and eventually saved enough from jobs as a cleaning lady and a school cook to buy her house.

The policy she bought in 1998 allowed her to stay in her own home even after she was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease six years ago, paying as much as $100 a day for caregivers.

But after she was hospitalized with a severe urinary tract infection in January 2005, Smith grew so frail that her physician said she needed continuous care. The family decided she should move into her daughter's Phillips Ranch home, where Veray Smith had added a room equipped with grab bars and a wheelchair ramp to accommodate her mother.

That's when insurer Penn Treaty stopped paying for caregivers, Veray said, saying the residence did not qualify as a home under the terms of her policy.

Veray said her mother now has arthritis and diabetes and suffers from the aftereffects of a stroke. A few months ago, she was also diagnosed with bladder cancer.

Her mother's daily needs leave Veray little time for herself or her husband, she said. Apart from the constant care — bathing, helping Vera on and off the commode, doing her hair and cooking for her — Veray said her mother had become "very clingy. She doesn't want me out of her sight."

"I love her, but it's changed the dynamic of my marriage," she added. "I'll be lying in bed with my husband and she'll call, 'Veray, where were you?' "

The suit she and her mother filed in Pomona Superior Court last month accused Penn Treaty of breach of contract, bad faith and unfair dealing.

Veray, who holds power of attorney for her mother, said she notified Penn Treaty of her mother's change of address upon her discharge from the hospital and told the insurer that her mother would be leasing the room for $100 a month.

A month later, Veray received a letter from the company that denied her mother's claims for home helpers, explaining only that "your current residence does not meet the policy definition of a home."

"I sent them a copy of the rent checks, pictures of my mother's room, the building permit from the city and daily care-giving notes," she said. "But they kept saying no."

Linda Carraghan, an attorney with Penn Treaty, declined to respond to the Smiths' charges, saying only that "company policy is not to comment on litigation."

The Smiths' attorney, Frank Darras of Claremont, insists that Penn Treaty's definition of a "residence" in the policy should not disqualify the elder Smith. The policy, he said, defines "your personal residence" as "a private dwelling owned or leased by you, and includes a home for the retired or aged."

Darras, who called the facts in this case "particularly egregious," said he had filed about 20 cases involving such policies and said he received 15 to 20 calls from unhappy policyholders each month.

In most of his lawsuits, Darras said, the carrier disputed the policyholders' inability to care for themselves.

In one bad-faith case Darras settled last year, an elderly woman with Alzheimer's died while awaiting trial against Conseco Inc.

The woman and her husband claimed Conseco requested unreasonable and duplicative documentation of her condition, failed to respond to her request for help and then informed her that the care policy was invalid.

Newspaper Company Returns Outside Funding For Investigation (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - Marilyn W. Thompson, then the executive editor of the Lexington Herald-Leader in Kentucky, faced a problem last year that's afflicting more and more newspaper editors across the country: She wanted to initiate a major reporting project but lacked enough money to pay for it.

Thompson, who wanted the paper to take a deep look at Mitch McConnell, Kentucky's senior U.S. senator, a Republican, came up with an answer: She'd seek support from the Center for Investigative Reporting, a California-based nonprofit group that's financed or conducted groundbreaking work in television and print journalism.

The idea was approved by Thompson's bosses at Knight Ridder, which owned the Herald-Leader at the time. The center approved a $37,500 grant, and Herald-Leader reporter John Cheves went to work.

This week, with Cheves winding up a six-month examination of McConnell - and the senator's staff raising questions about the unusual grant - the Herald-Leader's new owner, McClatchy Co., came to a different conclusion. McClatchy acquired Knight Ridder in June.

DOJ_NMG_0081312

Howard Weaver, McClatchy's vice president for news, announced that the company would reimburse the Center for Investigative Reporting for the grant.

"If we want one of our staff members to do a report for one of our papers, we should pay for it," Weaver said.

The Herald-Leader said the four-part series would be published as planned, beginning Sunday.

The newspaper's report comes on the eve of an election that could make McConnell the majority leader of the Senate.

First elected to the Senate in 1984, McConnell has risen to be the chamber's No. 2 Republican.

He drew national attention for his outspoken opposition to a bipartisan campaign-finance bill that President Bush signed into law in 2002. He was the lead plaintiff in a lawsuit against the measure, which the Supreme Court upheld in December 2003.

McConnell's stance "begged the question" of how he himself had become such a prodigious political fund-raiser, said Thompson, who left the Herald-Leader in July to become the national investigations editor for the Los Angeles Times.

Cheves, 34, was assigned to answer that question. He's worked for the Herald-Leader since 1997, examining the political campaign finances of Democrats and Republicans alike in local, state and federal elections.

The decision to find outside funding put the Herald-Leader on the cutting edge of an industrywide wave of change, as cash-strapped newspapers, facing increased Internet competition, explore new revenue sources beyond the traditional advertising and circulation streams.

"The old business model of just having advertisers and readers fund journalism is giving way to a new model where news organizations go to philanthropic and other groups to subsidize watchdog projects," said Tom Rosenstiel, a former Los Angeles Times reporter who founded the Project for Excellence in Journalism, a research center that monitors the performance of the press.

Public TV and radio networks long have used money from a broad array of foundations to finance documentaries and other news reports, but the practice is more recent in print journalism.

"It would be better if it didn't happen, but the old model does seem to be giving way," Rosenstiel said.

As the Herald-Leader prepares to publish a series on McConnell focusing heavily on how he raises money and who provides it, the senator is trying to turn the tables on the paper.

In a series of e-mails and phone calls to Herald-Leader editors, McConnell's top aides accused the Center for Investigative Reporting of liberal bias.

Don Stewart, McConnell's communications director, said a search of campaign contributions by members of the center's board of directors and staff members had revealed donations only to Democratic candidates or affiliated groups.

McConnell's aides delved further: Cheves' work on McConnell had really been funded by the Deer Creek Foundation, a St. Louis organization that's giving the Center for Investigative Reporting $300,000 over three years to pay for an in-depth look at campaign financing by both parties.

Stewart noted that in 2002, Deer Creek gave $100,000 to New York University's Brennan Center for Justice to help defray the costs of litigating against the lawsuit that McConnell and others brought over the campaign-finance legislation. The Brennan Center was co-counsel in the case.

"Just as (gun-control advocate) Sarah Brady would question the objectivity of a reporter paid by a pro-gun-rights group, it should be easy to see why we question the objectivity of a reporter whose salary was paid by a group that provides millions of dollars to the senator's political opponents," Stewart said.

From 2001 through 2004, the Brennan Center received more than $1 million from the Deer Creek Foundation, according to the foundation's IRS filings. Seven other groups that many conservatives regard as hubs of left-wing politics got a total of nearly $2.6 million from the Deer Creek Foundation, among them Public Citizen, the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities and the Alliance for Justice.

Stewart said that Joan Claybrook, the president of Public Citizen, called McConnell "King of the Prevaricators" in 2001 and accused him of having "feasted on today's legalized bribery and corruption." Deer Creek gave Public Citizen a total of $458,000 from 2001 through 2004.

In its solicitation of grant proposals, Deer Creek says projects should "focus on the preservation and advancement of majority rule in our society, including the protection of basic rights as provided by the Constitution and Bill of Rights and education that relates to this concept."

Mary Hawker, the director of the Deer Creek Foundation, declined to be interviewed. In three faxed statements, however, she challenged McConnell's motives for protesting the Herald-Leader series.

"We think false issues are being raised (what better way to divert attention from the main story)," Hawker said. "Deer Creek has been supporting organizations working for campaign-finance reform since 1984. Organizations receiving grants often point up abuses under current law (by Democrats and Republicans) to support and demonstrate the need for reform."

The allegations that the Center for Investigative Reporting is biased surprised Dan Noyes, its acting executive director.

"We certainly have been attacked over the years, but I'm not sure I've ever seen somebody attack the story in the media before it has even appeared," he said.

The center, Noyes said, collaborated with PBS' "Frontline" program to produce ambitious investigations of the campaign finances of both parties in the 1992 and 1996 presidential elections. A 1997 project, also financed in part by Deer Creek through the center, became an award-winning book called "Secrets: The CIA's War at Home," Noyes said. It revealed the clandestine efforts of President Lyndon Johnson, a Democrat, to undermine reporting that was critical of the Vietnam War, he said.

Cheves, the McConnell series' reporter, said the Center for Investigative Reporting "has reviewed various drafts of the stories" but has "made no suggestions or changes."

The center doesn't show material to the Deer Creek Foundation or any of its other funding sources, Noyes said.

Cheves and his editors at the Herald-Leader said neither group placed any constraints on his reporting. They said he had limited contact with the Center for Investigative Reporting and none with Deer Creek as he produced the series.

"It is extremely thorough and very fair," said Sharon Walsh, the enterprise editor at the newspaper. "I don't know how else I would be able to associate my name with it. I think it's an excellent piece of journalism."

The controversy over the McConnell series and its funding ended up in the lap of Weaver, McClatchy's vice president for news. After consulting with several editors involved in the project and with McClatchy Chief Executive Officer Gary Pruitt, Weaver decided to reimburse the Center for Investigative Reporting for the original grant to the Herald-Leader.

"I'm not uncomfortable with the journalism, and I'm certainly not uncomfortable with the journalist," Weaver said. "I just think that the relationship (with the outside groups) was sufficiently unorthodox that we don't need to do it."

The decision to refund the grant drew various responses from some of the main players in the controversy.

For McConnell, the move comes too late.

"Returning the money after the fact doesn't change the product or any of the concerns we've raised," Stewart said. "It would be hard to explain why the paper is running stories that McClatchy has determined came as the result of an inappropriate funding process."

For Bob Steele, who teaches journalism ethics at the Poynter Institute in Florida and in newsrooms around the country, the decision to return the money was the right one.

"I would think that kind of specific funding by an organization with a direct stake in the players and the issues is ethically problematic," Steele said. "You can't erase the board here in its entirety because there's a history, but at least it's wise for McClatchy to say it's going to pay for the costs of doing this reporting."

The decision disappointed Thompson, the former Herald-Leader executive editor, whose Knight Ridder bosses had praised her for producing important journalism with outside funding.

"The truly important thing is that revelatory reporting will be published, after it has been thoroughly vetted for accuracy and fairness," Thompson said. "Which, of course, was our goal from the very start."

Despite Woes, Bush Offers Fund-Raising As Promised (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 13 — President Bush is not the kind of guy to back out on a promise, especially when it comes to raising money for fellow Republicans.

So it is that Mr. Bush, who has slogged his way through many a fund-raiser this campaign season, plans to make the rounds of what might be called the Congressional newsmakers caucus next week, with back-to-back fund-raisers on Thursday for Representative Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania and Senator George Allen of Virginia.

Mr. Sherwood, who is now vulnerable in what had been considered a safe seat, has admitted having an extra-marital affair with a woman who has accused him of trying to choke her; he has said the “allegation of abuse was never true.”

Mr. Allen is fighting for re-election after a string of controversies involving racially insensitive remarks; his denial and subsequent embrace of his newly discovered Jewish heritage, and reports that he had failed to disclose stock options.

“The president made a commitment, and he’s going to stick with it,” Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said Friday, explaining the fund-raising appearances. “The president supports their quest for election. He understands what’s going on.”

In a year that has seen Republicans tarred by scandal — Mark Foley of Florida resigned his House seat late last month after revelations he sent sexually explicit e-mail messages to teenage pages; Representative Bob Ney of Ohio pleaded guilty on Friday to taking bribes in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, and Randy Cunningham, a former House member, was sentenced to eight years in prison in March for taking bribes — the troubles of Mr. Allen and Mr. Sherwood might seem tame by comparison.

But the president's appearances on their behalf underscore the challenge facing Mr. Bush. With a little more than three weeks to go until Election Day, he and his party are investing time and money to hold seats they did not originally think they would have to defend so aggressively.

"It's all about maintaining the majority and turning out your vote," said Scott Reed, a Republican strategist. "It's normal at this stage of the campaign to go back and tap down some of the wobbly races, and it sounds like Pennsylvania and Virginia are on the top of the trouble list."

Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, said the Allen campaign hoped to raise enough money Thursday to counter the $1 million that the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee recently gave to Mr. Allen's opponent, Jim Webb.

A spokesman for Mr. Sherwood did not return a reporter's call.

Mr. Snow said the president supported both men and was comfortable appearing with them. "George Allen is not a bigot. Period," he said.

As to Mr. Sherwood, Mr. Snow said the president "believes that we are all sinners and we all seek forgiveness."

Bush To Campaign For Troubled Lawmakers (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

AP, October 14, 2006

A congressman who admitted to having an affair and a senator accused of using racial slurs will get some political help from President Bush next week.

Bush will make campaign stops Thursday in Pennsylvania and Virginia to help the two troubled Republicans as the GOP struggles to maintain its endangered grip on the House and Senate.

"The President has made a commitment, and he's going to fulfill the commitment," White House press secretary Tony Snow said Friday.

Bush's appearances are intended to give a boost to four-term Rep. Don Sherwood, R-Pa., and Sen. George Allen, R-Va.

Sherwood had one of the safest seats in Congress as his conservatism played well in his heavily Republican, rural district in northeastern Pennsylvania. Democrats didn't even bother fielding a candidate in the last two elections.

Then last year Sherwood admitted to a five-year extramarital affair with a woman 35 years his junior. He settled a lawsuit claiming he had choked her.

"Mr. Sherwood has certainly admitted to what has gone on, and the president also believes that we're all sinners, we all seek forgiveness, and in this particular case, he's supporting Don Sherwood's candidacy," Snow said.

Allen has spent weeks rebutting accusations he used racist language and liked Confederate symbols. The furor began Aug. 11, when the senator called a volunteer for his opponent "macaca," considered by some to be a racial slur, during a political rally.

"George Allen is not a bigot. Period," Snow said. "And you've had a number of black leaders who've come forward to make the point.

"So the president, absolutely, supports his candidacy," Snow said.

Snow suggested that Allen's opponent, Democrat Jim Webb, was vulnerable for things he has said. Webb, a former Navy secretary under President Reagan, argued in a 1979 magazine article that women are not fit to command men in battle and criticized their admission to the U.S. Naval Academy.

Bush Is Said To Have No Plan If GOP Loses (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, October 13, 2006

Some Republican strategists are increasingly upset with what they consider the overconfidence of President Bush and his senior advisers about the midterm elections November 7–a concern aggravated by the president's news conference this week.

"They aren't even planning for if they lose," says a GOP insider who informally counsels the West Wing. If Democrats win control of the House, as many analysts expect, Republicans predict that Bush's final two years in office will be marked by multiple congressional investigations and gridlock.

"The Bush White House has had no relationship with Congress," said a Bush ally. "Beyond the Democrats, wait till they see how the Republicans–the ones that survive–treat them if they lose next month." GOP insiders are upset by Bush's seeming inability to come up with new ideas or fresh approaches. There is even a heightened sensitivity to the way Bush talks about advisers who served his father.

At the president's news conference on Wednesday, allies of his father complained that the president seemed dismissive of former Secretary of State James Baker, who remains close to his dad and is cochairman of a bipartisan panel studying the war in Iraq.

"I think it's good to have some of our elder statesmen–I hate to call Baker an elder statesman–but to go over there and take a look, and to come back and make recommendations," Bush said. Baker fans felt this made the former secretary seem part of a bygone era. There is also considerable criticism of Bush for making little or no news in his 63-minute encounter with the press.

"He had nothing to say at the press conference," says a prominent GOP insider. "My question is, why call it?"

Tight Races Republican Money Can't Stave Off New Peril In Senate (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

Chances Rise for Democrats Controlling Both Houses As Funding Gap Narrows Paying a Scandal Premium

WASHINGTON -- As their prospects dim for holding control of the House, Republicans are increasingly alarmed they also could lose their Senate majority on Nov. 7, and the party is finding its fund-raising edge isn't going as far as it used to.

The late cash crunch shows just how much an already difficult political environment has worsened for Republicans since the scandal over Rep. Mark Foley's emails to pages erupted two weeks ago. For the first time since taking control of Congress in 1994, party leaders are being forced to pick and choose which of the tight races they can throw money into winning. They simply can't afford them all.

Mounting fears of a growing anti-incumbent wave have led many well-off party veterans to hoard more of their war chests to protect themselves, rather than share with more vulnerable colleagues as they usually would. New York Republican Rep. Peter King, for instance, has outraised a feisty Democratic opponent by sixfold. But with three weeks until the election, he is resisting pressure to send a late check to his party's campaign committee. "The concern any Republican has is: Will there be a political tsunami? Will the bottom drop out of the polls?"

Republicans have increasingly concentrated on three Senate seats -- Tennessee, Missouri and Ohio -- to try to salvage at least a one-seat majority. They currently hold 55 of the Senate's 100 seats, but at least six of those are now seen as vulnerable. The party's national and Senate campaign accounts have recently spent $14.1 million to hold the seats of retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, Missouri Sen. Jim Talent and Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine -- with $8 million spent on Mr. DeWine alone. Yet most polls show Democrats still leading in all three races.

That spending comes at the expense of other vulnerable incumbents, including Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and Montana Sen. Conrad Burns, who are also both running behind. They are getting voter turnout help but not independent advertising support from the national party.

The party's new priorities also divert money away from the overall House contest, in which the Republican National Committee has invested less than $1 million in ads. Meanwhile, many Republican national strategists now expect to lose their House majority, as the number of endangered seats has recently risen and Democrats have been able to hold a bigger portion of their cash back for a late push.

"There is no question this is the most challenging environment we've had since 1994 from lots of perspectives, from issues to targeting races," says RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman. But he noted the party also has raised more money than ever before and plans major voter-turnout help for candidates in tight races. It also is unclear yet whether incumbent Republicans will manage to boost their fund raising in the last weeks to swamp individual Democratic opponents.

Republicans are used to having more money than Democrats but this year the margin is narrower. And Republican money needs to be spread across an unusually large number of races. Those tight contests in turn are creating an air-time crunch that is sending advertising costs soaring compared with just two years ago.

Republicans also are paying a scandal premium. The uproar over Rep. Foley has made it harder for Republican candidates to break through with their desired message. Other recent ethical scandals, such as the Abramoff lobbying case, also have raised the effective price to elect some Republican candidates.

A large number of the toughest Republican races this year are concentrated in expensive urban media markets, particularly in the Northeast. That means Republicans must spend more on defense, and can't invest as heavily in offense.

For instance, Republicans say they can defeat New Jersey's freshman Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez. Republican campaign committees are using direct mail and blast emails to highlight alleged ethical violations by the incumbent, and boosting ground troops for the turnout effort on Election Day. But the real road into the homes of New Jersey voters is by way of the pricey New York and Philadelphia markets, the country's first and fourth biggest. So far, the party hasn't reserved a penny to put its attacks against Mr. Menendez on the airwaves.

DOJ_NMG_0081316

The Republican House campaign committee has reserved about 20% of its national television advertising budget -- $10 million -- just for the Philadelphia market. That is because three House Republicans are endangered there. But that doesn't buy nearly as much airtime as it used to. A 30-second commercial before an 11 p.m. local newscast cost $1,509 in 2004. The current price: $3,044, according to TNS Media Intelligence/cmag, which tracks political advertising.

The Republicans' vulnerability in those races has drawn well-financed challengers in the House contests, as well as the re-election race of Sen. Santorum. Those supply-and-demand pressures have pushed advertising costs skyward.

The investment in Philadelphia means House leaders have to forgo spending elsewhere. After their favored candidate lost in an Arizona primary, the House Republican campaign committee canceled television time it had reserved for the general election contest for that open seat, which now is likely to flip from Republican to Democrat. Party leaders are debating shifting resources away from a Colorado open seat, which also could become a Democratic pickup. And wealthy House incumbents, such as Indiana Rep. Chris Chocola, are being told to dip into their own personal fortunes to pay for their re-elections rather than waiting for a handout from the national committees.

Comparing balance sheets between the two parties, Republicans don't seem in bad shape. The national committee, combined with the party's Senate and House campaign committees, has raised $378 million since this campaign cycle began in January 2005, which still dwarfs the $270 million the Democrats have raised. And Republican candidates outraised the Democrats by more than $10 million through August, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, the most recent figures available.

But those are less comfortable margins than Republicans are used to having, and the overall numbers mask some surprising weaknesses.

The Democrats' campaign committees specifically targeting House and Senate races have surpassed or matched their Republican counterparts in building up cash on hand, which has never happened before. According to Tony Corrado, an expert on political finance at Colby College, the two Democratic congressional committees have helped cut the Republicans' cash edge at this point to less than half the margin it was overall in the 2002 midterms.

"We have to at least surpass them to just stay competitive," Illinois veteran Republican Rep. Ray LaHood says of the Democrats. "This is the most competitive I have ever seen it."

A study by the Campaign Finance Institute, a nonpartisan Washington organization that tracks political money, also holds unsettling news for Republicans. Democratic candidates vying in competitive districts are in their best financial position in years, raising an average of $1 million in the first 18 months of this campaign cycle, compared with an average $1.7 million by the Republican incumbents. At the same point in 2004, Republican incumbents enjoyed a four-to-one advantage over their challengers.

It has fallen to the Republican National Committee, the party's biggest money machine, to provide some breathing room. The RNC reported in August a $28 million edge over the Democratic National Committee. But the vast majority of that money is earmarked for a $30 million national get-out-the-vote effort, which party leaders say will push some marginal candidates over the finish line.

The Foley scandal could make it even harder for Republicans to sustain their cash advantage. The day before his emails became public, the House Republican campaign committee chairman, Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York, told members he was raising his "battleground" budget by $5 million, to $22 million.

In short order, questions about the House leadership's management of the scandal -- including Mr. Reynolds himself -- tarnished some of the Republicans' biggest fund-raiser headliners. Embattled candidates across the country were already shunning money-raising events with unpopular President Bush. Now they are avoiding fund-raisers that feature House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, and House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio.

To keep control of the House, Republicans have to limit their net losses at 14 seats. To keep control of the Senate, they can't drop more than five. But, as the election nears, they are being forced to defend an ever-widening field.

Since the Foley furor, the number of House Republican seats in play has moved from 36 to 43, according to Amy Walter, of the Cook Political Report. The number of Democrats in some peril is unchanged at nine.

At the same time, Republicans seem to have to pay an increasing price to hold on to each seat. In a June special election, the national party committees spent about $5 million to hold the seat of Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the San Diego lawmaker who pleaded guilty to bribery. Their candidate, Rep. Brian Bilbray, won with 78,341 votes. The cost per ballot: about $64. In the 2004 midterms, Mr. Cunningham spent less than $6 per vote, $939,000 overall.

In Rhode Island, Republicans spent at least $1.6 million defending incumbent Sen. Lincoln Chafee against a primary challenge from a candidate party leaders considered too conservative to win in November. Mr. Chafee won with 34,936 votes, a cost-per-vote ratio for the party committees of $46. In 2000, Mr. Chafee faced no primary challenge but won the general election spending only about $10 per vote.

In Pennsylvania, the re-election campaign of Republican Rep. Jim Gerlach shows the unusual budget strains facing his party this year.

Mr. Gerlach was elected to Congress in 2002 after stints in both chambers in the state legislature. In both his congressional races he won by a narrow 51%-49% ratio. His 2004 Democratic challenger, Lois Murphy, is racing against him again this time. Mr. Gerlach says he made his first round of fund-raising calls for this campaign in January 2005 -- less than two months after his 2004 re-election.

Mr. Gerlach calculates he has held 60 to 70 fund-raisers a year to collect the approximately $3 million he has budgeted for the campaign, about a million more than he spent in 2004. But Ms. Murphy sometimes has matched or surpassed his fund raising, and boosted her campaign budget to more than $3 million after Mr. Gerlach unleashed an early round of direct mail accusing her of favoring tax increases.

The House Republican committee is rushing to Mr. Gerlach's aid, earmarking $4 million of its $10 million for Philadelphia TV ads just for his race. The Democratic House committee is countering with about $3 million. "We have to make up for that and we will. I will not lose this election for a few million dollars," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said in an interview.

Mr. Gerlach's campaign finances also have been affected by scandals. In August, he returned a $7,000 donation to him from Ohio Rep. Bob Ney, who pleaded guilty Friday in the Abramoff lobbying scandal. He has refused to give back the $30,000 that came from former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay's campaign accounts, arguing that though the former Texas lawmaker has been charged with money laundering, he hasn't been convicted of anything.

Now Mr. Gerlach is grappling with fallout from the Foley scandal. He canceled a fund-raiser that was to be headlined by Majority Leader Boehner, whose role in managing the crisis is a subject of scrutiny, and quickly transferred a $1,000 check from Mr. Foley to charity. During a recent senior-center appearance, Mr. Gerlach gave up trying to talk about terrorism or taxes when it became apparent that the Foley matter was chiefly on his audience's minds. "Did you think people knew?" one participant asked. As the congressman dodged, another woman pressed him that "there had to be some" hints.

Mr. Gerlach opted for political survival and distanced himself from his party leaders. The disclosure of the so-called "overly friendly" email to a page, initially brushed aside by House leaders, "should have set off some bells and whistles," he said, "because that's not a normal thing."

Incumbents Hold Cash Advantages (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Incumbent senators entered the final weeks of the midterm campaign with substantial sums in their bank accounts, but challengers also stepped up fundraising to keep races competitive and ad buyers busy to the very end.

Republican Sen. Mike DeWine, locked in one of the fiercest Senate races this year, had a $3 million advantage over Democratic challenger Rep. Sherrod Brown at the end of September. However, Brown had the edge on fundraising for the quarter, according to reports they plan to file with the Federal Election Commission.

In Connecticut, Sen. Joe Lieberman, running as an independent, had $4.7 million in the bank as he attempts to fend off millionaire Democrat Ned Lamont. New Jersey Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez had $5.5 million at the end of September, compared with $3.17 million for Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr.

Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell of Washington said she had $3.5 million in the bank after raising $2 million in the past quarter. Her opponent, Republican Mike McGavick, outraised her this quarter, bringing in nearly $2.2 million for the period ending Sept. 30, and had $2.1 million on hand.

In Rhode Island, incumbent Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee reported about $700,000 on hand, compared with $1.4 million for his challenger, Sheldon Whitehouse.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton had more than $14 million in her campaign account as she coasts through an easy re-election campaign in New York. Any money she has left over after the Nov. 7 election could be used in a possible presidential campaign, giving her a head start over her potential opponents.

Democrat James Webb, who is seeking to unseat Republican Sen. George Allen of Virginia, reported having $2.7 million on hand after raising $3.5 million in the quarter. Allen, who had not released his new quarterly numbers, had $6.6 million on hand at the end of June.

As a rule, incumbents tend to raise more money than challengers. In this election cycle, that advantage helps Republicans. But Democratic operatives say third-quarter fundraising by their candidates have helped close that gap.

DOJ_NMG_0081318

In Ohio, DeWine had $4.5 million in the bank compared with Brown's $1.2 million. But Brown managed to raise slightly more money since July than DeWine. The Brown campaign also said its cash-on-hand figure was lower because it had paid for about $2.5 million in advertising until election day.

Lamont's campaign did not immediately release his campaign finance data. He has spent about $9 million of his own money to unseat Lieberman, including a $2 million contribution this week.

In New Jersey, Kean raised $1.76 million in the quarter.

For Chafee, his lower cash-on-hand total reflects the enormous effort he made to beat back a primary challenge from Republican Steve Laffey on Sept. 12. Chafee has had little time to resupply his campaign account. Chafee, who lists his net worth between $41 million and $64 million, could also write a check to his campaign as he did during the primary.

The deadline for July-September finance reports is Sunday. Several campaigns were beginning to release their figures Friday.

At this point in a campaign, the amount of cash in the bank can determine a campaign's ability to surge ahead or defend against an opponent's momentum. The money is also a factor in helping national parties decide where to spend their resources.

In Ohio, for example, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, the National Republican Senatorial Committee and the Republican National Committee have been spending heavily on television advertising and other means of reaching voters. Outside groups have also weighed in with ads.

Campaign strategists said the amount of cash candidates had was especially important in states with a number of media markets, such as Ohio, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Smaller states such as Montana and Rhode Island are less expensive.

Kerry Says GOP Lied About Foley, Iraq (AP)

By Holly Ramer

Associated Press, October 14, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. (AP) -- Sen. John Kerry, a potential presidential candidate in 2008, likened the congressional page scandal to the war in Iraq and the handling of North Korea, saying that Republicans have lied repeatedly.

"A lie, a lie, a lie, a lie. What we have in Washington is a house of lies, and in November, we need to clean house," Kerry, D-Mass., said Friday night during the New Hampshire Democratic Party's annual fall fundraising dinner.

"They tell us we're making progress in Iraq and that there is no civil war. That is a lie," he said. "It's immoral to lie about progress in that war in order to get through a news cycle or an election cycle."

Kerry criticized the Bush administration for blaming the North Korean nuclear test on former President Clinton.

"That is a lie. North Korea's nuclear program was frozen under Bill Clinton. When George W. Bush turned his back on diplomacy, Kim Jong Il turned back to making bombs, and the world is less safe because a madman has the Bush bomb," he said.

Republicans also are lying when they claim the page scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley is a Democratic plot to win the midterm elections, Kerry said.

"This issue is here because of a Republican cover-up," he said. "And those from the party that preaches moral values that covered this up have no right to preach moral values anymore."

Responding to the speech, Wayne Semprini, chairman of the New Hampshire Republican State Committee, said Americans didn't buy what Kerry and the Democrats said in 2004.

Webb Has Profitable Quarter, But Allen Still Leads (WP)

By Tim Craig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Democrat James Webb outraised Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) by nearly $1 million from July to October, according to campaign finance reports released yesterday that reflected a surge in support for the challenger after Allen made several controversial comments that dramatically tightened the race.

Allen still has twice as much in the bank as Webb, but both candidates said they will have enough money in the campaign's closing weeks to compete on TV in the crucial advertising war that will help decide the outcome.

Allen raised $2.6 million between July 1 and Sept. 30 and reported $5.5 million in the bank, according to his finance report, the last required before the Nov. 7 election.

Webb, who released his numbers earlier this month, raised $3.5 million during the same period. Webb had $2.7 million in the bank at the end of September, compared with the $437,000 he had after winning the Democratic nomination in June.

DOJ_NMG_0081319

"Obviously, Webb has had a lot of momentum in the last two or three months," said Charlie Cook, editor of the Cook Political Report, which last week rated Virginia's Senate race a tossup. "There are a lot of people who didn't give to Webb six months ago because they didn't think he had a chance, but now he has a chance and they are jumping in."

Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager, discounted Webb's recent fundraising success by pointing to the amount of money his candidate still had in the bank.

"What is important is the bullet you have left to shoot," said Wadhams, who accused Webb of raising all of his money from national Democratic leaders who support higher taxes.

Kristian Denny Todd, a Webb spokeswoman, countered that Wadhams is "desperate" because Webb is picking up support.

"This shows what we have been saying all along: The more people get to know George Allen, the more they know George Allen is wrong for Virginia and Jim Webb is the right choice," Todd said.

The Federal Election Commission reports do not take into account the amount of money each candidate has raised so far this month. Vice President Dick Cheney headlined an Allen fundraiser last week in Fairfax. Webb spent Thursday and Friday raising money in Atlanta.

Allen's and Webb's bank accounts probably will get another boost next week when the current president and a former president travel to Virginia to lend their support. President Bush will appear at an Allen fundraiser in Richmond on Thursday, the same day former president Bill Clinton will attend a Webb fundraiser at the McLean home of former senator Charles S. Robb (D).

The high-profile visits underscore how the race has become one of the most closely watched Senate contests in the country. With less than a month to go until the election, both candidates and their affiliates are expected to pour millions of dollars into television commercials, direct mail, telephone calls and other efforts to mobilize voters.

Allen, a former governor who has raised $13 million for his reelection, was expected to crush Webb, a political newcomer, in the money race this year. In June, Allen had a 15-to-1 money advantage over Webb.

But Webb campaign officials say their fundraising soared after Allen made international headlines when he referred to a Webb campaign aide of Indian descent as "macaca" at a GOP rally in Southwest Virginia on Aug. 11. The term is considered a racial slur in some cultures.

After facing weeks of questions about his racial sensitivity, Allen watched his once-double-digit lead over Webb in the polls vanish. A Mason-Dixon poll released earlier this month showed the race tied.

The tightening of the race forced Allen to spend $3.6 million between July and October, compared with $1 million spent by Webb, according to finance reports.

Webb began advertising heavily only this month, to respond to weeks of assertions by Allen that Webb wrote a 1979 article that was demeaning to military women. Webb campaign officials say fundraising is still brisk, including $100,000 in online donations so far this week.

Webb also is being aided by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which this week began a $1 million ad buy focusing on Allen's voting record and his macaca comment. The committee also is planning a $750,000 ad buy next week, according to sources in both campaigns. The National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee has paid for direct-mail brochures, but it is unclear whether it also will start airing television or radio ads in the state. These amounts are independent expenditures that do not have to be listed on the candidates' reports.

Allen still has the advantage in money; yesterday, he released his second ad in a week accusing Webb of wanting to raise taxes. The ad will cost the campaign more than $600,000, an aide said.

Cook, who said Virginia is a key battleground in efforts by the Democrats to regain control of Congress, expects a lot of money to flow into the state between now and Election Day.

"If Webb loses, I am not sure it's going to be because of money," he said.

Allen's Ads Put Webb On Defense (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth Mclaughlin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

U.S. Sen. George Allen will reprise his role as a quarterback on the attack, while James H. Webb Jr. employs a defensive strategy in the final weeks before the election in Virginia's Senate race.

Mr. Allen, a Republican, will try to steamroll Mr. Webb, a Democrat, with a barrage of political ads before the Nov. 7 election.

The strategy has so far forced Mr. Webb to deflect a different issue each day, but Mr. Allen has been most effective pummeling the Democrat on taxes and social issues to rally his conservative base.

DOJ_NMG_0081320

"Jim Webb, Hillary Clinton and their liberal allies in Washington don't want to give constitutional protection to traditional marriage," an announcer says on an Allen radio ad. "And if they don't share our values on something as basic as marriage, how can we trust them on any issue?"

The ad, which is running in rural parts of the state, is one of several that hit the airwaves this week to paint Mr. Webb as a liberal out of touch with Virginia values.

The Webb campaign fired back.

"All George Allen has left are lies," Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny-Todd said. "The latest ad contains the baseless charge that Jim Webb wants to redefine marriage. Radio stations should immediately pull the ad."

Mr. Webb, who served as secretary of the Navy under President Reagan in 1987-88, is appealing to centrist Republicans and voters fed up with the Iraq war.

The decorated Vietnam War veteran is no stranger to a fight, and has surrounded himself with tough and seasoned Democrats, including former President Bill Clinton, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and former Gov. Mark Warner.

"We have an administration that is telling us that the global war on terror is World War three or four, take your pick, and that Iraq is the central battlefront on the central war on international terror," Mr. Webb said at a recent campaign appearance in Dumfries, Va. "But ask yourself, how many of them are risking their own kid?"

Mr. Webb's son Jimmy, a 24-year-old lance corporal in the Marine Corps, is in Ramadi, one of the most dangerous regions of Iraq.

The Democrat's campaign said Mr. Allen's marriage ad includes the false claim that Mr. Webb "would like to change the definition of marriage."

Mr. Webb said that as a Christian, he thinks marriage should be between one man and one woman, but he plans to vote against the proposed amendment on the Virginia ballot because he thinks it takes rights away from all unmarried couples.

"We have a law right now that defines marriage," he said at a debate Monday night. "We don't need to ruin the Constitution."

Mr. Allen also is telling voters Mr. Webb would repeal President Bush's tax cuts, which forced the Democrat to run an ad rebutting the claim.

"Take a look in your wallet. Are you rich?" asks the Allen radio ad. "Jim Webb thinks you are. He thinks you don't need a tax cut. In fact, he thinks you aren't paying enough taxes."

Mr. Webb's ad responds: "George Allen's lying again. Truth is, Jim Webb's plan cuts taxes for middle class families and veterans."

Mr. Webb, who benefited from free publicity after numerous Allen missteps over the past two months, dismissed Mr. Allen's commercials this week as employing "Karl Rove" tactics and claims he is misquoted.

"What I've said is any tax breaks that benefit a large section of the American people, I am for," he told reporters Wednesday.

But Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams responded: "It's pretty clear that Webb's refusal to agree to a 'no-new tax' pledge means what we all know, that he would join Hillary Clinton and Ted Kennedy in rolling back the tax cuts Senators Allen and Warner helped pass in 2001 and 2003."

Several elements of Mr. Bush's tax cuts are set to expire over the next few years if Congress does not renew them.

Kean Campaign Shows Improvement In Its Fund-Raising Efforts (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 13 — Posting his strongest fund-raising numbers to date, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr. has significantly reduced what had been a three-to-one advantage in resources for his opponent, Senator Robert Menendez, according to preliminary campaign finance data released on Friday.

Yet in a caustic race that figures to be dominated by television advertising in its final four weeks, Mr. Menendez, the Democratic incumbent, still enjoys a solid lead in overall cash on hand, $5.5 million compared to $3.2 million for Mr. Kean.

From July 1 to Sept. 30, Mr. Kean, a Republican, raised nearly $1.8 million and spent $866,000 — eclipsing his best fund-raising efforts over a three-month period, when he raised $1.6 million in the first quarter of this year.

Mr. Menendez, meanwhile, had his slowest quarter of the year, collecting almost $1.4 million. And with a television blitz that began in September, he spent $3.4 million, or almost double what he had spent in the previous two quarters combined.

The campaigns are required to file detailed breakdowns of contributions with the Federal Election Commission on Sunday, but said they would not publicly release those fuller reports for at least a week.

DOJ_NMG_0081321

In an election year in which control of Congress could be in the balance, the New Jersey totals are part of a national spreadsheet of campaign data that will be used to help gauge the wherewithal of Democrats and Republicans heading into Nov. 7.

In Connecticut, for instance, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman reported having $4.7 million on hand. He raised $6.1 million from July 20 to Sept. 30, and spent $4.9 million in that period. Mr. Lieberman is running as an independent after having been defeated in the Democratic primary by Ned Lamont, who did not release his financial report on Friday. Mr. Lamont, a cable television executive, has previously said that he contributed $4.7 million to his own campaign since the Aug. 8 primary.

In New Jersey, the third-quarter fund-raising figures had been much anticipated, because recent polls have showed Mr. Menendez, who was appointed in December to fill the seat, and Mr. Kean in a virtual tie.

Steele Hits Cardin For Linking Him To Bush, GOP (WT)

By Jon Ward, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

HAGERSTOWN, Md. -- A visibly angry Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele yesterday lashed out at Democratic attempts to tie him to President Bush and national Republicans in the U.S. Senate race, saying that he refuses "to be the whipping boy for or against the Republican Party."

"You know, I'm tired of this. I've got to justify everything the administration does, or everything it doesn't do. This is not about that," Mr. Steele told reporters after participating in a forum conducted by the Washington County Chamber of Commerce.

The Republican Senate nominee noted that his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, "mentioned the president 113 times" during their debate last week.

"If he wanted to run against George Bush, he should have done it two years ago," said Mr. Steele, who began airing a TV ad this week that criticizes both parties.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele took part in a forum that had been billed as a debate. The Senate candidates separately took to the podium, addressed the Chamber of Commerce and answered questions from the audience.

The 10-term congressman from Baltimore talked at length about health care, transportation, and especially his desire to balance the federal budget.

"Mr. Steele talks about changing the direction of America," said Mr. Cardin, who spoke to the chamber before his Republican rival. "I don't know how you change the direction of America when you agree with the president on so many issues."

Democratic ads for Mr. Cardin have linked Mr. Steele to the president and Republican leaders, such as strategist Karl Rove.

Asked if he thinks the general unpopularity of national Republicans will affect his campaign, Mr. Steele said: "I'm not going to stand here and try to be the whipping boy for or against the Republican Party because this is the same nonsense ... that keeps this cycle going.

"Let's move forward," he said. "You know what's going to make the difference between my winning this seat and losing this seat? Me. Me. Nothing else. Me. That's why this is a conversation between me and the people."

Mr. Steele, who is the first black to win a statewide election in Maryland, said that he is "feeling a pulse and a heartbeat in this state that is not being captured in polls. I'm excited about that."

Mr. Steele previously had distanced himself from Mr. Bush, saying that his Republican Party affiliation is a "scarlet letter" in Maryland, where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-to-1. But he also has called the president his "homeboy."

The Democratic strategy of linking Mr. Steele to national Republicans was recommended last spring by a pollster who said that Mr. Steele was a "unique threat" to Democrats' monopoly on black voters.

Pollster Cornell Belcher identified an "emerging black swing vote" and advised Democrats to turn Mr. Steele "into a typical Republican in the eyes of voters, as opposed to an African-American candidate."

Recent polls have shown Mr. Cardin leading by an average of 10 points. But cracks have appeared in Democratic unity since Mr. Cardin defeated Kweisi Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, in the party's Senate primary.

Black political, religious and business leaders have said that there is growing grass-roots discontent with the lack of minority leaders in the Democratic Party. They say that some black voters, who are mostly registered Democrats, are going to cross party lines and vote for Mr. Steele.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele have scheduled two debates -- Oct. 25 on WJLA-TV (Channel 7) and Oct. 29 on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Opposition To Abortion Won't Affect Job, Steele Says (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0081322

By Matthew Mosk And Ann E. Marimow, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Maryland Senate candidate Michael S. Steele said yesterday that his strong personal opposition to legalizing abortion would not factor into his work in Washington, or his evaluation of a nominee for U.S. Supreme Court justice, should he be elected next month.

"I have no litmus test in that regard because my constitutional obligation is to represent the people of the state," said Steele, who is Catholic.

"In that instance, you put on the bench the best jurist because our country is more than one issue, even though it's a profound issue," he said during a meeting with Washington Post editors and reporters. "I have never subscribed to a benchmark, litmus test mentality. And I never would. I never will."

The Republican candidate was less emphatic when asked about gun rights and suggested that his general support might not extend to assault weapons.

"You draw the line. I mean, what do you need an assault weapon for?" Steele said. The National Rifle Association has spent about $4,000 in support of his bid this year, campaign finance records show.

The remarks highlighted a continued effort by Steele -- who is running in a state where Democrats outnumber Republicans by nearly 2 to 1 -- to soften the edges on his conservative views on a number of incendiary social issues.

They came the day after the lieutenant governor began a television ad criticizing his party for implementing an education policy, the No Child Left Behind act, that he says "teaches to the test."

"It's clear that Michael Steele will say anything to get elected," said Oren Shur, a spokesman for Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, Steele's Democratic rival. "At this point, it's hard to tell if Steele is just hiding his support for Bush's convictions or if he has no real convictions at all."

If there has been any brushback from the Republican National Committee, Steele said he was unaware of it. Steele said yesterday, "They ain't gonna give up on the brother."

Steele has spent much of his campaign distancing himself from the GOP in a year when the president is polling below 40 percent nationally and lower in Maryland.

Earlier yesterday, Steele and Cardin spoke about economics, health care and gas prices at a forum held by the Hagerstown-Washington County Chamber of Commerce.

The candidates stood at the same podium, answering many of the same questions, but they spoke separately. They overlapped briefly, shaking hands in the back of the hotel ballroom as Cardin departed and Steele arrived.

Their contrasts in style and substance were striking. Cardin, sounding like a policy professor, presented himself as a fiscally responsible "deficit hawk" with a record of working with Republicans during his 20 years in Congress.

"I'm a hawk on paying the bills," Cardin told the audience of about 100 people. "It doesn't sell well in the polls. People love tax cuts; people love big spending. Well, legislators have to make tough decisions."

Steele, emphasizing his personal story, portrayed himself as an outsider who would bring a small-business owners' perspective to what he called out-of-touch official Washington.

"Washington, in my view, has gotten outside itself," he said. "It is beyond the ivory tower. It is a place that none of us have any clue of what they're doing because they have no clue as to what's going on in your daily lives."

On policy, the candidates' differences were most apparent on two issues. Cardin opposes suspending the federal gas tax because, he said, the revenue is needed to pay for critical transportation projects. Steele said he would suspend the tax for four months to give consumers a break. On health care, Cardin supports a universal coverage plan similar to legislation passed in Massachusetts. Steele prefers to give businesses more flexibility to pool their resources.

Rural Areas' Racism May Cost Steele Votes (WT)

By S.a. Miller, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

Residents in Western Maryland and on the Eastern Shore say there are many whites among them who will not vote for a black candidate, such as Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, who is running for the U.S. Senate.

"Here in rural parts of the state, race might be an issue. It shouldn't, but it might," Greg Slick, a physical education teacher at North Hagerstown High School, said at a recent Friday night varsity football game. "They are not openly going to say it."

Mr. Slick, 52, a registered Republican who is white, said he will vote for Mr. Steele. But he added that the World Knights of the Ku Klux Klan is not based in nearby Sharpsburg by accident, despite public outcry every summer over the group's annual rally at Antietam National Battlefield.

"Someone is drawing them here," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0081323

David Marshall, 54, a white waterman from Crisfield on the Eastern Shore, said he is sure some of the people he works with will vote against Mr. Steele because of his skin color.

However, he said he and his friends will vote for Mr. Steele, regardless of his race.

"The people I talk to say it won't affect their vote," Mr. Marshall said on a recent afternoon as he moored his trawler.

Racial politics in Maryland has focused on the Democratic Party's efforts to secure support among its most loyal bloc -- black voters, who increasingly say that the party has taken them for granted.

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin -- the Democratic Senate nominee who is a white, 10-term congressman from Baltimore -- is trying to woo black votes amid criticism that the state party's ticket lacks diversity.

But white voters in Republican strongholds in rural areas pose a threat to the senatorial ambitions of Mr. Steele, who already has battled race-baiting by Democrats in his Senate bid.

"On the Eastern Shore, there are a lot of rednecks," said Dawn Thomas, 46, a white waitress at a Kent Island restaurant. "I know how my family is. They come from over here, and they're very prejudiced."

A Steele campaign adviser said the Senate nominee can do little to counter racism. However, the adviser remained confident that conservative rural voters from both parties will overwhelmingly support Mr. Steele.

In 2002, Mr. Steele became the first black to win a statewide election, as the running mate of Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. The Ehrlich-Steele ticket drew 2-to-1 support among voters in rural areas, such as Allegany, Washington and Wicomico counties. During a luncheon Monday at The Washington Times, Mr. Ehrlich said much of Mr. Steele's support is from white women.

In last month's primary election, Mr. Steele easily won the 10-candidate contest for the Republican Senate nomination, collecting thousands of votes over many white contenders who garnered only double-digit support in rural jurisdictions.

Such results prompted Paula A. Lampton, chairwoman of the Washington County Republican Central Committee, to say that race is not an issue.

"I've lived here for 30 years and I haven't seen it," she said. Mr. Steele "is very well-received when he comes here. He definitely represents our values and our needs in this portion of Western Maryland."

In addition, Catherine Poe, president of the Talbot County Democratic Forum, said she expects solid support for Mr. Steele among Republicans on the Eastern Shore.

"I know the Republican base is jazzed up and working way hard," she said. "Republicans are much more disciplined. They will stick with their guy."

However, an elected Eastern Shore official -- a white Republican -- said privately that racism probably will hurt Mr. Steele "a little bit" among white voters.

In Hagerstown, Gail Curtis, a black hairstylist, said local residents have shouted racial slurs at her and her children. She has "no doubt" that some white voters will be reluctant to cast a ballot for Mr. Steele because of his race.

"It's bad," said Ms. Curtis, 35. "This town is extremely set back in time. But it is changing."

Hagerstown City Council member Alesia Parson-McBean, a Democrat who last year became the first black elected to the council, said racial tensions are easing but acknowledged the persistence of old prejudices.

"I know within my first year [in office] I received hate mail and all these things," Mrs. Parson-McBean said. "It splintered people and caused division in our city, and much of the division was based on race."

Last year, Mrs. Parson-McBean and black high-school students were the target of death threats from Jeffrey Shifler, who was a member of the Boonsboro Police Department.

Shifler, 42, pleaded guilty in August to federal civil rights charges for hate mail and telephone calls to the council member threatening to burn her house down and for calls to the school board threatening to shoot black students. He is scheduled to be sentenced in December.

"That was considered amazing for this area," Mrs. Parson-McBean said of Shifler's prosecution. "I'm hoping we already learned from the ugliness of the past and are headed to a brighter future."

Mr. Steele's potential to break the Democratic lock on black urban votes has made Maryland's Senate race one of the country's most closely watched campaigns and one of the most fiercely fought between the national parties.

The Senate has one black member -- Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat and the fifth black senator in U.S. history.

The country has not had a black governor since L. Douglas Wilder, a Virginia Democrat, left office 12 years ago. He was the country's second black governor: Pinckney Benton Stewart Pinchback led Louisiana from 1872 to 1873.

Mr. Steele is among three black U.S. Senate candidates and three black gubernatorial candidates -- a record number -- on the Nov. 7 ballot. Only Democrat Deval Patrick in the Massachusetts governor's race is ahead in the polls.

To Invade GOP Strongholds, Tap Bay Area (LAT)

By Rone Tempest, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0081324

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

Activists are flooding into the districts of Reps. Pombo and Doolittle on behalf of Democratic challengers, making the races more competitive.

BERKELEY — The congressional fundraiser was at a pub in the heart of this liberal political stronghold. A local band, The Flux, entertained with a tune titled "Impeach the President."

The focus of attention: two candidates vying for seats in bedrock conservative districts to the east, currently occupied by Republicans John T. Doolittle of Granite Bay and Richard W. Pombo of Tracy.

Although most experts still give them a narrow edge, Doolittle, 55, seeking his ninth term, and Pombo, 45, pursuing his eighth, are in the toughest fights of their political careers going into the Nov. 7 election.

Their Northern California races are considered the most competitive in the state. President Bush demonstrated his concern by showing up at fundraisers for the duo last week, garnering more than $1 million for their campaigns.

But the prospect of upset victories contributing to a Democratic takeover of Congress — potentially installing San Francisco's Nancy Pelosi as speaker — has added another dimension to the Doolittle and Pombo races. Hundreds of volunteers and activists in Berkeley and other Bay Area communities have mobilized on the Democratic side, raising money, manning phone banks and carpooling into the districts to canvass neighborhoods for votes.

"They are already trying to figure out the color of Nancy Pelosi's rug in the speaker's office," said Allan Hoffenblum, publisher of the nonpartisan California Target Book, an election compendium.

The Berkeley event at the Albatross Pub was preceded Sept. 27 by a rally at Oakland's Grand Lake Theater at which former San Francisco mayor and state Assembly Speaker Willie Brown urged the crowd to fan out into the Doolittle and Pombo districts.

"There is a concerted effort to nationalize the elections," complained Doolittle, interviewed after the Bush fundraiser at the Serrano Country Club in suburban Sacramento. "You've got a lot of them being bused in here from the Bay Area — left-wing, antiwar activists."

Doolittle, whose 4th District stretches from the Sierra foothills east of Sacramento to the Oregon border, is opposed by retired Air Force Lt. Col. Charlie Brown, 56, of Roseville. Brown, a soft-spoken Air Force Academy graduate, is counting on his military background to help him in what is arguably California's most conservative district, based on Republican registration.

Pombo, whose 11th District includes Bay Area suburbs and San Joaquin Valley ranch lands, is challenged by wind energy scientist Jerry McNerney, 55, of Pleasanton. McNerney's intellectual and environmental credentials are an asset in some of the high-tech corners of the district, which includes the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory.

Pombo and McNerney faced off last week in a debate in Tracy, Pombo's hometown.

The incumbent defended the Bush policy in Iraq.

"Going to war in Iraq was to protect this country," Pombo said. "I would rather take the war over there than fight it here."

McNerney countered that "we need to find a smart and a tough way to end this war."

The McNerney-Pombo contest is a repeat of the 2004 election, which Pombo won handily. Since 2004, however, both Doolittle and Pombo have suffered from their association with convicted Washington lobbyist and power broker Jack Abramoff.

Doolittle's wife, Julie, owns a political consulting firm that did extensive work for Abramoff. Doolittle has also been criticized for paying his wife's firm, Sierra Dominion Financial Solutions, a 15% commission on campaign contributions.

When President Bush raised $600,000 at the Oct. 3 fundraiser, Julie Doolittle earned $90,000.

Pombo received $7,500 in campaign contributions from Abramoff and $30,000 from Abramoff clients.

Like Doolittle, Pombo has also come under attack for bestowing campaign funds on his immediate family, including several hundred thousand dollars for his wife, Annette, and brother Randall.

On the heels of the Abramoff matter came the congressional page scandal that led to the resignation of Rep. Mark Foley, a Florida Republican. With the environment for Republicans deteriorating, the independent Cook Political Report last week downgraded both the Pombo and Doolittle races from likely GOP victories to merely leaning Republican.

Still, both Doolittle and Pombo have amassed significant campaign reserves. In the last federal reporting period, Pombo had 10 times more cash on hand than McNerney, a disparity that could give the incumbent a big advantage when television ads begin airing in earnest this month.

Both the Brown and McNerney candidacies, however, have been bolstered by activists from the Bay Area, the most Democratic chunk of the state.

"I'm overjoyed to find a place where I can work and perhaps make a difference," said Keith Miller, 69, a retired UC Berkeley mathematics professor who spent a recent evening manning a phone bank for McNerney in a downtown Oakland union hall.

In addition to phone banks and fundraisers, the activists organize several convoys a week into the Doolittle and Pombo districts. Their energy and zeal are evident, if a tad florid.

"Yesterday, Sept. 23, 2006, a date which will live in infamy," blogged San Jose volunteer Jason Spitzer, 43, a semiconductor engineer who has made three trips into the San Joaquin Valley on behalf of McNerney. "The passionate progressive patriots of America suddenly and deliberately attacked the residential neighborhoods of the city of Manteca."

The volunteer efforts for Brown and McNerney have impressed veteran political observers.

"They see this national Democratic tsunami in which they are on the verge of taking over the House for the first time since 1994," Hoffenblum said. "The best they can do to participate is work in these two congressional districts within driving distance of the Bay Area."

Speaking at the Albatross gathering, McNerney was grateful for the help. "This is about the people taking our country back from the corporate interests — this is ground zero," McNerney said.

Brown mirrored his sentiments: "John Doolittle likes to say that I like to come to the Bay Area because I'm only interested in liberals. But I like to come to the Bay Area because you want to take this country back."

Leaders of the migrating Democrats say they are sensitive to local issues and attitudes in districts that are often hugely different from those in the Bay Area. When they go into Pombo's district, for example, they first ally themselves with local Democratic Party clubs.

"We are aware that these two candidates are not running in Berkeley," said Kim Wayne, 68, co-chair of the Progressive East Bay Democrats.

Doolittle and Pombo have characterized the Bay Area activists as carpetbaggers who want to implant liberal ideas in the largely conservative districts.

"Brown has become the ultimate chameleon candidate," Doolittle said on his campaign website. "By day, he pretends to be a conservative. By night, his true colors come out as he raises money and recruits volunteers from the most liberal activists in the Bay Area."

Pombo has played up the Bay Area liberal invasion theme in his political mailers. Doolittle is expected to make it the theme of his television ads. But the volunteers say they have met with little hostility from potential voters. Political analyst Hoffenblum says the effect of the political activists is still uncertain.

"My guess is that it is probably productive work," said Hoffenblum. "When someone comes to their door for a candidate, voters seldom ask 'Where do you live in California?' "

3 Southland Congressional Seats Safe, Despite Ethics Issues (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

The GOP lawmakers are expected to win despite questions.

Ethics scandals around the nation have rendered Republican members of Congress vulnerable and buoyed Democrats hoping to unseat them.

Except in Southern California.

Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to regain control of Congress, a prospect that political watchers say is realistic for the first time this decade.

But three Southern California Republicans with legal and ethical troubles of their own — including being named among the "most corrupt members of Congress" by the public interest group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington — are expected to coast to reelection in November.

The public-interest group is the same one that provided the FBI with e-mails it obtained of Rep. Mark Foley's correspondence with congressional pages.

Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands) is accused of earmarking hundreds of millions of taxpayer dollars for the clients of a lobbyist and close friend.

Rep. Gary Miller (R-Diamond Bar) is accused of using his position in Congress to help a business partner and campaign contributor gain access to a prime piece of public land and of sheltering millions of dollars in real estate investment gains from taxes.

Rep. Ken Calvert (R-Corona) is accused of earmarking millions of taxpayer dollars for transportation improvements near real estate developments in which he has a financial interest.

"They're not in competitive races; it's as simple as that," said Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the nonpartisan Rothenberg Political Report. "There's no buzz around town about any of them."

Though Northern California has a pair of competitive races, most of the action will again be far from the nation's most populous state — Ohio, Pennsylvania and the northeast, most notably. Because California has some of the most heavily gerrymandered electoral districts in the country, members hold almost insurmountable voter registration advantages of 15 to 20 percentage points.

"That these congressmen face no serious challenge despite the questions about their ethics highlights the problems with gerrymandered districts," said Ned Wigglesworth, a policy advocate for California Common Cause, which has unsuccessfully pushed to reform how districts are drawn in California. "Gerrymandered districts drain competition out of the electoral system and undermine the accountability which is necessary for a functioning, healthy democracy."

Even Lewis, who faces the most potential legal trouble as the target of an investigation by federal prosecutors, is on safe ground.

He is facing off against Louie Contreras, a candidate with no previous political experience who has raised less than $5,000. By contrast, Lewis, a 28-year House veteran who holds one of the most powerful positions in government as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, had $1.4 million in the bank as of June. Not that he is using it to run much of a race. Lewis has not opened a campaign office or even hired a campaign manager.

Calvert is being challenged by Louis Vandenberg, a University of California administrator and Iraq war opponent who has run against him twice before. Campaign finance reports as of June showed his campaign had a little more than $2,500 in cash, compared with more than $260,000 for Calvert.

Miller isn't even facing a challenger.

Fla. Dems Attack Election Day Notices (AP-Y)

By Brian Skoloff, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Florida Democrats asked a state court Friday to block Election Day notices at polling places that would inform voters in Rep. Mark Foley's district that his GOP replacement on the ballot will receive his votes.

Foley had been a shoo-in for re-election before he resigned from Congress on Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually explicit instant messages he wrote to male Congressional pages.

Foley's name is still on the ballot, though, and election supervisors want voters to know that votes for Foley will be given to state Rep. Joe Negron instead.

Democrats say that would be electioneering, which is illegal under state law.

"We think the issue is very simple. What they propose to do is electioneering, and the law says electioneering is not allowed within 100 feet of a polling place. Simple as that," said Democratic Party spokesman Mark Bubriski.

Jenny Nash, a spokeswoman for the Florida secretary of state, said electioneering includes any notice or advertisement that informs voters about a specific candidate but does not necessarily ask voters to cast their ballots for that candidate.

She called the Democratic Party's motion for an emergency injunction "a reach." Democrats filed the motion in state court in Tallahassee.

The notices also would let voters know that a vote for Tim Mahoney, Negron's Democratic challenger, will count for Mahoney and a vote for unaffiliated Emmie Ross will count for Ross.

"There is plenty of support in Florida election code for both the department and the supervisors to educate voters and to provide them with necessary information," Nash said. "We feel it's a commonsense approach that in order to avoid confusion at the polls, voters should be educated to any last-minute changes to the ballot."

Negron called the Democrats' request "a desperate attempt to try to confuse voters."

"I can't imagine why anyone would oppose voters knowing how their votes will count," he said. "But you know what, voters are a lot smarter than the experts give them credit for."

Registered Republicans in the district outnumber Democrats 202,500 to 170,369, according to the latest state figures. Foley had been seeking his seventh term in Congress.

GOP's Sure Bets In Florida Now Appear In Question (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

PUNTA GORDA, Fla. — In this conservative sanctuary in Florida's 16th Congressional District, the matrons of the Peace River Federated Republican Women's Forum gathered to hear why they should cast their votes for disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley.

"A vote for Mark Foley is a vote to elect Joe Negron," explained Negron, who took over the GOP spot on the ballot when Foley resigned after explicit messages he sent to teenage male pages were made public.

DOJ_NMG_0081327

The Nov. 7 ballot had already been approved and some absentee forms mailed out when Foley resigned. Florida law forbids variation in the voting materials within any district, so Foley's name had to stay.

"People are saying you can't push the button next to Mark Foley's name. But I know that you're smarter than that," Negron said.

The 45-year-old attorney's assurances that the party can hang on to the congressional seat were comforting to a staunchly Republican crowd still reeling from the scandal that put its district up for grabs for the first time in a quarter-century.

But even here in Charlotte County on Florida's west coast, where voter turnout is regularly above 70% and heavily GOP, there are fears that the Foley scandal could discourage Republicans from going to the polls.

With President Bush's slumping approval ratings, dissatisfaction with the Iraq war and the failure of the Republican-dominated Congress to tackle issues like Social Security and immigration, GOP candidates in several once-certain Florida races now appear to be in trouble.

A new squabble over the unchangeable ballot arose Friday, when the Florida Democratic Party filed a court motion to prevent "illegal electioneering" at polling places — which is how it sees district election officials' plan to post notices telling voters that they should mark their ballots for Foley if they want to vote for Negron.

"Plain and simple, posting candidates' names is considered electioneering, and electioneering within 100 feet of a polling place is illegal," said Karen Thurman, state Democratic party chairwoman. "It's not the state's job to inform voters about the Republican candidate."

Negron retorted that the appeal for an injunction was Democratic challenger Tim Mahoney's admission of weakness. "He knows that the only way he can win this race is to run against Mark Foley," Negron said.

Before Foley resigned, Republicans held 18 of Florida's 25 U.S. House seats. Political analysts believe five of those are within Democratic reach — potential pickups that could help break the Republicans' control of Congress.

"This is about a lot more than one errant person, and voters know that," Florida Democratic Party spokesman Mark Bubriski said of the bounce in support for Democrats.

Just north of here, in the 13th District put into play by U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris when she decided to challenge Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson, Democrat Christine Jennings leads Republican Vern Buchanan by 12 percentage points, according to a recent poll, despite the wealthy Buchanan's $3 million contribution from his own pocket.

Democratic State Sen. Ron Klein has been running neck-and-neck with Republican U.S. Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. for his 22nd District post. Brian Smoot, Klein's campaign manager, said he had no fresh polling data, but noted that the buzz on the stump trail along the Gold Coast of Palm Beach and Broward counties was lifting spirits.

"Certainly the man on the street, or the voter on the street, has been talking about the Foley scandal and disapproval of the handling of the war in Iraq," Smoot said, reporting a rise in campaign event turnout. The Republican leadership's failure to confront Foley before the revelations that forced his resignation "has crystallized in people's minds that this is not just a do-nothing Congress but a Congress afflicted with various scandals and more interested in political games than addressing important issues."

Democrat Phyllis Busansky's bid for the 9th District has gained strength in the last two weeks, say campaign workers, who are awaiting new poll results. The former local government leader is facing Gus Bilirakis, son of retiring U.S. Rep. Michael Bilirakis. "Anecdotally, the phones are ringing off the hook," says her campaign manager, Robert Becker.

Gus Bilirakis was quoted as telling reporters in Washington that his campaign wouldn't have a comment on the leadership's handling of the Foley affair "until after we win," a remark that voters found callous and evasive, and that had his handlers scrambling to contain the damage.

In the Orlando area's 8th District, Republican incumbent Ric Keller has been getting a spirited challenge from Democrat Charlie Stuart, although nonpartisan forecasts such as the Cook Political Report continue to rate that seat as likely Republican.

In staunch Republican territory, voters express revulsion and a sense of betrayal about Foley's behavior. But those still politically active tend to blame the man, not the party.

"The Foley thing is very upsetting to everyone, but I can't actually believe it will interfere" in voters' deliberations, says Diane D'Andrea, president of the Peace River group that brought Negron to speak here. "I don't think people will vote against Joe Negron because of what someone else did."

But negative campaigning in the closely contested races is turning off voters, she added. "You hear a lot of people saying, 'I get all this garbage in the mail, and I don't want to vote for anybody.' "

Negron brushes off the Foley specter and has taken to the stump with gusto, crisscrossing his bizarrely contoured bicoastal district — it stretches from the Gulf of Mexico to the Atlantic Ocean over migrant-tended farmland in the interior of the state — with a solidly conservative platform. In his first week on the campaign trail, he addressed business, labor and agricultural groups in each of the eight counties that constitute the district.

DOJ_NMG_0081328

"Before Mark Foley's downfall, Tim Mahoney wasn't considered a credible candidate," Negron says of his opponent, insisting he will not let the Democrat "get a free ride."

Three field managers from the Republican National Congressional Committee have come from Washington to direct Negron's 11th-hour bid, and the effort has gotten $1 million in funding from federal party coffers.

Mahoney's campaign did not return phone calls, but a new TV ad released Thursday cast the Democrat as an alternative to a Republican-dominated Congress rife with corruption, incompetence and scandal.

Florida Republican Party spokesman Jeff Sadosky dismisses Democrats' claims to be drawing away disaffected Republicans and independent voters.

"Voters see this for exactly what it is: one guy with a sick problem that needs to get some help," Sadosky said. "They're not holding that against other Republican candidates."

Prominent national party figures, including President Bush, are expected to stump for Negron and other Florida GOP candidates, and Negron has been touting his close ties to Gov. Jeb Bush, who enjoys approval ratings upward of 60% — almost double those of his brother in the White House.

The Democrats also have been sending their biggest political guns south to shore up their hopefuls. Former presidential candidate Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York have all visited Florida in the past two weeks. Former President Clinton also has been raising money for Klein.

Republican voters predict the Foley fallout will subside by election day.

"We've moved past it by now," says 64-year-old Darlene Queener, a retired bank employee who moved here from Wisconsin. "For the first few days, everyone talked about it. But it's something that happened, and it's going to be taken care of and we have to get beyond it because the goal is that the Republican Party keeps that seat."

Battle Lines Drawn Along Mexico Border (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

Every night between 6,000 and 6,500 foreigners try to cross from Mexico into the US, most of them into the desert state of Arizona. Some two-thirds of them -succeed.

If J.D. Hayworth's crushing handshake is any guide, future illegal aliens can expect much stiffer resistance at the border. The Republican congressman, who represents a large suburb of Phoenix, Arizona's commercial capital, is one of the leading lights of the "enforcement first" Republicans who want to build a 1,120 km fence along the US border with Mexico. They also want to deport as many as possible of the estimated 12m illegal aliens already living in the US.

That puts the former American football player at odds with John McCain, his fellow Republican and a senator from Arizona, who is sponsoring "comprehensive reform" that would set up a temporary guest-worker programme for unskilled immigrants and stiffen policing all along the US-Mexico border.

It also puts Mr Hayworth at loggerheads with Harry Mitchell, his Democratic opponent, who polls say stands at least an odds-even chance at mid-term elections next month of ejecting the Republican from the seat he has held since 1994.

Like Mr McCain, a probable Republican contender for the 2008 presidential race, Mr Mitchell believes in providing existing "illegals" with a pathway to American citizenship once they have cleared their tax arrears. Although it is also sponsored by George W. Bush, Mr Hayworth believes that most of Arizona rejects the plan to prov-ide what he describes as an "amnesty" to illegals.

"If you have a hole in the roof and the water is flooding into your house, the first thing you do is you fix the roof," said Mr Hayworth, at his modest campaign offices off one of Phoenix's many freeways. "Once you've fixed the roof then you attend to the interior water damage."

With an unemployment rate of just 3.6 per cent – well below the national average – Arizona's interior economic damage is not easy to detect. Fuelled by a booming services sector and America's inexorable demographic shift to the south, Arizona is visibly prosperous. But if you peer behind the shiny new wallpaper you can find damp on the walls, say supporters of Mr Hayworth.

"If you look at what has happened to the wages of people in the bottom half of the economy – particularly among African-Americans – then illegal labour has a direct downward effect on incomes," said Randall Pullen, an attorney who also runs Protect Our City, a group that campaigns to deport illegal aliens from Phoenix. "Then there is the crime. Statistics show that 13 per cent of illegals who come to America have a criminal record, often for very serious crimes such as rape and murder."

But their loudest argument is that America's porous southern border undermines national security. Mr Hayworth cites recent testimony by Robert Mueller, the head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, who said that some of those caught crossing over were from Muslim countries. “There is a popular belief they are all from Mexico: not true,” said Mr Hayworth. “Many of them are from Islamo-fascist countries that wish to do us harm.”

Across town, at another oasis of strip malls amid Phoenix’s endless desert of eight-lane freeways, Harry Mitchell is addressing a gathering of postal workers. Although the quaintly named National Association of Letter Carriers has endorsed the Democrat, one or two are sceptical of comprehensive reform. “Why aren’t you proposing to penalise employers who hire illegal immigrants?” asks one. Mr Mitchell prevaricates. Then says that he is.

A grandfather who has held locally elected positions for the past 32 years, Mr Mitchell’s almost teddy-bear demeanour cuts a striking contrast with his opponent. But his message is equally consistent.

“Why is my opponent only talking about immigration now in an election year?” he asks. “The Republicans have controlled the House of Representatives since 1994 and they have done nothing. Hayworth is playing politics with immigration to divert your attention from other issues, such as the collapse of ethics in Congress.”

It is a charge that has some force. According to Washington’s Center for Responsive Politics, Mr Hayworth is one of the largest recipients of donations from clients of Jack Abramoff, a notorious lobbyist imprisoned for fraud this year.

“I am a great believer in public service,” Mr Mitchell continues. “We need to change the way business is done in Washington.”

Although hardly original, Mr Mitchell’s plea appears to be sincere. As does Mr Hayworth’s uncompromising line on immigration. “My opponent,” says Mr Mitchell, “wants to hire bond bailsmen – call them bounty hunters – to deport illegal immigrants. Is this the kind of America we want?”

The postal workers evidently like Mr Mitchell. But their applause is not emphatic.

Wolf Vs. Feder Becomes Race To Watch (WP)

By Amy Gardner, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Northern Virginia's sprawling 10th District, which meanders 70 miles from McLean to the Shenandoah Valley, is nothing if not predictable. For 26 years, voters have sent Republican Frank R. Wolf of Fairfax County to represent them in Congress.

That fact alone gives Wolf, 67, an enormous advantage over his Democratic challenger this year, Judy Feder. His name recognition among voters is vast. And a quarter-century of public service has provided him with a long list of accomplishments to tout, from securing Metro funding and fighting gang violence to calling attention to atrocities in western Sudan.

But 2006 is not a year to assume that history will be a guide. The war in Iraq, high gasoline prices and the House page scandal are pushing voters away from President Bush's party -- even in a district viewed widely as Northern Virginia's most Republican. Add to that the uncertainty of seeking office in a fast-growing region where the political allegiance has shifted toward Democrats in recent elections, and the outlook for Wolf grows less bullish.

Finally, consider the challenger: Though a political newcomer, Feder is a well-funded, well-spoken public policy expert whose aggressive campaign has caused several national political analysts and Web sites to list the 10th District as a race to watch.

"Democrats have had weak candidate after weak candidate against Frank Wolf," said Virginia Commonwealth University professor Robert D. Holsworth. "She is not a weak candidate. She's been more energetic. She's done more things that you expect a quality candidate to do, such as raise money, even against a popular incumbent. It's one of those races where it's not as certain as it normally would be."

Feder, 59, is spending most of her time criticizing Bush and Republican leaders in Congress. In cable TV ads and appearances, she has reminded voters how often Wolf has voted with Bush -- for the war, for tax breaks for oil companies, for a Medicare drug program that some seniors have found confusing and expensive. A vote for Wolf, Feder says, is a vote for staying the course.

"We need change in Washington more urgently than any time I can remember in my lifetime," Feder told the Great Falls Civic Association this week.

Feder, who is on leave from her job as dean of Georgetown University's Public Policy Institute, is a tiny woman with funky glasses and short-cropped hair. She was a leading architect of President Clinton's universal health plan, which failed. At the Great Falls forum, she seized the microphone with no hesitation and looked Wolf straight in the eye as she declared the need for new leadership in Congress.

Among the changes Feder would push for are a slow withdrawal from Iraq and the removal of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, more government investment in alternative energy sources and new spending patterns for federal transportation dollars to discourage sprawl and reward smarter growth.

DOJ_NMG_0081330

On traffic and sprawl, Feder is following the successful campaign strategies of recently elected Democrats, including Va. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, who have prevailed in such congestion-choked communities as Loudoun and Fairfax counties with a promise to improve roads and encourage better growth patterns.

But she is also venturing into a policy area largely controlled by local governments. Wolf supporters scoffed at a town hall meeting hosted by Feder to discuss a land-use decision in Loudoun County last month, accusing her of trying to capitalize on a polarizing issue that has nothing to do with Congress.

Wolf also cried foul when Feder accused the 13-term congressman of failing to rescue a plan to build a tunnel instead of elevated tracks through Tysons Corner as part of the rail extension to Dulles International Airport.

Wolf said he did not oppose the tunnel. But he was instrumental in persuading Kaine to kill it last month because the added cost of the tunnel could have put the project at risk of failing to meet federal "cost effectiveness" guidelines, jeopardizing hundreds of millions in federal dollars.

"If that had happened, the whole thing would have gone away," Wolf said. "We need rail. Without rail, there is no hope."

Wolf said he is not always partisan on Capitol Hill and not in lock step with Bush. He has pushed for the bipartisan commission that is studying the administration's policies in Iraq.

"There was a failure," he said. The Iraq Study Group, he added, "will get to the bottom of this and come up with new ideas."

Wolf is a friend of such anti-sprawl groups as the Piedmont Environmental Council. Like Feder, he opposes a proposal by Dominion Virginia Power, which could need federal approval, to erect a new power line through pristine countryside in six 10th District counties, including Loudoun and Prince William.

Wolf, who lives in Vienna, also has used his authority as chairman of a House Appropriations subcommittee to encourage telecommuting for employees of the departments of Justice, Commerce and State. He demanded an investigation into possible price gouging by oil companies in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, and he has voted to increase federal investment in alternative energy sources.

One of Wolf's passions has been calling attention to human rights abuses worldwide. He has traveled abroad dozens of times, to such strife-torn regions as Tibet, Congo, Sierra Leone, Rwanda, Ethiopia, Afghanistan, Iraq and Sudan. Usually mild-mannered, Wolf's slight stoop and white hair lend him a grandfatherly air (he has 12 grandchildren). But he becomes animated, pounding the table as he speaks of suffering abroad.

"I have met people, held people, women who have been raped," Wolf said, his voice trailing off. "I have one person in my office who does nothing but human rights and religious freedom" issues.

Wolf's amiable disposition, longevity and views on such issues as transit and preservation have made him popular across a broad swath of the 10th District's electorate -- including left-leaning conservationists who might otherwise oppose an ally of Bush this year.

Cate Magennis Wyatt is such a voter. A resident of the Loudoun County village of Waterford and a former secretary of commerce and trade for Democratic governor L. Douglas Wilder, Wyatt now leads an effort to establish a National Heritage Area along a 175-mile corridor from Gettysburg to Monticello. In Congress, Wolf is the lead supporter of the project, Called the Journey Through Hallowed Ground.

"Mr. Wolf is listening to his constituents," Wyatt said. "Mr. Wolf is really leading the charge on conservation and ensuring our history is here for generations to come."

Such support could protect Wolf against the onslaught of anti-Republican sentiment sweeping the nation. The Web page CQPolitics.com recently reclassified the 10th District race from "safe Republican" to "Republican favored." And, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has called the 10th an "emerging" race.

A recent poll conducted by the independent R.T. Strategies of Alexandria puts Feder just 5 points behind Wolf. The poll's margin of error is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Feder said, "People all over the nation are desperate for change and accountability in Washington."

But Holsworth, the VCU professor, said, "It still would be a huge surprise if Frank Wolf could be beaten."

Mr. Wolf 'S Diligence (WP)

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Our choice in Northern Virginia's 10th District

OVER THE YEARS we have had our disagreements with Rep. Frank R. Wolf , the Republican who has represented Northern Virginia's 10th District since 1981. But those have been outweighed by our respect for his undisputed diligence, candor, active legislative approach and passionate commitment to human rights in some of the world's darkest corners. Those qualities continue to make Mr. Wolf part of a diminishing breed in the House -- of legislators whose independent-mindedness and pragmatic problem-solving outweigh their partisanship. He deserves reelection this year against health-care expert Judy Feder, dean of Georgetown's Public Policy Institute.

In addition to his habitual attentiveness to an array of local issues in Northern Virginia -- congested roads, stressed transit systems and the rising threat of Latino gangs -- Mr. Wolf has made a particular mark in this latest congressional term by his constructive national role. It was chiefly at his prodding that Congress established a bipartisan commission on Iraq, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton, that represents the best hope at this point of forging a national consensus on how to proceed in the war. In addition, Mr. Wolf proposed a big-picture commission to tackle the fiscal and budgetary issues that Congress has so conspicuously failed to address, including entitlement spending on Social Security, Medicaid and Medicare as well as the tax code. The object would be to devise a fiscally sustainable course for the nation and present it to Congress for an up-or-down vote.

Ms. Feder is a smart, credible candidate whose broad experience and deep knowledge of health-care policy have given her a prominent role in that national debate for years; she was a senior official in the Department of Health and Human Services during the Clinton administration. She makes a reasonable case that Mr. Wolf, by some of the party-line votes he has cast, is complicit in assorted policy failures of the Bush administration, particularly its reckless tax cuts.

But if Mr. Wolf has proved anything in 26 years in Congress, it is that he is more than a party-line Republican. His repeated visits to Iraq, Darfur, Afghanistan, Chechnya and other unlovely hot spots reflect his zeal for human rights. For that he has earned respect on both sides of Capitol Hill's partisan divide and a 14th term in Congress.

With a Parade of Attractive Candidates, the Party May Benefit From the Politics of Beauty

AUBURN, N.Y. -- Maybe Democratic candidate Michael Arcuri is running strong in this Republican House district because he pledges to expand health coverage, balance the budget and raise the minimum wage.

Or maybe it's his piercing Italian eyes and runner's physique.

"He is pretty good-looking," observed Paula Ferrin with admiration, as the 47-year-old district attorney worked the crowd at a local senior center.

"What we want is brains, honey," scolded her friend Rose Oliver.

"True," Ferrin answered, "but handsome doesn't hurt."

The research is unambiguous that Ferrin is right: Attractive politicians have an edge over not-so-attractive ones. The phenomenon is resonating especially this year. By a combination of luck and design, Democrats seem to be fielding an uncommonly high number of uncommonly good-looking candidates.

The beauty gap between the parties, some on Capitol Hill muse, could even be a factor in who controls Congress after Election Day.

Democratic operatives do not publicly say that they went out of their way this year to recruit candidates with a high hotness quotient. Privately, however, they acknowledge that, as they focused on finding the most dynamic politicians to challenge vulnerable Republicans, it did not escape their notice that some of the most attractive prospects were indeed often quite attractive.

There is a certain logic to the trend. Back in 1994, when Republicans seized power in Congress from Democrats, the GOP had a number of fresh-faced challengers who knocked off incumbents who had grown worse for wear after years of committee hearings and fundraising receptions.

This year, it is the Democrats who have several ripe opportunities to unseat Republicans, some of whom have grown gray and portly during their years in power.

To gain the 15 seats needed to recapture House control, the party is targeting about 40 GOP-leaning districts, including New York's 24th, where veteran Rep. Sherwood L. Boehlert (R) is retiring and where Arcuri is campaigning.

In most of the races, the Democratic challengers look a lot like standard-issue politicians -- not likely to impress the judges at Atlantic City. But there are others who, while they might not have movie-star looks, are certainly well above the C-SPAN median.

The list is decidedly unscientific, but it includes several whose names come up often on Capitol Hill for reasons other than their policy platforms. Among those on it, in addition to Arcuri, are Brad Ellsworth, a swaggering Indiana sheriff; businesswoman Gabrielle Giffords of Arizona, who has chiseled features and rides a motorcycle; and Heath Shuler of North Carolina, a strapping former quarterback for the Washington Redskins. In Tennessee, Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., a lean and stylish 36-year-old, has drawn admiring looks.

DOJ_NMG_0081332

Republican Bob Corker, who is running against Ford, has acknowledged the disparity. "I know I'm not as good-looking," Corker said. He hopes his business experience will compensate.

The crop of eye-pleasing pols has party operatives calculating the politics of beauty. "There's a fine line, and you can't cross it," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Voters don't like men who look like pretty boys or women who resemble bimbos. "If you're too good-looking, people won't take you seriously," Emanuel said.

Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, agreed that attractive candidates often have an early advantage. But he said voters' decisions in the polling booth are rarely skin-deep, especially in a closely contested race.

"When each side is spending four or five million, people know the records, and it doesn't have the same impact," he said. He noted that Shuler's popularity has declined in recent weeks following reports that his real estate firm was late in paying taxes. "That's gone back to being a close race."

The two candidates here in this Upstate New York district have similar rÃ©sumÃ©s. Both Arcuri and his GOP opponent, state Sen. Raymond A. Meier, are lawyers. The two first crossed paths in 1985 while working on opposite sides of a local election recount. Polls showed they entered the race with roughly even name identification. They have the same Oneida County political base.

Meier's advantage is that the 24th District is home to 45,000 more registered Republicans than Democrats. But Arcuri is a popular prosecutor, the first Democrat elected to the post in 40 years. He's also tall and thin, with dark, gray-flecked hair and sharp features. Meier, who is 53, wears glasses, and his hair is brown and thinning. His look would seem to be perfectly pleasant but nondescript.

Arcuri's image is plastered all over his campaign materials, from yard signs to the trading cards that are distributed at campaign events. In his official campaign photo, he leans forward with one hand on his hip, looking suave and casual. His Web site shows him finishing a marathon.

His political friends tease him about his fashion-magazine persona, but they acknowledge that it's a valuable asset. "He's a young, good-looking guy," said Charlie Evangelista, Ontario County Democratic Committee chairman. "He's going to connect with people."

Arcuri's theory is that voters have an immediate, visceral reaction to candidates that, if powerful enough, can trump ideology or party affiliation. "How do you get around the status quo? You look for younger, energetic faces," he said. But while people may decide in an instant whether or not they are able to vote for him, he said, "then they have to know you can do the job."

He added, "I spend a lot of time assuring people I can be congressional."

His theory might be correct. An independent poll in the district released last night showed him with a 10-point lead.

Some of the academic research on beauty and voting goes back decades, to the early 1970s. In 1990, political scientist Lee Sigelman, then at the University of Arizona, posited that Democrats were losing ground nationally, despite an advantage in voter registration, because their looks were a turnoff. He rated all governors and members of Congress on an ugliness scale and found that of the 26 least attractive, 25 were Democrats.

The playing field these days is more level. Research has shown that if candidates invest a little effort in their looks, the payoff can be huge. Campaign consultants hover around candidates, ordering them to change their hairstyles, get in shape and update their wardrobes. "The bar has been raised, without question," said Sigelman, now a George Washington University political science professor.

He singled out three Maryland statewide candidates, Republican Senate nominee Michael S. Steele and gubernatorial rivals Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and Martin O'Malley (D), "as playing the image game really well." Politicians today, said Sigelman, strive for "the personality and looks of talk show hosts." The goal is to be "well turned out."

One candidate who made a high-impact adjustment is Diane Farrell. The Connecticut Democrat used to wear her blond hair pulled back tight, but after a gentle nudge from a campaign aide, she allowed it to hang loose for a more natural, relaxed look.

The looks factor can be maddening for the opposition. One writer on an anti-Shuler blog expressed annoyance at the candidate's wife, "with all her quips about how cute Shuler is. What a way to decide how to vote!!"

Perhaps not surprisingly, research has shown that voters who are easily swayed by social trends tend to favor more attractive candidates. Conversely, people who resist social trends prefer unattractive candidates.

The latest wave of research examines a possible root of political attraction: how closely candidates and voters resemble each other. A Stanford University study this year suggested that little-known candidates can increase their electoral support by as much as 20 percentage points by tweaking visual features on their campaign materials so they look slightly more like a targeted group of voters, for instance Asians or Hispanics.

DOJ_NMG_0081333

The less voters know about the candidates, as in races such as the Arcuri-Meier contest with no incumbent, the more looks seem to matter. An examination of a 2001 British local election by a team of Texas Tech University and University of Plymouth researchers found that, in the absence of facts, people who are considered attractive by survey respondents are more likely to win.

The findings were presented to the American Political Science Association's 2003 annual meeting, with the caveat that they "may offend notions of democracy that candidates should compete fairly and on the basis of issues not appearance."

Politicians Try Out MySpace (WSJ)

By Erika Lovley

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

Candidates Use Social-Networking Sites to Attract Young Voters

Luther Lowe already planned to vote for Rep. Marion Berry, an Arkansas Democrat running for re-election in November. But after finding the 64-year-old congressman's profile online at MySpace and Facebook, he was impressed enough to send the candidate a $100 donation.

"He has some funny quotes and talks about himself" in the Web postings, says Mr. Lowe, a 24-year-old from Little Rock. "I felt like I could understand him on a personal basis. It played into the decision of me not only voting, but giving money, too."

Politicians across the country are discovering that a presence on social-networking sites such as MySpace isn't just a way of communicating with voters under 30, it is also a means of attracting volunteers and their donations. Howard Dean's 2004 presidential primary run underscored the Internet's untapped potential as a fund-raising tool, and political strategists say these networking sites go further by helping candidates to home in on specific audiences, beyond those who click on campaign Web sites.

Sites such as Facebook and MySpace are increasingly popular Internet destinations for young people: cyber-locales where people create their own Web pages, congregate in large numbers and communicate with friends and strangers -- and sometimes politicians. To see if someone is a registered site member, a user can type the person's name in a search bar.

Chuck Poochigian, a Republican state senator from Fresno who is running for California attorney general, joined MySpace in early August. Within two months, Mr. Poochigian reported that the number of online donations to his campaign jumped more than 50%. "It's been pretty remarkable," he says. "There is little question that the level of enthusiasm among younger voters is higher now than it otherwise would be."

Fresno resident Sevag Tateosian, 25, says it was the endorsements by both public figures and MySpace visitors he found on Mr. Poochigian's MySpace profile that convinced him to become a campaign volunteer. "It definitely pushed me over the edge to support him," says Mr. Tateosian, who helps out as a data-entry volunteer. "I was impressed to find him on MySpace. It tells you that he cares about getting his message out to a younger forum."

With almost 500 site visitors having signed up as "friends" -- many under the age of 30 -- Mr. Poochigian's profile includes a full biography, a list of "Poochigian Trivia," and a rolling slideshow from the campaign trail. In the comment forum, friends of "Pooch," as he is nicknamed, post messages of encouragement.

"I didn't know that much about Poochigian, but this page has me sold. He's got my vote," posted user Yik, a 26-year-old man from Davis, Calif.

"Hey, Chuck. Thanks for the add. I put you on my top friends list so I hope that will help get some votes for you!!!" posted Misty, 30, of Caruthers, Calif.

Successful sites take more than a list of policy positions in a flashy font and a few photos. Only 80 friends have signed up to the MySpace page of Mr. Poochigian's opponent, Oakland Mayor Jerry Brown -- who cut a youthful figure himself when he was California governor a generation ago. Mr. Brown's page carries little campaign information, save for a few campaign-trail pictures and a video commercial that slams Mr. Poochigian's conservative views. Still, Mr. Brown, a Democrat with strong name recognition, is leading in this race. His fund-raising, too, has far outstripped his rival.

In Utah, Democrat Pete Ashdown, who is running for a congressional seat, says his number of young volunteers shot through the roof after his campaign joined MySpace in March 2005.

"It's the holy grail of politics," says Mr. Ashdown. "The amount of volunteerism was absolutely minimal compared to what we are getting now."

Political scientists, too, are paying attention to the online sites as a way to plant civic awareness in the minds of young adults. "Anything that gets young people involved in politics is great," says University of Massachusetts political-science professor Ray La Raja. In teaching undergraduates, Mr. La Raja has struggled to find an approach that inspires students to become politically active. MySpace, he says, could be that venue.

DOJ_NMG_0081334

"Research points out that if people get involved in politics early, they tend to become habitual participants," he says. "Even if kids only donate $5 or $10, they will feel an attachment to the campaign."

That sentiment is echoed by Kenneth A. Gross, a political lawyer with Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom in Washington and a former associate general counsel of the Federal Election Commission.

"I don't see a downside for politicians unless the solicitation is accompanied by some scandalous personal information," he says, adding that getting younger voters involved "is one of the biggest challenges facing the democratic system."

Politicians with profiles that get the most traffic, including U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland, an Ohio Democrat running for governor, know that on MySpace, it is important to do as the under-30 crowd does: make public what is personal -- and don't skimp on the trivial.

Mr. Strickland's profile says he is a Leo with a weakness for Twinkies. A video shows his guitar-playing wife, Frances, serenading him on stage during a campaign dinner.

Since the congressman's online debut in December, he has acquired an impressive 1,440 friends, and online donations are on the rise, according to campaign spokesman Keith Dailey. While not all online donations can be tracked directly to MySpace, Mr. Dailey says the links between MySpace and the campaign-donation page helps.

"We have found a great deal of interest," Mr. Dailey says. "Being on the cutting edge of Internet technologies is increasingly becoming necessary in political campaigning."

In some instances, campaign volunteers such as 24-year-old musician Zachery Allan Starkey of Columbus, Ohio, are using their candidate's page to rally support for upcoming fund-raisers and events. Mr. Starkey uses the Strickland MySpace profile page to promote a concert event, Dance Dance Democracy Party, he's producing for the candidate later this month.

The MySpace profile, he says, made it a lot easier to promote the event. "I was able to get in contact with a lot of politicians and supporters," says Mr. Starkey, who is proud of the planning he put into the show.

"In the end, I want to sit back at night and say, 'At least I did something.' "

It's Ehrlich Vs. O'Malley, Bouts I And II (WP)

Candidates To Debate Each Other Twice Today

After accusing one another of ducking debates for weeks, Maryland's leading gubernatorial candidates are preparing for a political rarity today: a doubleheader.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley are scheduled to tangle for 60 minutes this afternoon in the studios of WJZ-TV in Baltimore.

Then, five hours later and 12 miles away, the Republican incumbent and Democratic challenger plan to meet again, this time at the Maryland Public Television station in Owings Mills for another hour-long showdown.

"I can't remember this ever happening before in any race," said Mike Morrill, a longtime Democratic operative in Maryland. "Even candidates who debate a lot don't debate twice on the same day."

The back-to-back televised debates will be the first of this year's campaign for governor -- and likely the last.

For those at home interested in watching, pay close attention: The second debate will actually air first.

Tonight's encounter is set to be shown live at 7 p.m. statewide on public television and in Baltimore on WBAL-TV, the city's NBC affiliate, where NASCAR fans expecting coverage of the Nextel Cup will be in for a surprise.

The earlier contest is being taped and won't air until 7 p.m. Monday, on both statewide public television and WJZ, Baltimore's CBS affiliate.

So just how did this happen?

Both campaigns point to the other -- and a deadline put forward by Ehrlich.

Ehrlich aides said the governor welcomed the prospect of several debates with O'Malley but made clear early on that he wanted to be done by mid-October. With Ehrlich's deadline looming, aides said, the O'Malley camp dragged its feet on scheduling.

Ehrlich spokeswoman Shareese DeLeaver said it was "a desperate attempt to run out the clock for risk of exposing a record of failed leadership."

O'Malley aides, however, said Ehrlich's team has been the difficult party -- and that the mayor remains willing to debate right up until Election Day.

DOJ_NMG_0081335

"This is what happens when lines are drawn in the sand, when there are self-imposed deadlines and your opposing campaign refuses to negotiate in good faith," said O'Malley spokesman Rick Abbruzzese. "That said, the mayor is looking forward to participating in both debates and sharing his positive vision for the state with the people of Maryland."

Viewers should expect to hear plenty about education, crime, health care and other key topics in both settings.

The terms of the WJZ debate were mostly settled earlier in the week. But only in recent days did the live debate on public television start coming together.

And last night, the two sides were still scrambling to reach an agreement over who would be on the panel of questioners.

Ehrlich objected to the three-member panel that included a reporter from the Baltimore Sun, a paper with whom the governor has had a rocky relationship. Ehrlich aides said the reporter had been added to the panel without their blessing.

A scramble for a replacement ensued. In the end, both sides wound up agreeing to a two-member panel.

"There were also some issues about standing up and sitting down," said Steven J. Schupak, vice president for programming at Maryland Public Television. Schupak coordinated the debate negotiations.

Some analysts suggested the bitter debate over debates reflected the overall tone of the race.

"You have a campaign with two very competitive people as candidates, and I think that seeped into this process," said Carol Hirschburg, a GOP political consultant in Maryland. "It's really kind of a game: who can get the upper hand, who can gain some sort of advantage, a psychological advantage, catching the other candidate off guard?"

Engaging in two debates in one day, analysts said, will force some novel strategic considerations by the two campaigns.

Do they, for example, save some of their better lines for the nightcap? And, in this age of image, do they change clothes between the two contests?

"Given they're going to air on different days, the one tip I would offer is to at least change your tie, and, if you have the opportunity, put on a different suit," Morrill said.

Is Chivalry Shivved? (NYT)

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

Washington

Hillary Clinton became a senator because men abused her. Her husband humiliated her in public and her opponent, Rick Lazio, hounded her in a debate. She was a sympathetic figure to many voters only after she went from pushy to pushed around.

So John McCain must be wary as he figures out how to push her around. He must slide in the shiv chivalrously.

This week, he managed to attack her three ways in one sentence: as a senator, as a wife and as a future opponent. This raises the question: Is it a smart move, pleasing a base that cringes at stories of these celebrity senators palling around, knocking back drinks on an overseas trip? Or is it a misstep, making Mr. McCain look like a sexist bully for pointedly blaming his fellow senator for her husband's old policies — and calling her "Mrs. Clinton" just to rub it in?

On a trip to Detroit to campaign for a Republican Senate candidate, Mr. McCain singled out Hillary for a shellacking on North Korea. "I would remind Senator Clinton and other Democrats critical of Bush administration policies that the framework agreement her husband's administration negotiated was a failure," he said.

The next morning on CBS's "The Early Show," he was asked why he would blame the Clintons for North Korea's batty behavior.

It's clear, after all, that the North Koreans are acting immaturely in response to W. acting immaturely. They want attention because the Bush administration inexplicably refuses to talk to them. And they know, in the pre-emptive world ordained by nutty Dick Cheney, that the best way to protect themselves from the fate of Saddam Hussein is to actually go nuclear, rather than merely fantasizing and boasting about it.

But the Republicans love to blame Bill Clinton for everything, from the radioactive Congressional page explosion to the radioactive North Korean explosion.

Mr. McCain told Hannah Storm that he "was responding to attacks made on President Bush by Mrs. Clinton, Senator Kerry, Senator Reid and other Democrats." Hillary advisers noted that she was called "Mrs." while the others were called "Senator."

Just as the male Republican front-runner, known for a short fuse, must be careful how he attacks the female Democratic front-runner, the former first lady must be careful how she attacks the war hero.

If she doesn't respond forcefully, she's not fit for the alpha chair in the Oval; if she responds too forcefully, the Republicans will try to paint her as an angry harridan who would nag us to death, or go all hypersensitive on us.

"It hurts her when she gets in a defensive crouch on her husband's record," a McCain adviser said.

DOJ_NMG_0081336

Clearly, the missus does not think so. Billary has their 2008 war room running and finger-wagging. Just as they teamed up recently to punch back when Condi and Bush boosters accused Bill of being lax with Al Qaeda before 9/11, Hillary swiftly rebutted the charge that Bill was lax with North Korea, calling it "ridiculous."

Privately, Hillary's camp was not overly upset by the McCain swipe because it suspected he was doing the bidding of the White House and that he ended up, as one adviser put it, "looking similar to the way he did on those captive tapes from Hanoi, where he recited the names of his crew mates." Besides, Senator Clinton does like to cruise on her husband's coattails and remind Americans that the economy was exploding and the world wasn't.

Hillary's people think she's better off tying herself to les bon-temps-roulez Bill years than Mr. McCain is tying himself to the war-without-end W. years. "It's bad enough that he strapped himself to a broken Acme rocket on Iraq and the economy, now he's strapping himself on North Korea," said one. "People were enamored of his independence, but now he just seems like Bush's windup toy, the obedient corporal."

Linking to W. may become even more problematic if Republicans lose the House next month, and Democrats begin a lollapalooza of investigations into W.'s economic policies, Katrina management methods, Iraq military plan and Iraq reconstruction record.

But Hillary and her first lad have their work cut out for them in trying to take out a popular war hero, according to Mark Halperin and John Harris, authors of "The Way to Win: Taking the White House in 2008."

"Our sense right now," Mr. Halperin says, "is that McCain would beat any Democrat including Hillary Clinton, and Clinton would beat any Republican except for McCain."

U.S. Hits Obstacle In Getting A Vote On North Korea (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 13 — The United States pressed for a Saturday vote on a Security Council resolution that would impose sanctions on North Korea for its reported nuclear test, but questions from China and Russia on Friday evening cast the timing and possibly the content of the document into doubt.

The terms of the resolution had already been softened three times this week to meet objections from China and Russia, and earlier Friday there appeared to be agreement on holding a vote Saturday morning.

John R. Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations, said the new problems appeared "technical" rather than "substantial," but said they would require another conference of Japan and the five permanent Council members, Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States, Saturday before the full 15-member panel met later in the day.

While the wording of the resolution was still being worked out, American intelligence officials said on Friday evening that they had found radioactive material in air samples taken over the region, providing more evidence that North Korea did indeed detonate a nuclear bomb. [Page A7.]

The new draft resolution dropped or softened several provisions to placate China and Russia. It eliminated explicit mention of military enforcement of the sanctions; placed more limits on the kinds of cargo that could be inspected going in and out of North Korea; and dropped a blanket embargo on conventional weapons.

Mr. Bolton indicated that one area of dispute remained the methods and legalities of how to inspect cargo. The new draft resolution limits the weapons ban to large-size arms, military systems and unconventional weapons.

The measure, drafted by the United States, still requires all countries to prevent the sale or transfer of material related to North Korea's nuclear, ballistic missile and unconventional weapons programs, and maintains a ban on travel by persons associated with those programs.

It also bars North Korea from exporting such weapons, a provision aimed at the international concern over the possibility of unconventional arms from North Korea ending up with terrorist groups or rogue states.

Kenzo Oshima, the Japanese ambassador to the United Nations and president of the Security Council, announced the Council would gather at noon, but could not say whether there would be a vote.

"An overwhelming majority of the Council members want to vote as soon as possible," Mr. Bolton said. "They still think it is important to send a swift and strong signal, and I'm confident we're going to be able to do that."

Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador, said, "It all depends on the final text, because we are not at the final text yet."

The United States and Japan, the driving forces behind the resolution, had earlier thought they had surmounted the Chinese and Russian objections to the resolution when they submitted a revision Thursday night that softened some of the earlier provisions.

Mr. Bolton said the United States was "very satisfied" with the document as it stood Friday morning and was prepared to vote for it immediately.

DOJ_NMG_0081337

But Mr. Wang, while asserting his country was happy with the progress that had been made, said his country was still studying the text before officially pronouncing on it. "With progress we are always satisfied, but if we work harder, we might make more progress," he said.

Vitaly I. Churkin, the Russian ambassador, said, "I think we are on the right track, but we are not there yet."

In Washington, officials, apparently confident of the imminent passage of the measure, announced that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would travel to Asia next week to discuss how to implement the resolution, as well as to discuss other efforts to deter North Korean proliferation of a nuclear bomb or bomb-making materials. Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said Ms. Rice would travel to Tokyo, Seoul and Beijing.

The trip, he said, is "an opportunity for her in the region to reaffirm and talk about the strength of our existing alliances there, and also to have a bit more of a wider conversation with others in the region about the current situation, about the security situation, and also to talk broadly about nonproliferation efforts."

Senior State Department officials portrayed the United Nations momentum toward a resolution as evidence of a united, multilateral front agreeing to punish North Korea.

"So the first issue we need to do is to make clear that the sense of outrage and condemnation by the international community to have a resolution in the Security Council, which will not only be a resolution condemning North Korea, but actually a resolution with some teeth to it," said Christopher Hill, the assistant secretary of state for east Asian and Pacific affairs.

"North Korea needs to understand that this is indeed a very, very costly decision that will leave North Korea far worse off and far more isolated than ever before," said Mr. Hill, speaking at a conference in Washington. "We need to give that message very clearly and make sure that North Korea cannot find any differences in our views. So I think so far, so good."

The resolution condemns the test on Oct. 9 as a "flagrant disregard" of Security Council warnings, orders it not to conduct nuclear or missile tests, and urges the North to return to six-nation talks with South Korea, China, Japan, Russia and the United States.

It freezes funds overseas of people or businesses connected to the unconventional weapons programs and bans the sale of luxury goods to North Korea.

"I think the North Korean population has been losing height and weight over the years," Mr. Bolton said. "Maybe this will be a little diet for Kim Jong-il," he said, referring to the North Korean dictator.

Under the resolution, member states are to report to the Security Council within 30 days on steps they have taken to comply with the its demands.

The resolution still invokes Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which makes mandatory economic and diplomatic sanctions. China and Russia customarily resist the Chapter VII provision on the grounds that it sets a pretext for the use of military force, as many countries believe it did in Iraq.

But in a formulation used in July to obtain a unanimous vote on the resolution condemning the North Korean missile launches, the text added a reference to Article 41 of the chapter, which permits only "means not involving the use of military force."

In another change designed to gain Chinese and Russian support, the resolution now says the inspection process will be "cooperative" with local authorities. Both countries were sensitive to such interdiction being done near their coasts and borders, but Mr. Bolton said that though the inspections covered air, sea and land shipments, he expected most actions would be performed in port.

As for the agreement struck to limit the arms embargo to specific weapons like missiles, tanks, attack helicopters, artillery systems, warships and combat aircraft, Mr. Bolton said, "That would place under embargo the most dangerous, most sophisticated, most lethal weapons, so that's a substantial step forward, and, as I say, we're happy to accept that as a compromise."

Concerns Include Possible Seizure of Ships

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 13 -- The United States and Japan pushed for a Saturday vote on a Security Council resolution that would condemn North Korea's reported nuclear test and impose an embargo on the communist government's trade in weapons of mass destruction, ballistic missiles, most conventional heavy weapons and luxury goods.

But Russia raised new concerns that the resolution fails to adequately define what weapons-related goods would be covered by the embargo. And China, backed by Russia, insisted that the United States include greater assurances that the resolution could not be used to justify the armed seizure of North Korean ships traveling in international waters.

The Security Council's five permanent members -- the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France -- and Japan said they would continue negotiations Saturday morning and convene a meeting of the 15-nation council at noon.

The impasse came several hours after John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, announced that the resolution enjoyed the "unanimous agreement" of the council's key powers. "I'm still ready to go for a vote. We'll just have to see what the instructions are, particularly from Moscow and China," he said Friday evening.

The U.S.-backed draft text urges states to enforce the embargo by inspecting cargo entering or leaving North Korea. It would also ban travel and freeze the bank accounts of North Korean officials linked to the country's most lethal weapons programs.

To secure Chinese and Russian support for the resolution, the United States, Japan and their European allies have already agreed to include explicit assurances that the resolution could not be used as a pretext for military action. They also dropped other strong measures, including a U.S. proposal to give Pyongyang a 30-day deadline to suspend its nuclear activities or face additional penalties. Japan withdrew a series of controversial proposals to ban all North Korean exports and to prohibit North Korean aircraft and vessels from arriving in foreign ports.

But Bolton said that Russia raised concerns late Friday about four new problems with the text. The most important, according to Bolton, involved the "question of how we will define nuclear, biological and chemical and weapon-related materials and ballistic missile components."

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, said Friday morning that many of the chief obstacles to an agreement had been cleared but that the council would "bridge a few final points" where some minor differences remained. But Wang told reporters that Chinese officials had discovered other problems in the text.

China's chief concern involves a provision calling for international inspections of North Korean cargo. China expressed concern that some states could invoke the provision to justify the seizure of North Korean ships in international waters, an act that Wang insists would be a violation of international law.

Bolton countered that there are existing international and national laws "that allow the boarding of ships in international waters." He said that those laws provide the authority for the U.S.-sponsored Proliferation Security Initiative, an agreement among 16 states to coordinate interdiction operations on the high seas. Bolton described the resolution as "a kind of codification" of the Proliferation Security Initiative and said that there is nothing new or different in the current resolution on North Korea.

Bolton also differed with Wang over the importance of a ban on luxury goods, which he said had been crafted to prevent North Korea's rulers, primarily the leader, Kim Jong Il, from spending lavishly on expensive foreign goods. "I think, you know, the North Korean population's been losing average height and weight over the years, and maybe this'll be a little diet for Kim Jong Il."

Wang said that a ban on luxury goods was unnecessary and too vague. "I don't know what luxury good means, because luxury goods can mean many things for different people," Wang told reporters.

U.S. officials believe it is essential to pass the resolution this weekend, before Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice embarks next week on a trip to Japan, South Korea and China. Rice plans to meet with senior officials on implementing the provisions, including restricting North Korea's arms trade, the State Department announced.

"We'll be looking for ways to increase our cooperation with other countries and to make it clear to North Korea that it's going to have to figure out another way to earn its living besides this type of activity," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill said yesterday at the National Press Club.

Kessler reported from Washington.

The Search For Pyongyang's Pressure Point (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

As the countries of the United Nations wrangle over the sanctions to be imposed on North Korea following its nuclear test this week, doubts are being cast on the effectiveness of whatever measures are agreed.

With China and South Korea fearing the collapse of their volatile neighbour, and with a large proportion of North Korea's income coming from illegal trade, even targeted sanctions would have a limited impact. The regime has already survived the death of its founder and a famine that killed up to 10 per cent of its population.

Rüdiger Frank, a North Korean economy specialist at the University of Vienna, said: "I don't think there is any more room for more sanctions from the usual suspects. To be effective, China and South Korea have to join.

"But a nuclear North Korea is even more risky in case of collapse than just a humanitarian catastrophe, so why would they increase the chance of a collapse."

North Korea says its missile launches in July and the nuclear test were "self-defence" in response to US financial sanctions imposed in September last year to curb alleged counterfeiting and money laundering.

DOJ_NMG_0081339

Now the US, Europe and Japan are all calling for a tough UN resolution and authorisation for countries to interdict shipments to and from North Korea, both of which China is opposing.

The dispute over the extent of sanctions reflects differences over the purposes of the measure. While the US and perhaps Japan are eyeing regime change, China and South Korea would be happy with a change in behaviour.

Marcus Noland, of Washington's Institute for International Economics, said economic sanctions were seldom effective in changing behaviour.

"If the sanctions were going to have any shot at working they would have to be comprehensive sanctions, as suggested by Japan," he said. "That package was big enough to potentially have an impact and it also had the benefit of simplicity, but they would also imply a significant degree of hardship for ordinary people."

But the suggested targeted sanctions were too weak to be effective and because of their complexity, they almost invited circumvention, Mr Noland said.

"Weak sanctions may be counterproductive because President Bush and President Roh [of South Korea] warn that they will not tolerate a nuclear test but they are not imposing the penalties or incentives to back it up. That might tempt North Korea to push the envelope even further," he said.

Much of the crisis can be traced back to North Korea's dire economic situation. The differences between the North and South Korean economies could not be more stark. The mineral-rich north had always been the industrial heartland and the more fertile South was traditionally the rice bowl.

Indeed, the South's gross domestic product did not overtake the North's until the early 1970s but now at $700bn (£377bn, €558bn), it is about 40 times larger than that of the North's.

Economic reforms that Pyongyang begrudgingly introduced in 2002, which liberalised prices and wages, have led to some changes in North Korea's decrepit economy and trade has grown exponentially.

The South's Korea Trade Investment Promotion Agency estimates the value of North Korea's legal foreign trade crossed the $3bn mark last year, the highest since the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991, with trade with China comprising more than half of the total.

But it is North Korea's sizeable illegal trade that will further dilute any economic sanctions. Analysts suggest North Korea earns about one-third of its revenues from aid, one-third from conventional exports and the remainder from criminal activities.

Crime is such a fundamental part of North Korea's economy that David Asher, co-ordinator of the US State Department's North Korea working group from 2003 to 2005, calls the country the "Soprano state".

"North Korea is perhaps the only country in the world whose embassies and overseas personnel are ex-pected to contribute income to the 'Party Centre', not rely on central government funds for their operations," said Mr Asher in a speech at the Wilson Centre last November.

Several North Korean diplomats have been caught carrying narcotics through eastern European countries in recent years. In 2004, a North Korean ship carrying $150m worth of heroin was seized in Australia.

Pyongyang has also been producing and distributing counterfeit US dollars, cigarettes and pharmaceuticals, especially the erectile dysfunction drugs Viagra and Cialis.

Counterfeit cigarettes are said to depart regularly from the North Korean ports of Rajin and Nampo for shipment through China and South Korea to the rest of the world, and tobacco companies have identified factories producing counterfeit cigarettes in North Korea.

But the international community is now most concerned about the prospect of North Korea trading missile and weapons of mass destruction technology, a concern that is only likely to be heightened with sanctions.

Jon Wolfsthal, of the Centre for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said: "North Korea is probably going to want to hold on to their precious weapons technology. But if the US squeezes them, that increases the risk that they might sell weapons to ensure their survival."

Vote On N. Korea Faces Last Hurdles (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

China and Russia have lingering concerns about sanctions sought today at the U.N.

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council plans to vote today on a resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea for its declared nuclear test after a last-minute session to address Chinese and Russian concerns over how to implement them.

Tests showing radiation in gases near North Korea dispelled most doubts that the nation had exploded a nuclear device, which had arisen after earlier sampling did not detect any nuclear particles in the air, a U.S. government official said.

The resolution calls for a ban on goods related to North Korea's missile and nuclear programs and a freeze on financial activities that support them, as well as a travel ban for senior North Korean officials. It also would put an embargo on heavy conventional weapons and luxury goods. A draft introduced late Thursday included a provision, requested by China and Russia, that made clear that the resolution would not allow military enforcement without another resolution.

But China has balked at a measure that would allow the inspection and seizure of suspected nuclear and missile materials going in and out of North Korea, arguing that it could provoke confrontation, interfere with commerce and allow intrusive activity too close to its borders.

The measure is based on the 2003 U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, or PSI, involving a group of 16 core countries that have agreed to take steps to stop the flow of weapons of mass destruction, including boarding ships for aggressive inspections. Russia is a member of the core group, and more than 80 other nations have signed on.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton, one of the architects of the initiative, said that including such a measure in the North Korea resolution would oblige nations to help with cargo inspections at air and sea ports and border crossings, and that it was consistent with international law. "I see that as a natural evolution," Bolton said.

China, however, said it could not agree to the inspections. "Politically, China will not do it," said the nation's ambassador, Wang Guangya. "I believe that the exercises under PSI will easily lead, whether it is intentional or not, to … escalations of provocations."

Russia called a special session Friday afternoon to discuss objections to the implementation of the sanctions as outlined in the draft.

"We are not there yet," Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said about hopes for the entire Security Council voting in favor of the resolution. "It will be unanimous if and when, when and if, we vote unanimously on this resolution."

The council plans to vote this afternoon after meetings to finalize proposed changes.

"I'm still ready to go for a vote," Bolton said Friday night. "We'll just have to see what instructions are overnight from Russia and China." The two countries, neighbors and major trade partners of North Korea, are considered crucial to the implementation of the tough new sanctions.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice set plans to visit China, South Korea and Japan next week to discuss vigorous enforcement of the proposed sanctions, and to try to show a common front with allies, officials said.

Sean McCormack, the chief State Department spokesman, told reporters that Rice would be talking "about how to actually go about implementing the resolution." Experts have said that the importance of the new resolution will depend largely on how strictly it is enforced.

Rice also plans to talk to leaders more broadly about regional security issues and nonproliferation efforts, McCormack said.

Christopher Hill, U.S. assistant secretary of State for East Asia, said Rice would urge other countries to stringently apply the sanctions.

"A key part of her trip will be to make sure that the resolution, when passed, will really have teeth to it, and will really function properly," Hill said at an event sponsored by Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs and Foreign Policy magazine. "We need to make sure that we have devised something that works" against North Korea, he said.

Meanwhile, tests of air samples collected near North Korea have confirmed the small-magnitude blast Monday was a nuclear explosion, the U.S. government official said.

Results of initial tests, released early Friday, found no evidence of radioactivity in air particles. But subsequent tests on gases collected by a WC-135 "sniffer plane" were positive for radiation, indicating an atomic explosion, the U.S. official said.

The samples were tested at the Air Force Technical Applications Center at Patrick Air Force Base in Florida.

U.S. Finding Indicates Nuclear Test (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Betsy Pisik, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

U.S. intelligence agencies have detected radioactive particles in air samples collected near North Korea's nuclear testing facility, leading analysts to conclude that the blast detected Monday was a nuclear explosion, Bush administration officials said last night.

DOJ_NMG_0081341

Meanwhile, at U.N. headquarters in New York, the United States, China and Russia agreed yesterday on sanctions against North Korea for its claimed nuclear test, with Washington backing away from its tough demands of inspections at sea to assuage fears by Beijing and Moscow of a U.S. naval buildup in East Asia.

Diplomats said they expected a vote by the 15-nation U.N. Security Council as early as today.

Washington agreed to accept language ruling out a military response to win backing from China and Russia, which have vetoes in the council.

But differences remained over how far the United Nations could go in authorizing searches of North Korean ships.

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador at the United Nations who had pressed for a "swift and strong" response to Monday's reported nuclear test, said he was pleased with the latest draft.

"I hope that we will have a vote -- expect to have a vote by the 14th of October, five days [after the test]," Mr. Bolton said. "So that is, I think, a sign of the determination of the council in the face of this threat to move quickly."

The detected radioactive particles were picked up by sensors aboard aircraft flying off the coast of North Korea around the time the Oct. 9 blast was detected by seismic sensors northwest of the town of Kilchu.

Processing of the data collected by the WC-135 aircraft, called "sniffers" because of the chemical sensors that can detect particles of radioactive material, has been under way for the past five days.

Analysis of data by a laboratory in Florida is the first indication that nuclear particles were found after the test.

The finding of such particles is significant because it supports other evidence by U.S. intelligence agencies of a test and will likely lead to a more definitive conclusion that the explosion produced a nuclear yield.

One senior intelligence official said the sensor data indicating nuclear particles supports the main theory of intelligence analysts that the underground test was a plutonium device that did not fully detonate.

The blast detected by sensors created a shock wave equivalent to a magnitude 4.2 earthquake and nuclear specialists estimated that the blast was 0.2 kilotons, or the equivalent of 200 tons of TNT.

That size is far smaller than the 4 kilotons that North Korean officials told China prior to the test would be the size of the demonstration shot.

A defense official said it is almost impossible for an underground nuclear test not to produce some venting of radioactive particles because the particles escape through the ground or through the opening of the tunnel.

The U.N. draft document to impose sanctions on North Korea expresses "profound concern that the test claimed by [North Korea] had generated increased tension in the region and beyond, and [determined] therefore that there is a clear threat to international peace and security."

There were conflicting reports yesterday whether radiation had been detected at the test site. But the relatively small size of the explosion indicated that the blast had failed to set off a nuclear chain reaction.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice prepared to head to China, Japan and South Korea early next week to discuss steps to implement the U.N. resolution.

The latest draft:

·Prohibits the transfer of material or technology to Pyongyang that can be used in nuclear, ballistic missile or other weapons of mass destruction-related programs.

·Prohibits sales or transfers of heavy conventional weapons such as tanks, warships and combat aircraft to North Korea.

·States that the resolution does not authorize the use of military force against North Korea.

·Allows travel bans on people involved in North Korean weapons programs and their families.

·Demands Pyongyang immediately return without condition to the six-nation talks about energy and security concerns, and rejoin international nonproliferation agreements.

·Bans sales of luxury goods, such as cognac and gourmet food, to the North.

"The North Korean population's been losing average height and weight over the years, and maybe this will be a little diet for Kim Jong-il," Mr. Bolton said.

He was referring to the North Korean leader, who is said to import vast quantities of lobster, caviar, fine wines and expensive cuts of sushi for himself, his family and close associates.

The sanctions were carefully tailored not to impose additional hardship on North Korea's impoverished population, most of whom are dependent on rations from international donors.

The document also emphasizes regional cooperation, in part to satisfy Chinese fears of a greater U.S. military presence in the region.

North Korea is likely to take a higher profile at the United Nations, now that it claims to have conducted a nuclear test and is threatening additional testing.

South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, unanimously selected yesterday by the U.N. General Assembly to be the next secretary-general of the world body, has pledged to work for peace and stability in Asia.

Mr. Ban told reporters yesterday evening that he would stress improved communications between nations and North Korea.

"Diplomacy is very important," he said. "Even during military conflicts there needs to be room for dialogue. I have always been saying that we need to take a two-pronged approach. Sometimes we take a stern and strong position, but there is room for dialogue, it is absolutely necessary."

One of the resolution's most ambitious planks is to create an international inspection regime that could, in theory, allow authorities to board ships, planes and trucks going into or out of North Korea.

North Korean neighbors Russia and China sought last-minute changes in the inspection regime, fearing that it would increase the presence of U.S. warships in the region.

The five veto-wielding council members -- the United States, Britain, China, France and Russia -- met late yesterday with Japan, which holds the council presidency this month.

Wang Guangya, China's U.N. ambassador, said negotiations would continue today.

The inspection proposal is modeled on the 2003 Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI).

The United States and 65 other nations have voluntarily agreed to inspections under the PSI, in which members agree to share intelligence and resources to contain weapons of mass destruction. North Korea is not a member.

The U.S. and Bahrain yesterday announced they would practice interdicting nuclear material and equipment at sea on Oct. 31, in the Persian Gulf, off the coast of Iran.

Kuwait, France and Britain are also expected to participate.

U.S., Japan Seek N. Korea Sanctions Vote (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

The U.S. and Japan said they want a vote Saturday by the U.N. Security Council on a resolution imposing punishing sanctions on North Korea for its claimed nuclear test and demanding the elimination of all its nuclear weapons. But last-minute changes sought by Russia and China could delay a vote.

The five permanent council members — the U.S., Russia, China, Britain and France — and Japan were to meet Saturday morning before the full 15-member council convenes to discuss the changes.

"I'm still ready to go for a vote, and we'll just have to see what the instructions are overnight, in particular from Moscow and China," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said late Friday, adding the changes were essentially technical in nature.

He said a vote could still be possible on Saturday.

In an effort by the U.S. and its allies to compromise, the latest draft expressly rules out military action against North Korea, a demand by the Russians and Chinese. The Americans also eliminated a complete ban on the sale of conventional weapons; instead, the draft limits the embargo to major hardware such as tanks, warships, combat aircraft and missiles.

But the resolution would still ban the import or export of material and equipment that could be used to make nuclear weapons or ballistic missiles, and would authorize all countries to inspect cargo leaving and arriving in North Korea to prevent any illegal trafficking.

The accord came as U.S. officials said Friday that an air sampling taken after North Korea's claimed nuclear test detected radioactive debris consistent with an atomic explosion. However, the Bush administration and congressional officials said no final determination had been made about the nature of last weekend's mystery-shrouded blast.

The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information.

Results from another test disclosed Friday — an initial air sampling on Tuesday — showed no evidence of radioactive particles that would be expected from a successful nuclear detonation, a U.S. government intelligence official said.

Meanwhile, North Korean ships loaded their final cargo of secondhand bicycles and household appliances in the Japanese port city of Sakaiminato after Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's Cabinet agreed to ban trade with the communist state. The unilateral Japanese sanctions also include a six-month ban on travel to Japan by all North Korean government officials.

The U.S. and other nations trying to persuade the North to give up its atomic program continued a flurry of high-level diplomatic visits. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice planned a trip next week to Asia; Russia sent an envoy to Pyongyang; and the presidents of China and South Korea — the North's main sources of trade and aid — met in Beijing to discuss the proposed resolution.

Bolton said earlier Friday that the council's agreement just five days after North Korea's announcement it had detonated a nuclear device was "a sign of the determination of the council in the face of this threat to move quickly."

DOJ_NMG_0081343

The U.S.-sponsored draft would declare that Monday's test claimed by North Korea had increased tension in northeast Asia, creating "a clear threat to international peace and security." It would condemn the claimed test in "flagrant disregard" of the council's appeal not to detonate a nuclear device, demand that North Korea not conduct any further test or launch any more ballistic missiles, and authorize a range of economic and diplomatic sanctions.

The draft would also freeze the financial assets of — and impose a travel ban on — individuals and entities with any connection to North Korea's weapons or missile programs. It would also ban countries from selling luxury goods to North Korea.

Asked why, Bolton said, "I think the North Korean population has been losing average height and weight over the years and maybe this will be a little diet for Kim Jong Il," North Korea's leader.

Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya, asked earlier whether Beijing was prepared to go along with the ban, said: "I don't know what luxury goods means, because luxury goods can mean many things for different people ... if they don't have it."

The latest draft resolution still invokes Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which the U.S. views as a necessary enforcement tool because it makes economic and diplomatic sanctions mandatory.

China and Russia normally object to the Chapter 7 provision because it carries the possibility of military enforcement. The Bush administration used the same provision to justify its invasion of Iraq, and Moscow and Beijing worry the U.S. might do the same eventually with North Korea — even though President Bush has said the U.S. has no plans to attack.

But in a compromise also used in July to reach a unanimous vote on a resolution condemning North Korean missile launches, the text added mention of Article 41 of the chapter, which permits only "means not involving the use of military force."

In another key change to gain Chinese and Russian support, the resolution now says the inspection process — which covers shipments by land, air and sea — will be "cooperative" with local authorities. Both China and Russia share borders with North Korea and are uncomfortable with the possibility of the U.S. inderdicting ships near their coasts. At any rate, Bolton said he expected most actions would be performed at ports.

South Korea's Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, who has been a key figure in dealings with North Korea, told reporters soon after the General Assembly voted by acclamation to appoint him the next U.N. secretary-general that he hopes the Security Council will be able to adopt the resolution Saturday and send "a very strong and clear message" to Pyongyang.

The resolution would rely on all countries to implement the sanctions, but it would create a sanctions committee comprising all 15 Security Council nations to monitor implementation and report any violations to the council for possible further action.

Rice's trip to China, South Korea and Japan is the next step in the U.S. diplomatic offensive at the United Nations and with Pyongyang's neighbors. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said "she's going to be talking about the passage of that resolution certainly, but really what comes after."

The trip is meant to present a unified front to North Korea, which will be looking for any cracks in the diplomatic coalition behind the U.N. statement. Coming less than a month before midterm congressional elections, Rice's trip is also an opportunity for the Bush administration to highlight its work countering dangerous regimes and terror threats.

The council's moves coincided with a Russian news agency report that North Korea favors the implementation of a year-old agreement to abandon its nuclear programs in exchange for aid and security guarantees. The ITAR-Tass news agency quoted Russia's Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Alexeyev speaking after consultations in Pyongyang.

The report apparently referred to an agreement reached in September 2005 at six-nation talks involving the two Koreas, the U.S., China, Russia and Japan. Pyongyang has boycotted the talks for the past 13 months to protest financial measures imposed by Washington for alleged counterfeiting and money-laundering.

If the Russian report is confirmed, it could signify a major breakthrough in efforts to curb North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

UN Sets Vote On North Korea As Russia Seeks Changes (Update8) (BLOOM)

By Todd Zeranski

Bloomberg, October 14, 2006

Oct. 13 (Bloomberg) -- The United Nations Security Council scheduled a vote tomorrow on a draft resolution sanctioning North Korea for a suspected nuclear-bomb test as the U.S. attempted late today to iron out differences with Russia on specific penalties.

The Russian government expressed reservations about a list of banned items that could be used in developing nuclear, biological and chemical weapons, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told reporters at the UN. He said the changes Russia sought weren't ``substantial'' and he hoped the vote would go forward.

DOJ_NMG_0081344

The U.S. and Japan are trying to win international backing for penalties against the North Korean government of dictator Kim Jong Il to curtail nuclear-weapons development. South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon, who was elected the next secretary-general of the UN today, urged the Security Council to ``send out a very strong, unified and clear message'' to North Korea that would thwart further tests.

The new schedule is for the five veto-wielding members of the Security Council -- Russia, China, the U.S., France and the U.K. -- plus Japan to meet at 10 a.m. after receiving instructions from their capitals, Bolton said. Japan would preside over a full council meeting at noon.

``We do have unanimous agreement'' on the main text of the resolution, Bolton said earlier in the day. North Korea announced Oct. 8 that it had it carried out its first nuclear test, drawing condemnation from around the world. The UN Security Council began emergency consultations the next day.

Concession to China

In a concession to China, the U.S. dropped explicit reference to a part of the UN Charter that would make sanctions militarily enforceable, changing it to Article 41 of Chapter 7, which only authorizes diplomatic and economic sanctions. Agreement on a draft Security Council resolution circulated by the U.S. on North Korea sanctions had been held up because of opposition from China and Russia.

``Realistically there was no military option for the United States, anyway,'' said Derek Mitchell, a special assistant for Asia-Pacific affairs for the secretary of defense during the Clinton administration. ``The important thing is to get a unanimous resolution to demonstrate unity to the North Koreans. That speaks to why the administration is flexible at this point.''

Warships, Tanks

The resolution would bar the sale or transfer of missiles, warships, tanks, attack helicopters and combat aircraft, as well as missile- and nuclear-related goods to the North Korean government. So-called ``luxury goods'' would also be banned, though there hasn't been any specific mention of which items would fall into this category.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Beijing, Seoul and Tokyo Oct. 17-22 to talk about the resolution and ``how to go about actually implementing that resolution,'' State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters today in Washington.

``Such a resolution doesn't meet everything that the Bush administration wanted'' said Adam Ward, an Asia analyst who is in charge of the Washington office of the International Institute for Strategic Studies, a London-based policy study group. ``On the other hand, the administration takes the view that at least now the process is under way, and that there will be follow-on action in the Security Council if the demands of the international community are not met.''

Japanese Sanctions

Japanese Ambassador Kenzo Oshima predicted the measure would be ``very effective.'' Japan today implements national measures against North Korea in ``three key areas: import ban, ban on ships and a travel ban,'' he said.

``We felt it very necessary to have some extra measures, a measure to reflect the strong feelings of the government and people of Japan in respect to the nuclear test.''

A group similar to the U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, which shares intelligence to combat the spread of weapons of mass destruction, would carry out inspections in seaports, airports and other transit points of cargo headed to or from North Korea, though Bolton said inspections could also take place at sea.

Ships at Sea

The Security Council may still be discussing whether the resolution should allow inspections of ships at sea, an issue on which China disagrees with the U.S., to make sure North Korea isn't sharing nuclear technology with other countries or terrorist groups, Mitchell said.

``The Chinese worry North Korea would see that as an act of war,'' Mitchell, who is currently a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said.

The resolution demands that North Korea return to the so- called six-party talks, aimed at disarming its weapons program, and eliminate its nuclear and missile programs. Unidentified North Korean officials associated with missile- and nuclear weapons-programs would face a ban on travel.

North Korea is prepared to implement a year-old accord that involves abandoning its nuclear plans in exchange for aid and security guarantees, the Associated Press reported, citing a Russian envoy quoted by the ITAR-Tass news agency. No further details were immediately available.

At the White House, spokesman Tony Snow told reporters that he had seen and couldn't confirm reports that North Korea may be ready for nuclear talks.

DOJ_NMG_0081345

``All they have to do is say they're going to return to the six-party talks, and that they're going to put an end to their nuclear program and a lot of good things will happen," Snow said. ``Keep in mind the North Koreans are not above a little gamesmanship a few hours before the United Nations is getting ready to vote on a resolution."

Air Sample

Initial results of an air sample collected Oct. 10 to verify North Korea's claim that it conducted a nuclear test show no signs of radioactive particles, a U.S. intelligence official said. A final analysis of the sample will be completed later today or tomorrow, said the official, who requested anonymity.

The results don't definitively cast doubt on North Korea's assertion that it conducted an underground nuclear test because the bomb's fumes may have been contained initially, the official said. Still, it's difficult to keep some the fumes from eventually venting into the atmosphere, the official said.

White House spokesman Snow earlier today told reporters ``there may not be" a definitive conclusion to questions about the North Korean test.

Preliminary Samples Hint At North Korean Nuclear Test (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 13 — With the United Nations preparing to vote on whether to impose harsh sanctions on North Korea, American intelligence officials said on Friday evening they had found new evidence that the country detonated a nuclear bomb deep inside a mountain in its desolate northern territory.

An analysis of air samples taken in the region on Wednesday found radioactive material that is “consistent with a North Korean nuclear test,” according to a document sent to lawmakers on Capitol Hill on Friday by the office of John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence.

But a senior intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said that the results were still preliminary and that final analysis of the data would not be completed for several days.

The document was provided to The New York Times on Friday evening.

One day after the blast, the Pentagon dispatched Air Force planes with special radiation detectors into international airspace near North Korea. The official did not say whether the planes had collected the radioactive sample.

One question that remains is whether the explosion that North Korean leaders announced with great fanfare might actually have been a failure or merely a partial success.

Both intelligence officials and independent scientists have said that the detonation was a “sub-kiloton” blast — an explosion far smaller than typical nuclear tests by novice bomb designers. One widely held theory is that the nuclear blast was less powerful than the North Koreans had hoped it would be.

Earlier this week, American officials said the North Koreans had notified the Chinese government that the nuclear test would be in the range of four kilotons.

“Based in very incomplete information, it smells to me like a fizzle,” said Sidney Drell, a theoretical physicist and arms control expert at The Hoover Institution at Stanford University.

Given the comparatively small size of the blast, American officials said, it is possible that only a small amount of radioactive material leaked from the subterranean test site.

Because the test was conducted by one of the world’s most closed societies, the Pentagon and intelligence agencies have had to construct complicated computer models to try to prove North Korean claims of a nuclear test. They used the models to calculate the times that the Air Force’s WC-135 “Constant Phoenix” aircraft would have the best chance to collect samples of radiation from the explosion.

Military officials said earlier in the week that the ability to detect any radiation would depend partly on the uncertainties of nature because the prevailing winds would have to blow east toward the military aircraft patrols.

Professor Drell also said that any radiation leakage would depend on the geology of the test site. The explosion could have blasted new holes in rock formations that would allow radioactive material to seep into the air. But the blast could also have sealed off subterranean passages and reduced the chances for leakage.

“We’re in the process now of going through, looking through all the data and all the facts to try to come up with the best possible explanation for what, exactly, happened there,” said Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman.

“We don’t know yet.”

U.S. Detects Signs Of Radiation Consistent With Test (WP)

By Dafna Linzer And Walter Pincus, Washington Post Staff Writers

DOJ_NMG_0081346

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Initial environmental samples collected by a U.S. military aircraft detected signs of radiation over the Sea of Japan, possibly confirming North Korea's nuclear test, intelligence officials said yesterday.

Officials said the positive radiation result was consistent with an atomic test and would make it possible to rule out the possibility that Monday's test had been conducted with conventional explosives alone. But intelligence and administration officials were cautious about reaching a conclusion before reviewing all incoming data. "The intelligence community continues to analyze the data," said Frederick Jones, spokesman for the National Security Council. "When the intelligence community has a determination to present, we will make that public."

Earlier detection attempts by the United States, China and South Korea did not pick up any radiation. An intelligence official said additional samples are being collected, and analysts are also taking a harder look at seismic data, satellite photos and communications intercepts.

North Korea, according to U.S. intelligence estimates, has enough plutonium for as many as a dozen nuclear weapons, depending on their level of sophistication. Some analysts have judged Pyongyang's technical capabilities in the nuclear design field to be at a low level. But there are now discussions among top U.S. weapons scientists and analysts whether North Korea may have managed to test a miniaturized warhead or a more sophisticated design than was expected.

"When you look at the rest of their activities, increasing sophistication isn't the first thing you think of, but it hasn't been discarded either," said one nuclear scientist who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of instructions from superiors to avoid talking to reporters about the test.

U.S. intelligence experts say they believe, though cannot prove, that the North Korean blast was the result of a partial implosion of plutonium at the core of the test device. That would mean some of the plutonium failed to implode, but intelligence officials do not claim to know why. The blast yield was less than a kiloton, far smaller than the 20-to-23-kiloton bomb the U.S. military dropped on Japan 60 years ago, and less than the four-kiloton yield the North Koreans told the Chinese to expect in advance of Monday's test.

Several theories about the small yield include the possibility that the device's design was slightly imperfect and thus failed to set off explosive charges simultaneously. Without the simultaneous detonation, the plutonium would fail to fully compress and implode.

If the test was conducted with a miniaturized nuclear device, however, it is possible that the North Koreans were able to conceal any radiation, as they claimed. One analyst suggested that the test may have been conducted in a horizontal tunnel with a vertical drop at the end, thus reducing the chance for radiation to vent into the air.

In an interview with the Hankyoreh, a Seoul-based newspaper, a North Korean diplomat said Tuesday that the test "was smaller than expected, but a small success means a larger success is possible."

He added that the aim was "to possess nuclear weapons," and that it would be possible to take additional measures such as preparing to load nuclear warheads onto missiles.

Even without a definitive conclusion about the test, it set off jitters in neighboring South Korea. A statement signed by 17 former defense ministers and veterans called on the Seoul government to request that the United States redeploy tactical nuclear weapons, which were removed by George H.W. Bush's administration in 1991.

Ironically, it was the initial stationing of U.S. tactical nuclear artillery shells along the demilitarized zone between North and South Korea in the late 1960s that prompted Pyongyang to begin a nuclear program.

The chances of the United States redeploying those weapons are slim; Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday that the goal of U.S. diplomacy is to denuclearize the Korean Peninsula.

U.S.: Test Points To N. Korea Nuke Blast (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns And Anne Gearan, Associated Press Writers

AP, October 14, 2006

An air sampling taken after North Korea's claimed nuclear test detected radioactive debris consistent with an atomic explosion, Bush administration and congressional officials said Friday night. They said no final determination had been made about the nature of last weekend's mystery-shrouded blast.

One U.S. government official said intelligence officials assigned an 80 percent probability that the North Korean explosion was a nuclear detonation, based on the air sample collected Wednesday. The official said it appeared highly unlikely that the sample of radioactive material was produced by any other source, including a nuclear power reactor.

The official also said additional sampling might be conducted, not necessarily by airborne means. He would not elaborate, citing security concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0081347

A senior administration official suggested that the North Korean test was a dud. "The betting is that this was an attempt at a nuclear test that failed," the official said. "We don't think they were trying to fake a nuclear test, but it may have been a nuclear fizzle."

The officials who described the results spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information.

North Korea's claim of a successful nuclear test Monday sent shock waves throughout Asia and around the world. President Bush has called for stiff United Nations sanctions on North Korea, while refusing appeals by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and others to take part in one-one-one talks with the reclusive communist regime.

Since North Korea's announcement, the United States and other nations have been conducting scientific tests to determine whether a nuclear explosion had occurred.

The administration briefed key members of Congress about the preliminary test results of an air sample an official said was collected above Qunggye, near the area of the claimed nuclear test.

Results from another test disclosed Friday — an initial air sampling on Tuesday — showed no evidence of radioactive particles that would be expected from a successful nuclear detonation, a U.S. government intelligence official said.

The contradictory readings reinforced uncertainty about the size and success of Monday's underground explosion, which North Korea has trumpeted as a nuclear test. Data from seismic sensors have already indicated the explosion was smaller than expected.

The Chinese and Japanese governments have done their own air sampling and found no trace of radioactive material, officials from both countries said Friday. A Japanese government official said his country sampled air over the Sea of Japan, as well as rainfall and ground-level air on Japanese territory and found nothing.

A spokesman for National Intelligence Director John Negroponte declined to comment on any findings from U.S. spy agencies.

One Republican lawmaker, citing the release of "intelligence reports appearing to confirm the likelihood of a North Korean nuclear test," backed Bush's call for a return to international talks. But the lawmaker, Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., also parted company with the president, saying that if a "prominent American delegation — preferably a bipartisan one — get North Korea to walk back from the ledge, we should do so."

The State Department, meanwhile, announced that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to China, South Korea and Japan next week to discuss steps to pressure North Korea to drop its nuclear efforts and to assess the region's security situation.

Members of the U.N. Security Council agreed Friday on wording of a resolution that would clamp sanctions on the communist country. The draft, scheduled for a Saturday vote, would authorize nonmilitary sanctions against the North, and says that any further action the council might want to take would require another U.N. resolution.

It also eliminates a blanket arms embargo from a tougher, previous draft, instead targeting specific equipment for sanctions including missiles, tanks, warships and combat aircraft.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said that on Rice's trip, "she's going to be talking about the passage of that resolution certainly, but really what comes after."

Rice's trip is meant to present a unified front to North Korea, which will be looking for any cracks in the diplomatic coalition behind the U.N. statement. Coming less than a month before midterm congressional elections, Rice's trip is also an opportunity for the Bush administration to highlight its work countering dangerous regimes and terror threats.

Beyond the threat to Asian neighbors and perhaps other nations posed by a nuclear North Korea, the administration is worried that Pyongyang could sell its nuclear know-how to terrorists or other potential U.S. enemies, including Iran.

"Now is the time really to be very firm — to be calm, but firm — and to make clear to the North Koreans that no one is going to accept them as a nuclear weapons state," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Friday at the National Press Club.

Analysts and government officials have said it may take weeks or longer to determine with confidence whether the North Korean explosion was nuclear.

The negative air sample was taken Tuesday by a specialized aircraft, the WC-135, flying from Kadena air base in Okinawa, Japan. It apparently took the sample over the Sea of Japan, between the Korean mainland and Japan.

In Beijing, a government official said Friday that Chinese monitoring also has found no evidence of airborne radiation from the test-explosion. The official with the State Environmental Protection Administration said China has been monitoring air samples since Monday.

The U.S., which has sought tough steps in the United Nations that could leave the door open to a blockade or other military action, has had to give ground to gain support from China and Russia. Those countries, along with South Korea, have been reluctant to abandon diplomatic efforts to resolve the standoff.

North Korea Spawns New Fears As Member Of Nuclear Club (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

BEIJING - It's been called an "evil state," a "psycho state" and even a "Soprano state" that survives on crime, like the fictional television mob family.

Its leader, Kim Jong Il, once a movie director, has come up with an extraordinary plot line: Steer a totalitarian, bankrupt regime to develop nuclear weapons, then use cunning to ride out international sanctions and keep a firm grip on the nukes.

The final episodes have yet to unfold: Will the protagonist dare to put a bomb atop a missile and fire it? Will he try "nuclear blackmail" to extort billions from his neighbors?

North Korea's missile sales and illicit activity, its involvement in terrorism and its ability to seal off its people from the outside world and to hide the doings of its leaders all make it a nuclear nation worth fearing.

But the whispers in the West that the secretive Kim is crazy are simply wrong, experts say.

"Here's a guy who is leader of a failed state with a failed ideology having survived with his father for the last 50 years pitting the major powers against each other," said Ralph Cossa, the head of the Honolulu-based Center for Strategic and International Studies' Pacific Forum.

"For a crazy man, he's pretty successful."

His latest triumph came at 10:36 a.m. Monday in a shaft about 1,180 feet under a mountain at the Hwadaeri testing facility near North Korea's northeastern border with Russia. There, North Korea set off an explosion that experts say probably was a nuclear test, though no test debris has been detected in the atmosphere. The relatively small size of the blast indicates that it might have been a fizzle.

But the shock value unnerved Western policymakers.

After all, North Korean intelligence agents killed 18 South Korean officials in Burma in 1983, and bombed an airliner out of the sky in 1987, killing 115 people.

In more recent years, the cash-strapped regime has turned to moneymaking endeavors such as peddling narcotics and fake Viagra, smuggling bogus Marlboro cigarettes and printing fake American $100 bills. It sells missile and weapons technology abroad, largely in the Middle East.

A profound mistrust between North Korea and the United States adds a hair-trigger feel to the crisis. North Korea believes that Washington is bent on its destruction.

"We are under extreme threat (from the) United States of nuclear war," North Korea's ambassador to Australia, Chon Jae Hong, said after the nuclear test. North Korean propaganda routinely is laden with threats against the United States.

North Korea is more isolated than any other nation on Earth. For half a century, its million citizens have lived in a cocoon, sealed off from the world, knowing only "juche," or self-reliance, first under the leadership of Kim Il Sung, the "Great Leader," then under his son, Kim Jong Il, the "Dear Leader."

The once-industrialized country has seen its factories deteriorate and stand empty from lack of electricity. Floods and poor management produced starvation beginning in the mid-1990s, and, though estimates are difficult, the toll is thought to have reached up to 2 million people. The economy took a turn for the better beginning in 2000 and agriculture improved, helped largely by fertilizer sent from South Korea.

Few tourists are permitted. Those who go must leave behind video cameras, cell phones and binoculars. Minders severely restrict what tourists can photograph.

Photos that get out reveal woeful poverty. Pictures at a Web site set up by Russian travelers to North Korea in July (http://www.fishmonger.ru/06-07-27) show peasants using rickety wooden carts with no tires on their wheels; they roll on metal rims.

Ordinary people have no access to newspapers or the Internet. TVs and radios are sealed so that they get only official broadcasts.

"All radios have fixed tuning that only allow three or four official channels," said Andrei N. Lankov, an expert on North Korea at Kookmin University in Seoul. Defectors tell of North Koreans huddling alone under thick blankets to listen to radios smuggled in from China or North Korean ones they've tinkered with to get South Korean or international broadcasts, said Betsy Henderson of Radio Free Asia in Washington.

A huge army burdens the militarized nation's paltry economy.

DOJ_NMG_0081349

"A majority of men aged 17 to 30 are soldiers. Think about it. One million soldiers. The whole population is just 22 million people. You hardly see any young males in the countryside or the cities," said Cui Yingjiu, a scholar on North Korea retired from Beijing University.

Cui knows North Korea as well as anyone. He was a university classmate of Kim Jong Il in 1961-64 in Pyongyang and visits the country about once a year.

Cui described Kim as charismatic and strong-willed, popular with students, fluent in Russian and displaying a strong affection for Hollywood films.

"He had a big collection of movies even then," Cui recalled.

Kim's short, paunchy stature and upswept hair didn't stop him on the social front.

"He's not timid. He's quite manly. ... Girls regarded him as attractive," Cui said.

When Kim took over power from his father, who died in 1994, North Korea was mired in crisis, struggling with the collapse of its benefactor, the Soviet Union. Kim steered the nation into criminal endeavors, allowing regime agents to ply the seams of global lawlessness.

U.S. officials say they've documented 50 incidents in 20 countries linking North Koreans, often diplomats, to drug trafficking.

Cases include the 2003 seizure in Australia of the North Korean ship Pong Su with 275 pounds of heroin worth $150 million aboard. In June 2004, Egypt detained North Korean diplomats smuggling vast quantities of an anti-anxiety drug. Six months later, Turkey arrested two diplomats with $7 million of a synthetic aphrodisiac.

More troubling, North Korea turned itself into a global "Missiles `R' Us," shipping entire advanced missiles or technology to anyone with a fat wallet.

Iran, Syria, Yemen, Libya and Pakistan were beneficiaries, and U.S. officials labeled North Korea the world's No. 1 missile proliferator.

Some of the earnings went into North Korea's nuclear program, which it agreed with Washington to suspend in 1994 in exchange for vast energy assistance. North Korea stopped its plutonium production and put it under the watch of the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency, and halted work on two larger reactors. It resumed reprocessing plutonium in 2003, shortly after U.S. officials said North Korea had admitted that it had a secret program to create highly enriched uranium, another fuel for nuclear weapons.

Kim's worries increased when President Bush declared in early 2002 that North Korea was part of an "axis of evil" that included Iraq and Iran.

"North Korea saw how the U.S. invaded Iraq. Now Iran is under great pressure," Cui said. Many in the regime believe that "after Iran's collapse, it's going to be our turn."

As global tensions over Pyongyang rose, Beijing nudged Kim to loosen the reins on North Korea's economy and open to the world as China had done decades earlier. In 2001 and again early this year, Kim and a large entourage toured some of China's most modern regions.

To a limited degree, the tactic worked. Kim allowed farmers to sell their excess harvests and freed factory managers to do the same. He permitted some open markets and relaxed a hold on state banks. Foreign aid workers noticed less hunger and better conditions.

Yet power shortages remain constant, and the reforms triggered some social frictions as the government began to charge for housing and electricity. Some of the economic reforms were rolled back in 2005.

Kim now sees himself as locked in a chess match with Bush, two leaders with a propensity for strident language and a stubborn, determined view of the world, Cui said.

"Bush doesn't listen to the United Nations. Kim is the same. He doesn't listen to what Russia says, what China says, what the U.S. says. Don't you think the two men are similar?" he asked.

If Kim is backed into a corner, Cui said, his regime is capable of selling one of his nuclear weapons to a terrorist group or sparking a calamitous war by bombing Japan. Many North Koreans, weary of their plight, wouldn't object.

"They feel it's better to go to war than to continue suffering," he said.

North Korea: Joining The Nuclear Club? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

Since 1963, the global nuclear stockpile has been reduced to about 27,000 warheads, down from a peak of 70,000 in 1986, according to the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. A handful of countries have voluntarily abandoned nuclear-weapons programs, including Libya, Argentina, Brazil and South Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0081350

But the picture is complicated. Pakistan and India refrained from signing the nonproliferation treaty, claiming in part that it is unfair. Instead, they embarked on their own weapons programs. While that initially drew rebuke from the international community, the U.S. this year opened negotiations with India, saying it would be willing to overlook the nuclear transgression and send the country nuclear technology. Some nonproliferation experts claim this creates a double standard that could provide an incentive for countries to acquire nuclear weapons.

Another sticking point: Many of the five original nuclear countries continue to fund their nuclear-weapons programs, even though they agreed in the nonproliferation treaty to eventually disarm.

Is North Korea likely to use a nuclear weapon? Experts say it is highly unlikely North Korea would drop a nuclear bomb, mainly because its delivery systems aren't thought to be sophisticated enough to attach a nuclear warhead to a ballistic missile. Also North Korea is likely deterred by knowing that other nuclear nations would retaliate.

The bigger concern is that North Korea will help Iran proceed with a nuclear-weapons program by sending it technology and supplies, or that it becomes a nuclear-weapons supplier to terrorists who might not be deterred by retaliation since they don't reside in any one nation state.

FACTS

In 1998 Pakistan became the seventh nation to test a nuclear bomb. India -- the sixth nation to test a nuclear weapon in 1974 -- named its blast the Smiling Buddha. The test was conducted in May, the month when the Buddha's birth is celebrated.

There have been 2,051 nuclear tests conducted world-wide since 1945. Of all the tests, the U.S. accounts for half. Russia accounts for 35%. The world's largest nuclear test -- named Tsar Bomba -- was conducted by Russia in 1961 on an island in the Arctic Sea.

Under Operation Plowshare -- named after a Bible passage -- the U.S. tested so-called peaceful nuclear explosions for building canals and roads. One 1962 test, Operation Sedan, displaced 12 million tons of earth, creating a crater 1,280 feet in diameter.

The recent North Korean blast was equal to the force of 550 tons of TNT, according to South Korean geologists. That is about 4% of the force of the Hiroshima atomic bomb.

The first atomic bomb was detonated in the U.S. at 5:29 a.m. on July 16, 1945, in a New Mexico desert called Jornada del Muerto or Journey of Death. It led one witness to say "everything suddenly got brighter than daylight."

The largest U.S. nuclear weapon ever tested was in Bikini Atoll in 1954. The U.S. government paid $150 million to Bikinians for damages caused by the tests, and in 1996 reported that eating fruit on the island "could add significant radioactivity to the body."

POINTS OF VIEW

"If the U.S. keeps pestering us and increases pressure, we will regard it as a declaration of war and will take a series of physical corresponding measures."

-- North Korean government

"The United States remains committed to diplomacy. The United States also reserves all options to defend our friends and our interests in the region against the threats from North Korea."

--President Bush

"The North Korea test is certainly a major blow and challenge to nonproliferation, but people who are looking out and saying the sky is falling or the mushroom cloud is descending...are mistaken."

--George Perkovich, The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

"The treaty is unraveling. And unfortunately, the U.S. has lost the moral high ground because we're going after countries like North Korea and Iran saying they can't have nuclear weapons, otherwise, we'll nuke you."

Embargo Halts Families' Care Packages From Japan To North Korea (MCT)

By Emi Doi

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

TOKYO - Japan's decision to ban all shipping to North Korea starting Saturday in response to the North's apparent nuclear test this week will cut off care packages from ethnic Koreans who have lived in Japan for decades.

Among them is the divided family of ethnic Korean filmmaker Yang Yonghi, who lives in Japan.

DOJ_NMG_0081351

Yang made the documentary film "Dear Pyongyang" based on her visits to her brothers in North Korea over the past decade. Her father, an ethnic North Korean immigrant to Japan, sent his three sons back to North Korea to live in 1971. Yang, who was 6 at the time, said her brothers were all born in Japan.

For more than 30 years, they've not been allowed to return. Japan, like the United States, does not have diplomatic relations with North Korea.

Japan has a large Korean community because before World War II, when Japan colonized the Korean peninsula, Japanese officials forced several hundred thousand Koreans to move to Japan to work. These people and their descendants reside in Japan but don't have Japanese citizenship unless they ask for it.

In the film, Yang asked her father why he sent his sons to North Korea.

"I didn't have to send my sons back," he murmured. "The situation has changed so badly."

The filmmaker's mother for many years sent six or seven boxes full of school supplies, clothes and other goods to the sons and their families. She sent portable body warmers to her grandchildren when she heard they had suffered frostbite on their feet.

With the new shipping ban, she no longer knows what to do to help them.

"Dear Pyongyang" won the NETPAC Asian award at the Berlin International Film Festival and the special jury prize at the Sundance Film Festival this year.

Behind Enemy Reactors (NYT)

By Jon B. Wolfsthal

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

Washington

I CELEBRATED New Year's in 1996 by drinking cheap sparkling wine at the Yongbyon nuclear center, where North Korea produced the plutonium for its first nuclear test. Like dozens of dedicated civil servants, I served as an "on-site monitor" under the 1994 United States-North Korean nuclear agreement known as the Agreed Framework.

Those of us who served as monitors are proud of what we accomplished. I am not alone in being concerned that many commentators and government officials are trying to lay the blame for at least some of the current nuclear crisis at the feet of the previous administration's efforts to end North Korea's nuclear program. These allegations have little bearing on the facts and minimize the contribution of the Americans who served their country in dangerous circumstances.

In 1994, the situation with North Korea had become so fraught that the Clinton administration was considering military strikes to prevent North Korea from extracting plutonium from spent nuclear fuel at Yongbyon. At the time, North Korea might have had enough plutonium, produced in 1989, to build one or two nuclear devices. The fuel being discharged contained enough plutonium for five to six additional weapons.

Last-ditch talks between former President Jimmy Carter and President Kim Il-sung of North Korea defused the crisis and led to the framework. The deal, which helped us avoid a military conflict that could have destroyed Seoul, froze Pyongyang's plutonium program; eventually, it could have led to North Korea abandoning its nuclear efforts in exchange for diplomatic recognition by the United States and economic incentives.

In 2002, however, American intelligence agencies confirmed that North Korea was trying to acquire a uranium enrichment program in violation of the deal. But instead of working within the framework to get North Korea to abandon its nuclear efforts, the Bush administration terminated the agreement altogether. It also began arguing for regime change.

In jettisoning the framework, the administration jettisoned something of great diplomatic value. A key part of the agreement was the willingness of North Korea to let Americans — with whom they were legally at war — into their nuclear center to secure plutonium-bearing fuel rods for internationally monitored storage. In other words, the framework put Americans behind enemy lines.

As you might imagine, the daily circumstances were nothing short of insane. Assigned to North Korea for a month or so at a time, we were put up in a hastily constructed cement "guest house" a half-mile from the most secret nuclear site in North Korea. The 10 people on each rotation were watched by armed guards; our rooms were monitored at all times. No phone calls home or outside communication was possible. When I was there in the winter of 1996, temperatures at night hit 30 below. To get to work every day, we would pass through no fewer than four police and military checkpoints, some with machine-gun nests. The site itself was highly unsafe and radioactive and would have been shut down by safety officials in seconds had it operated in the United States.

Those who took the assignment left families and friends behind and bounced between acute stress and extreme boredom. Some read to escape the monotony, some played cards. I "borrowed" an International Atomic Energy Agency VCR to watch movies. We all knew that at any moment, should the political winds change, we would be hostages deep in hostile territory with no American embassy to protect us. But we took the job to make our country more secure and to pursue an end to North Korea's nuclear program.

Now that North Korea claims to have tested a nuclear device, administration supporters and commentators are seeking to blame the framework for all our problems.

They should look elsewhere. Without the framework's freeze, North Korea would have immediately acquired enough plutonium to produce more nuclear weapons and would have completed construction of two much larger weapon production reactors. By now, North Korea would have been capable of producing 20 nuclear weapons per year.

The prolonged freeze on North Korea's production and nuclear construction delayed the acquisition of nuclear materials — and it appears to have prevented North Korea from completing the larger reactors. The testing of a nuclear device by Pyongyang was pushed back at least a decade.

Those of us who served in North Korea risked our personal safety and comfort for our country. We protected America from danger and our efforts delayed the onset of the nuclear crisis we now face. To argue otherwise is to play politics with history.

The Arms-Control Illusion (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

North Korea's apparent test of a nuclear weapon has once more put the international arms control system in the hot seat. This week the U.N. Security Council did muster 13 votes condemning the test, whatever that means, and today it is expected to vote on new nonmilitary sanctions against Pyongyang.

This is better than nothing, though how much better depends on the fine print and the political will to enforce it. China and Russia objected at first to the sternest punishment, especially to inspections of North Korean cargo ships and tough financial sanctions. But according to reports yesterday, the U.N. resolution will allow at least some of these searches.

The good news here is that at long last the U.N. is attempting to enforce its own nonproliferation regime. Before the multilateralists get too pleased, however, it's worth recalling that it took an actual nuclear blast following a long-range missile test this summer to motivate the Security Council to take even these modest actions. Years of North Korean cheating on its treaty commitments hadn't been enough.

We mention this because the cases of North Korea and Iran are revealing the limits of arms control treaties in restraining rogue states bent on gaining nuclear weapons and other WMD. In the wake of Korea's nuclear test, we are hearing renewed calls for "direct" talks between the U.S. and North Korea akin to those that took place in the 1990s. The idea is to get North Korea to sign another agreement promising to give up its nukes. But one reason we're at the current pass is because Kim Jong Il violated the many commitments he made to the Clinton Administration.

Even as it allowed inspectors at its Yongban nuclear facility, Pyongyang was pursuing a separate and secret bomb-building effort. When the world objected once that effort was exposed, North Korea responded by shutting off the U.N. cameras at Yongban, expelling the inspectors and withdrawing from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT). Meanwhile, because the 1994 Agreed Framework had allowed North Korea to keep its plutonium under U.N. "safeguards," Pyongyang was then free to make a bomb with that nuclear fuel. Now it apparently has done so, unless this too turns out to be another lie.

The case of Iran has followed a similar arc of deception and U.N. failure. Tehran also signed the NPT, only to pursue its own secret bomb-building effort. The U.N. inspectors working inside Iran didn't discover any of this until they were tipped off by an Iranian opposition group that clearly had better intelligence than the U.N. The International Atomic Energy Agency has since produced report after report documenting Iran's violation and deception, and, under the explicit terms of the NPT, Tehran should have been referred immediately to the Security Council.

Yet the IAEA declined to do so for years. And only this summer, after Iran repeatedly rejected European entreaties to stop enriching uranium, did the Security Council finally agree to cite Iran for its arms-control violations. That resolution set an August 31 deadline for Iran to stop enriching uranium, promising dire consequences. But Iran keeps enriching, and so far the U.N. keeps begging it to cooperate. If neither Tehran nor Pyongyang takes these U.N. warnings seriously, this is why.

The latest U.N. excuse for doing little is fear that Iran will withdraw from the NPT, as North Korea did -- and then where would we be? But at least then Iran would have been forced to brand itself an international rogue, instead of using the NPT as a fig leaf to buy more time to fulfill its obvious nuclear ambitions.

If arms control won't stop rogue bomb makers, what can? Well, regime change for one. Saddam Hussein is no longer a potential nuclear threat to anyone because he no longer runs Iraq. But short of deposing a regime, the most successful policy has been the Bush Administration's Proliferation Security Initiative.

Operated out of the Pentagon on a "coalition of the willing" basis, PSI helped blow the whistle on Libya's clandestine nuclear program, rolled up A.Q. Khan's nuclear black market and has interdicted North Korean weapons shipments. The difference between this and the NPT is that the PSI doesn't give the feckless or evil a veto over what it does. It is a coalition of countries with a shared sense of purpose, and above all the willingness to act.

The world will need more such cooperation and creative thinking to contain a proliferation threat that is only going to grow. But the beginning of wisdom is to realize that the threat hasn't ended merely because a rogue regime signs an arms-control treaty.

Let Them Go (WSJ)

By Melanie Kirkpatrick

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

If China is to assume what it considers to be its rightful place as a great power, now is the moment. The world is looking to Beijing as the only government with a measure of influence over its lunatic nuclear ward in the Hermit Kingdom. The question is, will it use it?

China says it favors "punitive" actions on Pyongyang for its apparent nuclear test this week, and there's talk -- so far desultory -- of sanctions. But no one is speaking publicly about Beijing's biggest source of influence: the 900-mile border it shares with North Korea. Opening the frontier to refugees would put pressure on Kim Jong Il to give up his nukes or watch his regime implode. As Mark Palmer, U.S. ambassador to Hungary in 1989, has noted, the East German refugees who passed through that country en route to West Germany sped the collapse of the Soviet Union.

The plight of North Korean refugees hiding in northeastern China is a humanitarian crisis that has received scant global notice. No one knows how many are in hiding or how many Beijing has deported back to North Korea in violation of its obligations under the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees. China refuses to let the United Nations or other countries help the North Koreans.

Now, three official Chinese government documents -- obtained privately and smuggled out of the country -- show that the humanitarian crisis may be more dire than widely believed and the burden on China heavier. Two of the documents are from the Public Security Bureau -- one from the Border Police and the other from a police station along the border. The third is from the Finance Bureau of the Yanbian Korean Autonomous Prefecture in Jilin Province, home to many ethnic Koreans.

The documents were obtained by a U.S.-South Korean group that helps North Korean refugees navigate the underground railroad to safety out of China. The group prefers to remain anonymous for fear that its work could be endangered. They have been vouched for to me by two other sources, one on Capitol Hill and another at an international human-rights organization.

The Border Police document, dated Jan. 10, 2005, begins blandly enough: "From the start of illegal border crossings in 1983," it says, "the number of illegal immigrants from North Korea that have stayed in China has increased every year." It adds, "Public Security and Armed Police departments have strengthened preventative and deportation efforts."

The numbers it reports are newsworthy -- and staggering: "To date, almost 400,000 North Korean illegal immigrants have entered China and large numbers continue to cross the border illegally." And, "As of the end of December 2004, 133,009 North Korean illegal immigrants have been deported." While Chinese authorities obviously know how many refugees they have deported, by definition they can't know how many are in hiding. The estimate of 400,000 is sure to be low.

The Yanbian Finance Bureau document, dated Oct. 19, 2004, provides further evidence of the extent of the crisis. It is a letter to provincial authorities requesting more money to help with deportation efforts. "According to statistics from the Public Security, border police and civil administration, more than 93,000 refugees are still living in Yanbian Prefecture." The letter goes on to say that although the Border Police Bureau has established "six new refugee-deportation and detention centers," it does not have sufficient funds to do the job. Yanbian requests 30 million yuan ($3.8 million) a year "to solve this financial problem."

It's the third document, though, that puts this "financial problem" in human terms. It's a report, dated Oct. 7, 2003, from a police station in Badaogou Precinct, near Baishan City, in Zhangbai Korean Autonomous County, also in Jilin Province.

"At 7 a.m. on Oct. 3, 2003," Case Report No. 055 begins, "a report was received from the public of several corpses floating in the Yalu River. Officers from the Precinct immediately responded and organized personnel and by 10 a.m. 53 corpses had been recovered.

"At 5 a.m. on Oct. 4 an additional three corpses were recovered for a total of 56 corpses. There were 36 males and 20 females, including seven children (five male and two female). After examination of the personal effects it was determined that the dead were citizens of the DPRK [North Korea]. Autopsies confirmed that all 56 had been shot to death. It is estimated that the dead were shot by Korean border guards while attempting to cross into China."

While Pyongyang bears ultimate responsibility for the abuse of its citizens, China is complicit. Its policy of tracking down and repatriating refugees amounts to a death sentence for many returnees. It's a crime to leave the workers' paradise, and North Koreans who are caught and deported are shipped off to internment camps or worse.

If Beijing wants to send a message to Pyongyang about its nuclear program, it could announce that, effective immediately, it is taking several steps: It will stop deporting North Koreans, allow the United Nations to set up refugee camps, and permit the resettlement of refugees in third countries, from which they could go to South Korea, whose constitution codifies its moral responsibility to accept its Northern cousins, or to other countries willing to take them in. The U.S., which so far has accepted a mere eight North Koreans, could step up to the plate here.

The Border Police document notes that since the early 1980s there have been six instances of mass migrations that have coincided with North Korea's famines. Now, winter is coming, and there are already reports of food shortages. Allowing the world to help the North Korean refugees in China would help Beijing deal with a problem that is likely to get worse.

Making An Atomic Bomb Requires Skill, Guts (MCT)

By Robert S. Boyd

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - Making an atomic bomb isn't for dummies - or for sissies. It takes a wide set of technical capabilities and a willingness to risk death or injury to join the club of nuclear nations.

"It's not done in your basement or bathtub," said Robert Norris, a nuclear weapons expert at the Natural Resources Defense Council, an environmental group in Washington. "You need physicists, chemists, engineers, metallurgists - a whole stable of people with skills and central direction - to make a successful bomb."

There are difficulties each step of the way, from designing the weapon to assembling the dangerous radioactive materials to manufacturing a complicated, high-precision device, delivering it to its target and setting it off at the right time and place.

A modern atomic bomb has to be small and light enough to fit on a missile or in an artillery shell or a suitcase. It can't be as massive as the 5-ton "Fat Man," which an Air Force B-29 bomber dropped on Nagasaki, Japan, in 1945.

Safety is also a concern. Powerful chemical explosives are needed to detonate a nuclear bomb. Weapons-grade plutonium and highly enriched uranium are lethally radioactive.

"This high explosive stuff is dangerous to make," Norris said. "If it's ignited before it's supposed to, it can spread plutonium all over the place. There have been serious nuclear-weapons accidents in the United States."

The easiest bomb to make uses nuclear fission, which splits a mass of uranium or plutonium atoms to release enormous amounts of heat and energy. It's much harder to construct a fusion, or hydrogen, bomb, which fuses atoms together as happens inside the sun.

North Korea, and possibly Iran, is working on fission weapons. North Korea is farther along the learning curve than Iran, as shown by what may have been a partially successful bomb test Monday. Iran would still need to produce enough enriched uranium for a nuclear bomb.

Both countries already have passed the first hurdle: They reportedly have obtained detailed bomb designs from Pakistan's rogue nuclear-weapons expert, Abdul Qadeer Khan.

The next crucial step is to acquire a sufficient stock of nuclear fuel. At least 2 pounds of weapons-grade plutonium or 4 pounds of highly enriched uranium are needed to set off a single fission bomb, according to the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists.

The form of uranium found in nature, known as U-238, is plentiful, but less than 1 percent of it is U-235, the highly radioactive form needed for a bomb. An elaborate process is required to extract U-235 from U-238.

First, uranium ore, or "yellowcake," is dissolved in nitric acid and converted to a toxic gas known as hexafluoride. The gas is spun in a centrifuge to separate the heavier U-238 from the lighter U-235. The fuel must be enriched until it's at least 90 percent pure. The process takes thousands of centrifuges spinning for months, as North Korea did in the 1990s and Iran reportedly is doing now.

"A few thousand is what you need for one bomb per year," Princeton University nuclear expert Frank von Hippel told the journal Science.

A different procedure is used to make weapons-grade plutonium. Some uranium fuel in a nuclear-power reactor absorbs extra neutrons and gradually turns into plutonium-239. Acids dissolve the uranium in the spent fuel rods and separate out the plutonium.

The most difficult task probably is constructing the bomb itself. It typically consists of a hollow sphere or cylinder in which the explosive fuel is surrounded by a dense material, usually U-238.

The fissionable fuel is very unstable and must be divided into separate "subcritical" masses so it won't blow up prematurely. Two or more of these masses must be rapidly smashed together to sustain a fission chain reaction.

One way to do this in a uranium-fueled bomb is to shoot a small lump of U-235 into a larger piece. This raises the fuel to a critical mass, touching off a spontaneous chain reaction.

DOJ_NMG_0081355

Another technique, called "implosion," is used to detonate a plutonium-fueled bomb. A core of plutonium is surrounded by a sphere of little wedge-shaped chemical explosives. When the explosives are ignited they create a shock wave and squeeze the mass until it detonates.

"It's quite complex to fabricate one of these things," Norris said. "You have to get the angles right. It's also dangerous to cut and shape high explosives, which might go off."

Extremely fine-precision machining and complicated electronics are required to make implosion work.

To set off the bomb, the explosive wedges, typically numbering 32 or 64, must all go off at the same instant. Tiny wires leading from each wedge to a central electronic trigger must be exactly the right length to produce a simultaneous explosion. Otherwise the bomb will fizzle, as may have happened in the North Korean test.

"If the plutonium is not squeezed precisely evenly, you get a squirt out of one side and have little or no yield," said Hans Kristensen, the director of the Nuclear Information Project at the Federation of American Scientists.

Diplomacy How Bush Aims To Lasso U.N. Sanctions (WSJ)

By Gerald F. Seib

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

Now may be the time to shelve for good the image of George W. Bush as a unilateralist, go-it-alone cowboy.

The Bush team is embarking in coming days on an exceptionally complex set of diplomatic maneuvers to try to contain, simultaneously, the nuclear threats from North Korea and Iran. The heavy lifting all involves persuading other nations to cooperate, and success is defined as America not being left to stand alone.

That, of course, defies the earlier stereotypes of both the president and his United Nations ambassador, John Bolton, both of whom were portrayed as champions of a diplomacy that worried little or not at all about other nations or the U.N. machinery.

It's hard to say whether the stereotype was wrong, or whether an unfriendly world forced a change. But in either case, the diplomatic offensive now unfolding begins this weekend with the final work on a U.N. Security Council resolution slapping sanctions on North Korea as punishment for its claimed nuclear-weapons test last week.

To get within striking distance of that resolution, the Bush administration has been willing in recent days to pull back from its original goals. It has softened its insistence that the U.N. endorse the halting and searching of ships heading to North Korea to find contraband material that could help either its military or nuclear programs. Beyond that, the U.S. had to ease jangled nerves in China and Russia by making clear that it wouldn't use a resolution on economic sanctions as a pretext for military action.

Put another way, the U.S. now is doing precisely what critics said it refused to do on Iraq: making compromises to win international unity.

That doesn't mean the Bush administration will stop with whatever it ekes out of the U.N. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice next week begins step two of the diplomatic game plan when she sets off on a trip to Japan, China and South Korea to build on the resolution. One subject she may discuss: getting the Japanese and South Koreans to do more under the administration's existing Proliferation Security Initiative, which calls for interdicting weapons shipments into and out of both North Korea and Iran.

The third step in the diplomatic minuet comes later next week, when the U.S. tries to get the Security Council to turn from North Korea to Iran. The goal is to compose another sanctions resolution to punish Iran for refusing to give up its uranium-enrichment program. That won't be simple; hard as it is to agree with China on a plan to punish its North Korean friends, it may be even tougher to win agreement from Russia on a plan to punish its Iranian friends.

But the stakes are huge. Iran will be watching intently to see whether the U.S. actually can organize a meaningful world response to North Korea's provocation. It's entirely possible that only a truly united response will give the Iranians pause -- which is the real test of the Bush team's newfound fondness for multilateral diplomacy.

As Hard-Liners Rise, Shadowy Revolutionary Guard Muscles In on Airport And Nabs Energy Deals Dawn Clash Over a Drilling Rig in The Persian Gulf

Early one morning in August, a pair of Iranian military vessels pulled up alongside the Orizont, a Romanian oil rig working in waters off the coast of Iran. Armed men jumped out and clambered up one leg of the drilling platform.

Viorel Petcu, the rig's chief, phoned his boss in Romania to report that the Iranians had started shooting. The line then went dead as the Iranians commandeered the communications room and herded 19 Romanian workers onto the helicopter pad. No one was hurt, recalled Mr. Petcu, speaking later from the still-occupied rig, but "it was like something you only see only on television." Iran denies opening fire.

The rig matter ostensibly was just a lease dispute between partners. But it exposed the potent political forces that roil Iranian business, including the heavy hand of elements close to Iran's hard-line president. Prominent among those forces in business today is a group the West knows mainly for its fervor in enforcing religious rectitude: the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps.

The secretive paramilitary group, according to the U.S., arms both violent Shiite militias in Iraq and Hezbollah, the Lebanese group that fought a war with Israel this summer. It runs feared prisons inside Iran. The Revolutionary Guard also has a big role that is less understood in the West: an active player in business.

It builds highways and tunnels. Two years ago it muscled aside a Turkish firm that had a contract to run a new Tehran airport. Now the Revolutionary Guard is making an aggressive push into the backbone of Iran's economy, its oil and gas fields, one of the world's richest troves of fossil fuel.

In June, a Revolutionary Guard engineering group won a $2.3 billion contract to develop part of a big gas field in Iran's part of the Persian Gulf. That group also won a $1.3 billion deal to build a pipeline across Iran toward Pakistan.

Who exactly ordered the raid on the Romanian drilling rig isn't clear. Iran's government says it was carried out by the police. Romanians still aboard the rig -- now lying paralyzed in the Gulf -- say one of the five Iranians currently occupying and controlling it is a Revolutionary Guard officer. In any case, the Guard now is among those negotiating to take over an Iranian firm, Oriental Oil Co., that holds the lease to this rig and two other disputed platforms from Romania.

The struggle for the leases and drilling rigs reveals an unintended consequence of U.S. foreign policy. In this case, instead of weakening Iran, America's efforts to squeeze the country ended up boosting the very hard-line forces there that the U.S. wants to curb.

Washington urged European banks not to do business with Iranian banks. But when one of them stopped doing so, it put Oriental Oil, the holder of the rig lease, in a bind. This and other problems prompted Oriental to put itself up for sale, creating an opening for Iranian hard-liners to try to grab the business.

The Revolutionary Guard has long been a major force in Iran's politics. It has its own ground, air and naval units, which operate in parallel to Iran's regular military. Former guardsmen -- including President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad -- are scattered throughout the government and security apparatus. While some Guard veterans have become reformers, the organization has a fearsome reputation inside Iran as a brutal defender of revolutionary orthodoxy.

It runs its own intelligence service and has played a big role in crushing dissent, most recently in 1999 during a wave of student-led protests. The Guard also controls a feared outfit called the Basij, composed of youthful zealots who prowl the streets hunting for insufficiently veiled women and others who violate strict Islamic norms. The Basij claims millions of members.

The Guard has a long history of activity abroad, having helped set up Lebanon's Hezbollah militia in the early 1980s. More recently it has reached into neighboring Iraq. There, according to a senior Israeli security official, its quest for influence is spearheaded by a special unit of the Guard called the Ramadan Headquarters, which trains and funds Iraq Shiite fighters.

The Guard's business activities include engineering, media, trading and energy. "They are taking positions everywhere," says Mohsen Sazegara, a former aide to the late Ayatollah Khomeini and a founder of the paramilitary force in 1979. The Guard, says Mr. Sazegara, who broke with Iran's regime a few years ago and now lives in the U.S., is a "unique organization in the world: a political body, a military force and big, complex company."

The Guard got its start in business after Iran's 1980-88 war with Saddam Hussein's Iraq, in which it fought and suffered horrendous losses. Its engineering unit, called Khatam al-Anbiya Construction Headquarters, then shifted from building fortifications to projects such as roads, dams and tunnels. (The unit's name derives from a phrase meaning "the final prophet," i.e., the Prophet Mohammed.) Presenting itself as an ordinary company, Khatam set up a Web site and published an in-house journal called Road and Tunnel Magazine. It established headquarters in a nondescript building in northern Tehran. Its chief is a former oil engineer.

Throughout, though, Khatam has remained an essentially military operation. "I'm not allowed to tell you anything," says Mohammadreza Rajabalinejad, a civil engineer who used to edit its magazine. A senior Guard official recently told the Iranian press 70% of Khatam's work is military-related. Khatam declined to comment.

The Guard's initial reason for getting into business was both economic and political: newly demobilized and often bitter soldiers needed jobs, and the government, fearful of unrest, wanted to keep them occupied. As Khatam and other Guard ventures grew, they helped generate funds for the Guard and allowed regime loyalists to enrich themselves free from scrutiny by parliament or other state bodies.

The Guard reports not to the government but to Iran's supreme authority, the cleric Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Its business units publish no accounts. Its budget is secret.

DOJ_NMG_0081357

Though focused on work inside Iran, Khatam and other Guard ventures have done jobs abroad. They helped build a road in western Afghanistan after the fall of the Taliban, when the U.S.-backed government of Hamid Karzai pleaded for foreign help. Mr. Sazegara says the Guard is deeply involved in smuggling foreign goods into Iran.

The Guard made its first splashy display of hardball business tactics in May 2004. That month, it ousted a Turkish company that had a contract to run Iran's new Imam Khomeini International Airport. Troops and armored cars crashed a grand opening, blocking the runway. A plane that was about to land was turned away and all further flights were canceled.

The Turks fled. "It was a horrible, fantastical day," says Erken Ozber, a manager for the Turkish company, Tepe-Akfen-Vie. Months later, the airport reopened under management of the Revolutionary Guard and Iranian state organizations.

The debacle didn't dim the enthusiasm of foreign companies scouting for prospects in Iran's energy sector. Iran has the biggest natural-gas reserves after Russia and, according to the BP Statistical Review, its oil deposits are second only to Saudi Arabia's.

Among those looking for prospects was a Norwegian company called Aker Kvaerner. It led a consortium in 2004 that, Iranian officials say, included Khatam, the Revolutionary Guard unit. In early 2005, the consortium won a deal to help develop Iran's giant South Pars gas field in the Persian Gulf.

The Norwegians ran into flak at home for associating with the Guard, whose harsh prison network in Iran is notorious. "In Alliance with the Army of Torture," read a headline in an Oslo paper. The company's chief executive wrote a letter defending its Iran business. In any case, the deal soured before final terms could be worked out. The Norwegian company won't specify what went wrong.

Oriental Oil, the company currently at the center of the rig affair, also wanted into the big gas field. One of its sister companies formed a bidding partnership with a unit of Halliburton Co. of Houston. Although Washington tightly restricts U.S. companies and citizens from doing business in Iran, the rules don't bar non-U.S. citizens working for foreign-registered subsidiaries, as was the case with this Halliburton unit.

Oriental Oil, with offices in Dubai and Tehran, certainly looked like a good bet at the time, 2004. Its majority owner, Mehrdad Akbar Safdari, was a veteran of Iran's war with Iraq. People who know him say he had close ties both to the Guard and to more moderate political forces then running Iran. Also well connected was a partner of his, Cyrus Nasseri, an urbane former Iranian ambassador to the United Nations in Geneva who had studied for a time in Kentucky and spoke both English and French. He had won the trust of Iran's governing elite by helping negotiate the end of the Iran-Iraq war in 1988.

Oriental also got into the offshore-rig business. It rented foreign drilling rigs with the intent of re-leasing them, at a markup, to Iran's national oil company.

Oriental leased two rigs, first from Romania's state oil company and later from a private Romanian company that bought the rigs from the state company. The price, a fixed $40,000 a day, now is a bargain, because rates have since roughly tripled. The private Romanian company also then agreed to rent a third platform to Oriental.

To handle details, Oriental set up a letter of credit through an Iranian state-owned bank, Bank Saderat. Credit Suisse Group in Europe agreed to work with that bank to process the lease payments.

Things started to pay off for Oriental and Halliburton in late 2004. Oriental won a $307 million contract to develop two phases of the gas field. It was "a very happy time," recalls Oriental's general manager in Dubai, Khosrow Arabi.

But political winds in Tehran were shifting. Conservatives had just won parliamentary elections. Then in June of 2005, Iran elected as president Mr. Ahmadinejad, himself a former Revolutionary Guardsman. He had campaigned on a pledge to curb what he called Iran's "oil mafia."

As president, he moved against businesses close to his more moderate predecessor. News media linked to the Guard and other hard-liners began to denounce Oriental Oil, and particularly its minority owner, the diplomat Mr. Nasseri. Fars News Agency complained that Mr. Nasseri "had access to the country's most secret information as a member of Iran's nuclear negotiating team and at the same time was dealing directly with the American company Halliburton, which once was run by Dick Cheney." Some griped about a since-aborted deal he had helped negotiate under which Iran agreed to suspend uranium enrichment. Asked about this, Mr. Nasseri says he won't discuss "lies and rumor."

In short order, Iran announced it was investigating Oriental Oil for corruption. The state oil company, alleging bribery, canceled Oriental Oil's winning bid for work in the South Pars gas field.

At that point, Halliburton dropped all contact with Oriental. Halliburton says they had never signed a final contract. Mr. Arabi, Oriental's manager in Dubai, recalls that "we were fighting with everyone. We had headaches everywhere."

Oriental, however, still had something Iran needed: lease contracts for several foreign offshore drilling rigs, including the three Romanian ones.

A shortage of drilling rigs has long bedeviled Iran, hurting its efforts to increase oil production, which remains far below the level before the 1979 revolution. U.S. law keeps out American drillers, the biggest players in the business.

DOJ_NMG_0081358

Stripped of its biggest projects, Oriental Oil now clung to the drilling rigs as a lifeline. Its grip quickly began to slip.

In February, Credit Suisse said it was suspending its role handling the lease payments in cooperation with Iran's Bank Saderat. This followed U.S. pressure on big European banks to curtail business with the Iranian bank. A Credit Suisse spokesman declined to comment on the spat but said the bank was doing a "controlled withdrawal" from work with Iran-related corporate clients and decided late last year to refuse new Iran business. He cited an "increase in political and financial risks" and a desire to "safeguard our reputation."

The U.S. Treasury Department, ramping up its campaign to squeeze Iran, last month announced it was excluding Bank Saderat from both direct and indirect access to the U.S. financial system. The Treasury claimed Iran had used the bank to funnel $50 million to a group controlled by Hezbollah.

In this case, the U.S. campaign, because of the squeeze it created for Oriental Oil, may have ended up helping what is believed to be Hezbollah's principal sponsor -- the Revolutionary Guard.

The Romanian owner of the drilling rigs, Grup Servicii Petroliere SA, said it couldn't continue to lease the rigs to Oriental now that Credit Suisse had pulled out. Gabriel Comanescu, the Romanian company's president, also complained about a heap of unpaid bills. In April, he terminated the lease contracts and demanded his rigs back. Oriental, saying it could find a replacement bank, made clear that it had no intention of giving up the rigs. The two sides' claims and counterclaims are now before an arbitration panel in Paris.

Oriental, beset both by political problems at home and by banking woes abroad, decided its only option was to sell out, says its Mr. Arabi. "They are the winners," he said, referring to hard-line Iranian politicians and news media who he said were behind the campaign against Oriental. Iran suddenly dropped its corruption case against the company.

The Revolutionary Guard, meanwhile, was on a roll. Iran's new government had given it the lead role in developing two phases of the gas field -- the same project previously assigned to the Norwegian-led consortium. The Guard also won a gas pipeline deal, plus a contract to expand Tehran's subway system.

Its advances haven't come without push-back, reflecting the rival power centers that mark Iran today. Reformist members of parliament wrote to President Ahmadinejad complaining about no-bid contracts and below-market-rate loans given to the Guard. And parliament blocked Mr. Ahmadinejad's attempt to name a Guard veteran as oil minister.

Still, when Oriental Oil gave up and decided to sell itself, the Guard's engineering unit quickly became a top contender to buy it, in competition with an affiliate of the state oil company and others.

The U.S. is deeply wary of the Revolutionary Guard but believes that the trials of Iranian firms squeezed by foreign banks may in the future undermine hard-line elements. "While those who are currently benefitting from Iranian integration into the global economy are the ones who will feel this isolation the most, they are also in the best position to persuade the regime that its current track will undermine the future of the Iranian people," said Stuart Levey, Under Treasury Secretary for Terrorism and Financial Intelligence.

In Romania, Mr. Comanescu, having canceled the drilling-rig leases when the bank system for handling lease payments collapsed, laid plans to get the three rigs back. One was outside Iran for repairs, so reclaiming it wasn't hard. But two were moored in Iranian waters in the Persian Gulf.

In June, Mr. Comanescu hired three tugboats to drag off one of them, the Orizont. But the tugs turned back after Iran's state oil company ordered them to.

In August, he tried again, this time with the other rig, and had more success. Tugs towed it from Iranian waters to the United Arab Emirates. Iran branded the move a hijacking and said state oil officials had been roughed up and held hostage. Ian Bahn, a Briton who supervised the move, called that charge nonsense, saying the men allegedly held hostage were "smiling, laughing and joking with us."

This left just one Romanian drilling rig, the Orizont, still in Iranian waters. An Iranian court ordered that it stay put.

On Aug. 22, vessels again approached the rig, but this time they weren't tugboats. They were Iranian boats, and their occupants had guns, says the rig's chief, Mr. Petcu. He says the Iranians forced their way aboard.

Mr. Petcu says that after the Iranian forces herded him and the other Romanians onto the helicopter pad, the intruders began hunting for documents, looking in computers, cabinets and even the refrigerator.

Photos taken by the Romanians show two Iranian vessels. There was a large patrol boat of the type Iran's navy uses and a smaller unmarked craft that, naval experts say, appeared to belong to the Revolutionary Guard.

Iran's government, which had earlier accused Oriental Oil of corruption, now rallied to defend the sanctity of its rig contracts. The Foreign Ministry said police had boarded the Orizont to prevent the rig from being moved illegally, and thus to foil "a second robbery." After a day of heated exchanges between Tehran and Bucharest, President Ahmadinejad telephoned Romania's president to assure him that Iran had no hostile intent, merely commercial interests.

Today, Mr. Nasseri, the diplomat who was a target of the campaign against Oriental, says he has sold his 10% stake in Oriental. He won't say to whom. "I'm tired," he says. "I just want to lead a normal, comfortable life."

Eight weeks after the rig raid, with the platform in limbo in the Persian Gulf, Iran has withdrawn most of its armed men but still occupies the rig. Mr. Comanescu, the Romanian executive, says his staff aboard the platform has been able to identify the five Iranians still there. He says two are armed police, one is a representative of Oriental Oil, one is an envoy from Iran's state oil company and the last is an armed intelligence officer of the Revolutionary Guard. "We are caught in the middle of a big Iranian fight. This is our tragedy," he says.

"I wouldn't wish my biggest enemy to be in the situation I'm in," the Romanian executive adds. "Do you think the Revolutionary Guards went to...the Harvard Business School?"

Norway's Statoil Is Fined By SEC Over Iran Affair (WSJ)

By Ian Talley

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department levied a $21 million fine against Norwegian oil company Statoil ASA for a payment it made in 2002 to win development of a critical Iranian petroleum project.

State-controlled Statoil has already paid Norwegian authorities $3 million for the affair, which involved a $15.2 million consultancy contract with Horton Investment Ltd. -- a consultancy that also had links to the state-owned National Iranian Oil Co. -- and led to the ouster of several top executives.

Norwegian investigators said the deal was illegal and meant to influence officials for entry into the South Pars project petroleum project in Iran. In October 2002, Statoil was awarded the development contract.

Statoil acknowledged making the payment and said it would accept the penalties. Statoil Chairman Jannik Lindbaek said the incident occurred under the company's previous management and that the company has "long deplored" it.

The sanction is among the largest under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, a 1970s law that prohibits bribes to foreign officials. In the largest fine under the act, Titan Corp. last year agreed to pay $28.5 million to settle SEC allegations it covered up payments in six countries.

The SEC, which has been ratcheting up pressure on U.S. corporations to disclose any questionable payments they may have made overseas, said it wanted to make the Statoil fine high to send a clear signal to other companies.

"It was important for us to not just make this violation just another cost of doing business for the company," said Helene T. Glotzer, SEC associate regional director.

The SEC said it would require Statoil to pay $10.5 million of any future profit from the Iranian project currently under construction. The Justice Department said it would accept the $3 million penalty levied against Statoil by Norwegian authorities as part of its $10.5 million penalty.

An official Iranian investigation last year found there had been no wrongdoing by any Iranian officials or companies.

In January, Statoil wrote down the South Pars project by $335 million following three years of delays, poor pre-engineering plans and higher commodity prices.

Separately, Norwegian safety officials upheld an order to shut down two offshore oil platforms, owned by Statoil and Norske Shell ASA, the Norwegian branch of Royal Dutch Shell PLC, because of defects in their lifeboat systems. The order will delay production of about 280,000 barrels per day of oil, or some 10% of the production that makes Norway the world's third-largest oil exporter after Saudi Arabia and Russia.

South Korean Is Appointed Secretary General Of U.N. (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 13 — Ban Ki-moon, the foreign minister of South Korea, was appointed Friday by the General Assembly as the next secretary general of the United Nations, succeeding Kofi Annan.

Mr. Ban was approved by acclamation of the 192-member body and greeted by sustained applause as he walked onto the rostrum to make his acceptance speech.

He is to take the oath of office in mid-December and assume the job on Jan. 1, the day after Mr. Annan completes his two five-year terms. In his foreign service career, Mr. Ban has taken part in negotiations with North Korea, and said this month that he would like to go there once he becomes secretary general.

DOJ_NMG_0081360

Mr. Ban, 62, will become the eighth secretary general in the 60-year history of the United Nations and the first Asian occupant of the office since U Thant of Burma stepped down in 1971.

Mr. Annan, 68, hailed his successor as "a man with a truly global mind at the helm of the world's only universal organization."

He recalled that the first man to hold the position, Trygve Lie, told his successor, Dag Hammarskjold, "You are about to take over the most impossible job on earth."

Mr. Annan said, "While that may be true, I would say, 'This is also the best possible job on earth.' "

Mr. Ban said he had appreciated the United Nations from his youth for the role the organization played in creating and rebuilding his war-torn country.

He also said he had been "pained by scenes of its failures" in his travels in recent years. "In too many places could I feel the dismay over inaction of the U.N., or action that was too little or came too late."

He pledged, "I am determined to dispel the disillusionment."

He listed his priorities as reforming the United Nations, meeting development goals established in 2000, establishing human rights, confronting threats posed by terrorism and weapons of mass destruction, slowing environmental degradation and curbing the spread of AIDS.

Under the United Nations Charter, the name of the new secretary general is chosen by the Security Council and sent to the General Assembly for appointment.

Mr. Ban defeated six other candidates for the job in four informal polls of the Council and was officially elected by the 15-member panel on Monday.

A veteran of three decades in his country's foreign service, Mr. Ban is familiar with the United Nations, where he served as first secretary of the South Korean mission in the 1970's and was chief assistant to Han Seung-soo, president of the General Assembly, in 2001.

He is a more retiring personality than Mr. Annan, who traveled the world as a global diplomat and made high-profile statements on the rule of international law.

In his speech, he asked that people understand his modest manner as a cultural attribute and not misread it as lack of decisiveness or passion.

"Asia is a region where modesty is a virtue," he said.

"But the modest is about demeanor," he said, "not about vision and goals. It does not mean the lack of commitment or leadership. Rather it is quiet determination in action to get things done without so much fanfare."

South Korean Approved As U.N. Secretary General (WP)

From News Services

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 13 -- The U.N. General Assembly overwhelmingly approved South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon on Friday as the next U.N. secretary general.

The Security Council's choice of Ban, 62, to succeed Kofi Annan was ratified by acclamation at the General Assembly, consisting of all 192 U.N. member governments.

Hundreds of diplomats and U.N. staffers broke into loud applause when the General Assembly president, Sheikha Haya Rashed al-Khalifa of Bahrain, asked the assembly to adopt the resolution by acclamation. She then banged the gavel and said, "It is so decided."

Ban will become the eighth secretary general in the United Nations' 60-year history on Jan. 1, when Annan's second five-year term expires. The last Asian to run the world body was U Thant of Burma, who held the post from 1961 to 1971.

"It has been a long journey from my youth in war-torn and destitute Korea to this rostrum and these awesome responsibilities," Ban said in accepting the post, in both English and French.

"I could make the journey because the U.N. was with my people in our darkest days," he said. "It gave us hope and sustenance, security and dignity. It showed us a better way. So I feel at home today."

Ban will oversee an organization with 92,000 peacekeepers around the world and a $5 billion annual budget. The United Nations' reputation has been tarnished by corruption scandals, and its outdated practices need reform to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

Annan hailed Ban as "exceptionally attuned to the sensitivities of countries and constituencies in every continent."

The choice of Ban for the top job coincides with increased U.N. involvement in the effort to thwart North Korea's nuclear weapon development program. Ban has said that he would like to help mediate the dispute with the communist government in North Korea.

Ban Named Next U.N. Secretary-general (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, October 14, 2006

The U.N. General Assembly appointed South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon as the next U.N. secretary-general Friday, and the veteran diplomat who grew up during a war that divided his country pledged to make peace with North Korea a top priority.

The assembly's action on Ban capped the remarkable rise of a man who was little known outside Asia before launching his campaign to succeed Kofi Annan. It also marked a milestone for South Korea, which only joined the United Nations in 1991 and still has U.N. troops on the tense border with the North.

Ban has been in the forefront of South Korea's nuclear negotiations with Pyongyang and has said he plans to travel to North Korea as secretary-general, something Annan never did. He said last month he would use the authority of the U.N. position to promote peace and reconciliation on the Korean peninsula "and a peaceful resolution of the North Korean nuclear issue."

The U.S. and Japan were pushing for a vote by the Security Council Saturday on a resolution imposing punishing sanctions on the North for its claimed nuclear test earlier this week. The test prompted worldwide outrage and demands from the U.S. and its allies for the isolated communist regime to return to six-party talks aimed at persuading the North to abandon its nuclear program.

Ban told a press conference soon after his selection that he hopes the Security Council "quickly adopts a clear and strong resolution" to show North Korea that the international community is united against its claimed nuclear test.

In a speech to hundreds of diplomats and U.N. staff Friday, Ban laid out his vision for the United Nations whose reputation has been tarnished by corruption scandals and whose outdated practices still need major reform to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

"My tenure will be marked by ceaseless efforts to build bridges and close divides," he said. "Leadership of harmony not division, by example not instruction, has served me well so far. I intend to stay the course as secretary-general."

During a nearly 40-year career as a diplomat, Ban said, "I have been elated by the successes of the U.N. in making life better for countless people. I have also been pained by scenes of its failures. In too many places could I feel the dismay over inaction of the U.N., or action that was too little or came too late."

"I am determined to dispel the disillusionment," he said.

Ban, 62, will become the eighth secretary-general in the U.N.'s 60-year history on Jan. 1 when Annan's second five-year term expires. He was one of seven candidates vying to be the U.N. chief and topped all four informal polls in the Security Council.

He said he was proud to be the second Asian chosen to serve as secretary-general. The last secretary-general from the continent was Burma's U Thant, who served from 1961-71.

By tradition, the post of secretary-general rotates among the regions of the world and most countries agreed that this time it was Asia's turn.

Hundreds of diplomats and U.N. staff in the chamber broke into loud applause when assembly president Sheikha Haya Rashed Al Khalifa asked the 192-nation world body to adopt the resolution appointing Ban by acclamation. She then banged the gavel and said, "It is so decided."

Annan hailed Ban as "a future secretary-general who is exceptionally attuned to the sensitivities of countries and constituencies in every continent" and said he would be "a man with a truly global mind at the helm of the world's only universal organization."

Annan recalled that the first U.N. secretary-general, Trygvie Lie, told his successor, Dag Hammarskjold, "You are about to take over the most impossible job on Earth."

"While that may be true," Annan said, "I would say: This is also the best possible job on Earth."

He said he had only one piece of advice for his successor when he takes over — "try to make full use of the unparalleled resource you will find in the staff of the organization. Their commitment is the U.N.'s greatest asset."

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said Ban is "the right person to lead the United Nations at this decisive movement in its history, particularly as the U.N. struggles to fulfill the terms of the reform agenda that world leaders agreed to last fall."

Ban has been South Korea's foreign minister for more than 2 1/2 years and served as national security adviser to two presidents — jobs that focused on relations with North Korea. During his diplomatic career, he was posted in India, Austria, Washington and at the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0081362

Ban received a degree in international relations from Seoul National University in 1970, and earned a master's degree in public administration from Harvard University in 1985.

An early influence for him came from a White House visit with President John F. Kennedy as part of a program organized by the American Red Cross when he was an 18-year-old student. His visit is captured in a black-and-white photo that shows Ban smiling among students from other countries as the president spoke.

Ban on Friday harkened back to his childhood, saying the United Nations stood by South Korea in its impoverished postwar days.

"It has been a long journey from my youth in war-torn and desperate Korea to this rostrum and these awesome responsibilities," he said. "I could make this journey because the U.N. was with my people in our darkest days. It gave us hope and sustenance, security and dignity. It showed us a better way."

He said he hopes to head a United Nations like the one he remembered from his boyhood.

"I am an optimist, and I am full of hope about the future of our global organization. Let us work together for a U.N. that can deliver more and better."

Seismic Task For Korean Assuming U.N. Mantle (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

NEW YORK

A Polish pope, with a little help from his compatriots, prized open the prison of Central Europe. Can a South Korean secretary general of the United Nations do the same for the 23 million hapless people locked in the hermit state of a nuclear-armed North Korea?

Ban Ki Moon, the South Korean foreign minister, who will succeed Kofi Annan at the end of the year, is short on the charisma that made Pope John Paul II a force. But the unanimity he engineered for his nomination testifies to his powers, and sitting atop the UN confers access, authority and agenda-setting discretion not granted by national office.

The Korean question will inevitably top his agenda because it's the world's greatest strategic anomaly: a frozen "temporary" border that is the Cold War's strangest relic, separating a nation caught in a Stalinist time warp from another, Ban's, that is a vibrant emblem of the world's most dynamic region.

Following North Korea's announcement that it had tested a small nuclear device, the threat posed by this anomaly is clear. As David Sanger of The New York Times has noted, Kim Jong Il's bizarre regime has "never developed a weapons system it did not sell on the world market." We know all too well who the many clients are for loose nukes.

Since the "seismic event," the term favored by the U.S. administration for Kim's explosion, President George W. Bush has warned that the ever shifting "red line" for Pyongyang now stands at selling nuclear material. That, Bush said, would constitute a "grave threat" for which Kim would be held "fully accountable." Kim's not suicidal, so he may listen to that, at least for now.

This warning aside, Bush's favorite word of late has been "diplomacy." It courses through his parlance with the readiness once reserved for with-us- or-against-us rabble-rousing. You don't have to look any further than Baghdad for the explanation. America is stretched thin with little taste for further military confrontation.

"My answer is that I believe the commander-in-chief must try all diplomatic measures before we commit our military," Bush opined the other day, adding, "We're making progress when we've got others at the table."

So here, it seems, is a chastened U.S. commander-in-chief turning to diplomacy, which is to say the United Nations, at the same time as the organization prepares to greet a new leader for whom the intricacies of the Korean Peninsula are everyday fare. On the face of it, that's a situation with potential.

The potential may be greater because the North Korean bomb has been "seismic" in more than one sense. It has shifted the political terrain in Asia. Shinzo Abe, the new Japanese prime minister, chose to make conciliatory visits to Beijing and Seoul his first diplomatic moves.

That immediately endeared Abe to the United States.

"What has been the weakness of the American strategic position in Asia over the last several years and, indeed what has been the weakness in dealing with North Korea?" Nicholas Burns, an under secretary of state, asked at the Council on Foreign Relations this week. "You've had this very difficult relationship between China and Japan. You've had an equally difficult relationship between Japan and South Korea."

DOJ_NMG_0081363

Burns gave part of the answer to why the six-party talks with Pyongyang have failed: those pressing Kim were divided among themselves. If Abe proves attuned to Chinese and South Korean World War II grievances, the principal source of friction, fissures may narrow and pressure on Pyongyang intensify.

But fundamental problems remain, not least that while the United States would be happy enough to see Kim fall and his regime implode, China has no interest in that outcome. South Korea, more intent on the peninsula's stability than its freedom, and marked by strong pockets of anti-American sentiment, is also deeply ambivalent.

A coalition is only as strong as its weakest partner. Already, anger at North Korea from China and Russia has given way to exhortations to proceed with prudence, the sort of mealy-mouthed talk for which Kim showed such contempt with his little bomb.

The Bush administration's quest for a strongly worded UN Security Council Resolution, backed by a possible threat of military force under Chapter 7 of the UN Charter, is facing resistance.

That's par for the course. Whether the issue is North Korea or Iran, China and Russia will seek little ways to chip away at American power. Given Bush's international standing, they will not be isolated. But in diplomacy, as life, you must be careful what you wish for: North Korean nukes should focus minds on what the costs of a divided, dithering and leaderless world can be.

Which brings us back to Ban. When I interviewed him in Seoul last year, he was a study in prudence. Unification, he said, was "an ardent aspiration of all 70 million Korean people," but "now our priority should be the maintenance of peace and stability." He noted that South Korea would face an "enormously heavy burden from a sudden collapse of the North" and dismissed the notion of unification within a decade.

Pressure and sanctions are fine, and better if delivered with unanimity. But, as Pope John Paul II showed, moral suasion can be the most powerful force of all. North Korea is a squalid, corrupt, ruthless little family dynasty with a big army and no food; it should be history by now. Somebody needs to find ways to make that clear.

Ban, in his new position, will carry the world's moral authority. As a Korean, he has a moral obligation. Office can transform the stature of man; age tends to accentuate the urge to leave a lasting mark. Who better to speak for Korean freedom than he?

The incoming secretary general has already said he's ready to go to Pyongyang. That's a good start. If he leaves office with the Korean Peninsula still divided, and 23 million North Koreans still bowing and scraping to Kim, history may prove severe in its judgment.

5 Die As Palestinians Clash With Israelis And Each Other (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 13 — Four Palestinians, including three Hamas militants, were killed Friday in a second day of deadly clashes with Israeli forces in the Gaza Strip.

In a separate confrontation, Palestinian gunmen from the two main factions, Hamas and Fatah, battled each other overnight and during the day on Friday, leaving a teenager dead and nearly 50 people wounded in the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahiya, the Palestinians said.

Both developments illustrated the relentless turmoil that has gripped Gaza since militants seized an Israeli soldier and took him to the territory on June 25. Since then, Israeli forces have re-entered Gaza, carrying out ground raids and frequent airstrikes, and tensions between Hamas and Fatah have often boiled over into street fighting.

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, tried to calm the atmosphere during a midday speech on Friday at a mosque in the southern Gaza town of Khan Yunis. “We are committed to not getting dragged into internal strife or into the so-called civil war,” Mr. Haniya said.

Despite such pleas by Mr. Haniya and the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, the internecine fighting has grown worse in recent weeks, and talks on a Palestinian unity government are deadlocked.

One of the key sticking points in the talks has been Hamas’s refusal to recognize Israel, as demanded by Western countries. Mr. Haniya reiterated Hamas’s position on Friday.

“Israel might have secured the recognition of some of our people, and some in the Arab world and in the international community,” Mr. Haniya said. “It is now seeking another recognition, Islamic recognition. I say we will not give it this card.”

In Friday’s deadliest episode, the Israeli Air Force bombed a vehicle in northern Gaza, killing three Hamas militants inside, and wounding several passers-by on the street.

The Israeli military said the Hamas men were planning to launch rockets at southern Israel, and that the same Hamas cell was involved in rocket fire a day earlier.

Also on Friday, a Palestinian woman was shot dead near her house in Khan Yunis, according to residents and medical workers. Palestinians said she was hit by Israeli gunfire. The Israeli military said it was searching for tunnels in the area and shot two gunmen, but was not aware of having hit a woman.

DOJ_NMG_0081364

A day earlier, the Israeli military killed eight Palestinians in Gaza, including militants and civilians, and a ninth Palestinian died of his wounds on Friday.

In another development, the Israeli security forces clashed with hundreds of Palestinians from the West Bank who tried to enter Jerusalem on Friday to pray at the Aksa Mosque compound, one of the holiest sites in Islam.

The Palestinians, who tried to enter the city at several checkpoints, threw stones and bottles at the security forces, who responded with tear gas, rubber bullets and stun grenades. No serious injuries were reported.

An estimated 160,000 Muslims took part in the midday prayers at the mosque compound in Jerusalem's Old City, and such huge crowds are the norm during the holy month of Ramadan. However, Israel has not been allowing Muslim men under 40 to attend the services and has barred most Palestinians from the West Bank, citing security concerns.

The latest round of internal Palestinian fighting began on Thursday, with the fatal shooting of a member of the intelligence service, a branch of the security forces considered loyal to Mr. Abbas.

On Thursday night, a local Hamas leader was gunned down in Beit Lahiya. Shortly afterward, Hamas and Fatah gunmen there began exchanging fire. The shooting lasted through the night and during much of the day on Friday. A teenage bystander was killed.

9 Slain As Gaza Clashes Continue (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

At least 18 Palestinians have been killed since Thursday in actions by the Israeli military. Violence between Fatah and Hamas also persists.

JERUSALEM — Israeli forces killed at least nine Palestinians in the Gaza Strip on Friday and early today in clashes that mark the deadliest flare-up in weeks.

At least 18 people have died in military actions since Thursday morning, several of them civilians, Palestinian officials said.

Early today, Israeli aircraft fired missiles at Hamas fighters east of Gaza City, killing five. The Israeli military said gunmen had fired antitank missiles at troops that had moved into the area.

Three Hamas militants were killed Friday near Beit Lahiya when an Israeli aircraft fired a missile at the car in which they were riding.

The Israeli military said the car was loaded with homemade Kassam rockets the men planned to fire into Israel. Militants launched six Kassams a day earlier after an Israeli raid killed six people near the town of Khan Yunis, in southern Gaza.

Earlier Friday, Palestinian officials said a 32-year-old woman died after being hit by gunfire outside her home in Abasan, a village near Khan Yunis where Israeli forces have operated since Thursday. Israeli army officials said they were unaware of any shots hitting civilians. A military spokeswoman said soldiers had fired at two gunmen who approached, hitting both fighters and killing one.

Meanwhile, a 38-year-old man died of wounds suffered a night earlier during an Israeli missile strike on a house in the Shajaiyeh neighborhood of Gaza City. The strike targeted Ashraf Farwana, a senior Hamas militant, but he was not home.

Killed instead were his brother, Ayman, and an 8-year-old girl in an adjoining house.

Israel renewed military operations in Gaza after the June 25 capture of an Israeli soldier by Palestinian militants. The latest fighting has added to the turmoil in the impoverished coastal enclave, where factional clashes between the ruling Hamas movement and its main rival, Fatah, also are occurring.

At least 10 people were injured early Friday during a shootout between the rival groups in Beit Lahiya.

The encounter was apparently triggered by the fatal shooting of a Hamas militant the previous night by gunmen who appeared at his home. That shooting followed the slaying of a 30-year-old officer of the Palestinian intelligence service, which is loyal to Fatah.

Also Friday, a mob burned down a Gaza radio station affiliated with Fatah. The owner said the attackers were members of Hamas.

The two groups have been locked in a power struggle since Hamas won control of the government by defeating Fatah in parliamentary elections in January.

Talks aimed at forging a unity government have deadlocked over Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, announced a tentative agreement last month but it fell apart almost immediately.

Officials in both factions hoped a new government lineup could help break a months-long international aid embargo against Hamas, which much of the West classifies as a terrorist group.

DOJ_NMG_0081365

In other developments, Palestinians clashed with Israeli police at checkpoints leading to Jerusalem as they protested restrictions on Muslim prayers at the Al Aqsa mosque in the walled Old City. Officers fired stun grenades to disperse the crowd after youths hurled rocks, police spokesman Micky Rosenfeld said.

Israel has barred men younger than 40 from attending Friday prayers at the mosque during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, citing security concerns. Arab leaders have decried the restrictions as a violation of religious freedom.

More than 150,000 worshipers attended Friday's prayers.

Bush Strengthens Sanctions On Sudan (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

President Bush signed an executive order Friday that stiffens sanctions on Sudan and its oil industry in an effort to persuade the government to accept U.N. peacekeepers and stop killings of civilians in Darfur.

The president signed the Darfur Peace and Accountability Act to address the crisis in the western region of Sudan where at least 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million people have been displaced in three years of fighting.

The act imposes sanctions against those responsible for genocide, backs measures to protect civilians and humanitarian operations and supports peace efforts in the war-torn land, according to the order issued by the White House Friday on evening. The order continues a countrywide blocking of the Sudan government's property, and prohibits transactions related to Sudan's oil sector.

"The government of Sudan continues to implement policies and actions that violate human rights, in particular with respect to the conflict in Darfur," Bush said in his order.

"The pervasive role played by the government of Sudan in Sudan's petroleum and petrochemical industries threatens U.S. national security and foreign policy interests."

Bush's executive action expands on an earlier executive order issued by President Clinton in 1997.

The action taken Friday maintains robust U.S. sanctions on Sudan while facilitating U.S. assistance and investment in the development and reconstruction of Southern Sudan.

United Nations investigators and rights groups have blamed the bulk of the atrocities on the janjaweed, a pro-government militia that is widely accused of killing villagers and setting fire to their homes. The government denies supporting the janjaweed.

Despite a May peace agreement, aid workers and rights organizations agree with the Crisis Group's assessment that violence has increased in recent months.

The U.N. Security Council voted in August to replace the weak African Union peacekeeping mission with a much bigger U.N. force. But Sudan President Omar al-Bashir and his ruling National Congress Party have refused to let the U.N. peacekeepers deploy, claiming they would breach Sudan's sovereignty.

'Perfect Storm' Brewing In Georgia (WT)

By David R. Sands, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

The bitter dispute that erupted last month between Russia and Georgia is a "perfect storm" of mutual suspicion and hostility in which both sides have their reasons for escalating the tension, regional security analysts say.

Russia-Georgia relations, never good in the best of times, have plummeted after Moscow's harsh reaction to the Sept. 27 arrest and expulsion of four Russian soldiers in Tbilisi on espionage charges.

Russia cut mail and transportation links to Georgia and deported scores of Georgians for purported immigration-law violations. There also have been reports of intimidation of Georgian nationals and businesses in Moscow.

The European Union and the U.N. Security Council have appealed for calm, but both Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili and Russian President Vladimir Putin could benefit from the clash, said Charles King, an Eastern European specialist who teaches at Georgetown University.

"The crisis is a perfect storm that serves the interests of both Russia and Georgia to continually up the ante," Mr. King said. "They may not want war, but they could take all the steps up to war."

Bruce Jackson, president of the Washington-based Project on Transitional Democracies, said both leaders are playing for stakes that are larger than the fate of a few spies.

"Both Putin and Saakashvili think they can derive benefits from escalation," said Mr. Jackson, who said this week that it was "more likely than not" that there will be further deportations and violence before the crisis eased.

DOJ_NMG_0081366

Mr. King said the pro-Western Mr. Saakashvili was banking on a Russian "overreaction" to boost his popularity at home and to attract U.S. and European support for Georgia's long-term hopes to break away from Moscow's influence and join such Western institutions as NATO and the European Union.

Tbilisi has also tried to raise international opposition to Russia's backing of separatist movements in Georgia's South Ossetia and Abkhazia enclaves, which have resisted central control since Georgia gained independence from the collapsing Soviet Union in April 1991. Mr. Saakashvili's strong stand on the so-called "frozen conflicts" has helped reverse a decline in his political popularity in the three years since he led Georgia's democratic Rose Revolution.

In an opinion piece in the Wall Street Journal on Thursday, Mr. Saakashvili slammed what he called Russia's "unprovoked onslaught" and accused Russian leaders of trying to "smite the success story to the south."

Mr. Saakashvili's real audience, Mr. King said, is Washington.

"A fight with Russia keeps Georgia on the U.S. agenda," he said. "Brinksmanship can be played with one's friends as well as one's enemies."

The Georgian leader said his country "will do all that is necessary to ease the current tensions," but on the same day, his government announced that it was postponing indefinitely talks on a deal that would allow Russia to enter the World Trade Organization.

Mr. King said Russia and Mr. Putin are equally keen to slap down Georgia, in part to punish Tbilisi for its desire to ally with the European Union and United States and in part to show Ukraine and other former Soviet states on its border the costs of pulling away from Moscow in favor of the West.

With Mr. Putin set to step down as president in 2008, his potential successors are also competing to see who can take the harder line in defense of Russian national interests in the Georgian standoff.

But Russia's hard line is expected to come under fire when EU leaders meet with Mr. Putin next week at a summit in Finland. A draft summit statement being considered by EU foreign ministers expresses "grave concern" over Russia's recent actions against Georgia, according to press reports.

London And Dublin Offer Northern Ireland A Compromise (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

ST. ANDREWS, Scotland, Oct. 13 — After three days of closed-door negotiations, Britain and Ireland on Friday offered a compromise formula to restore Northern Ireland's power-sharing government by next March, allowing for an election or referendum to endorse the deal.

While the package was not immediately embraced by the province's fractious political parties, it gave them until Nov. 10 to hold meetings among their followers and then give their answer to what was promptly named the St. Andrews Agreement. But it is not certain that an agreement sponsored by London and Dublin will be enough to survive the tripwires of Northern Ireland's fissured politics.

The main parties, the Roman Catholic Sinn Fein and the Protestant Democratic Unionist Party, promised to respond by Nov. 10. If they consent, their action will begin a choreographed sequence of events to permit the power-sharing government set up under the Good Friday Agreement of 1998 to be restored. It was suspended four years ago in a dispute over alleged espionage by the Irish Republican Army.

Restoration of the power-sharing government, consisting of an executive branch as well as the existing local assembly, would be an important step toward ending Northern Ireland's anomalous political status at a time when its people have become used to relative peace and economic growth.

At a news conference, Prime Ministers Tony Blair of Britain and Bertie Ahern of Ireland refrained from high-flown language to herald the end of the negotiations. "I think we have a way forward here," Mr. Blair told reporters in the golf resort where the talks took place.

The Rev. Ian Paisley, the 80-year-old Protestant leader, said his party had made "considerable progress throughout the course of these talks."

The Democratic Unionists, who want a continued union with Britain, had been pressing for Sinn Fein, which seeks a united Ireland and is the political wing of the Irish Republican Army, to commit itself completely to respecting the province's police force, which Sinn Fein regards as a Protestant-dominated adversary.

Sinn Fein has been pressing for Mr. Paisley's agreement to sit in a power-sharing government as first minister with a republican leader as his deputy — an idea that would once have been unthinkable. The agreement means each side would have to accept the other's demands for the deal to unfold.

DOJ_NMG_0081367

On Friday, at least, they seemed determined to do that. “We need to find ways to put differences behind us,” said Gerry Adams, the Sinn Fein leader.

Mr. Paisley seemed equally ready to compromise. “Today we stand at a crossroads,” he said. “We stand at a place where there is a road to democracy and there is a road to anarchy, and I trust that we will see in the coming days the vast majority of people taking to the road of democracy.”

Initially, Britain threatened to shut down the Northern Ireland Assembly and resume direct rule of the troubled province if the parties did not agree to settle their differences by Nov. 24. That deadline now seems to have slipped well into next year.

The St. Andrews Agreement lays out a schedule of events, beginning with a preparatory caucus for political leaders in Northern Ireland starting Tuesday. Then, if they agree to continue the settlement deal by Nov. 10, the assembly would meet on Nov. 24.

On that day, the assembly would nominate a first minister and a deputy. According to a British official, those two figures — likely to be Mr. Paisley and Sinn Fein’s Martin McGuinness — would “not take up their role” on that day. But the presence of the two men technically in the same administration would offer a heady symbol of power sharing intended to breathe confidence into the agreement.

The next steps would be for the so-called Independent Monitoring Commission to report in January on the status of the Irish Republican Army’s pledge to renounce violence, followed by a referendum or election in March to endorse the St. Andrews Agreement.

Most participants except Mr. Paisley favored a referendum, according to a participant who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to disclose details of the deliberations.

Finally, the local executive body would be revived on March 26. But if the parties failed to set up the executive, or failed to agree “at any stage,” the assembly would be dissolved.

The agreement also provides for the British government to inject unspecified financial support into the province, which is already heavily dependent on central government financing.

A critical element of the agreement relates to Sinn Fein’s demand that the police in Northern Ireland be controlled by the local executive, giving Sinn Fein more influence over the force. The agreement suggests that the local government could assume control of the police by May 2008.

Deal Would Revive N. Ireland Assembly (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Power-Sharing Plan Faces Hurdles

LONDON, Oct. 13 -- The prime ministers of Britain and Ireland on Friday announced plans for Northern Ireland's Protestants and Catholics to share power in a deal that would restore the province's suspended local government by next March.

"I think we have a way forward here," British Prime Minister Tony Blair said at a news conference with his Irish counterpart, Bertie Ahern. The breakthrough came after three days of intensive talks with Northern Ireland's main political players in the Scottish resort town of St. Andrews.

Creating a local assembly in which Catholics and Protestants govern together was a cornerstone of the 1998 Good Friday accords. That pact set out a framework for lasting peace in the British province, where three decades of sectarian conflict claimed more than 3,600 lives until a cease-fire in 1997. The first assembly collapsed in October 2002 amid the mutual suspicion between Catholic and Protestant leaders that has long poisoned the province's politics.

While the assembly officially reconvened in May, officials have been unable to agree on a power-sharing plan between the "nationalist" Catholics, represented by Sinn Fein, who favor reunification with the Republic of Ireland, and the "unionist" Protestants, represented mainly by the Democratic Unionist Party, who favor continued British rule.

Blair and Ahern had said that if the parties could not reach agreement by Nov. 24, the province would have everything from water rates to education controlled by the central government in London. The St. Andrews talks were an attempt to avert that outcome, which is particularly opposed by Sinn Fein and its leaders, Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness.

Blair and Ahern said on Friday that Northern Ireland's political parties would have until Nov. 10 to agree to the plan. If they do, they would also nominate the two ministers who would lead the assembly -- most likely the Rev. Ian Paisley, head of the Democratic Unionists, as the first minister, and McGuinness as his deputy. The ministers would not actually assume full power until March 26, a delay officials said would give each side time to assess the other's commitment to the power-sharing agreement.

Blair also said the agreement would have to be approved by the province's voters in some sort of referendum.

DOJ_NMG_0081368

Blair and Ahern said the plan requires each side to compromise. Sinn Fein would have to endorse and support the province's police force, which is still predominantly Protestant. Sinn Fein officials have been reluctant to recognize the force until they believe that it more fully represents Catholic interests.

The Democratic Unionists and Paisley, their hard-line leader, would have to agree to collaborate in a government with Sinn Fein, the political affiliate of the Irish Republican Army, which waged a guerrilla war in the province for decades before announcing last year that it had laid down its weapons for good. Paisley has often said he refuses to govern with men he considers "terrorists."

If the voters approve the deal and the main political parties find the arrangement satisfactory, the assembly would choose the rest of its leadership on March 14 and London would restore the provincial government's authority on March 26.

Officials from the main political parties said they would consult with their members about the proposal.

Paisley said the nationalists, or republicans, had a "delivery to make."

"Delivering on the pivotal issue of policing and the rule of law starts now," he said.

Adams said: "Common-sense political realism and the interest of all our people demand we achieve this."

Renewed Optimism Over N Ireland Deal (FT)

By Christopher Adams And John Murray Brown

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

Tony Blair and Bertie Ahern, the Irish Taoiseach, on Friday set out a timetable for returning devolved power to Northern Ireland, amid evidence that republicans and unionists were edging closer to a deal over power-sharing.

On Friday, the final day of three days of multi-party talks in St Andrews, Scotland, Mr Blair said the province could have devolved government by March 26 if the parties endorse the plan by November 10.

There was optimism that Ian Paisley's Democratic Unionists and Sinn Fein could within weeks overcome long-standing differences and agree to form a joint power-sharing executive.

The provincial assembly in Stormont has been suspended since October 2002 and the UK has set a November 24 deadline for the parties to strike a deal

One person close to the negotiations told the Financial Times that the first step in the process, assuming the parties agreed, would be for Gerry Adams, Sinn Fein president, to call a meeting of his national executive to recommend a special conference on policing.

Mr Paisley and Sinn Fein's Martin McGuinness would then be appointed first and deputy first ministers of the Stormont assembly, but in shadow form without wielding real power.

As they prepared for government, it is hoped Sinn Fein would approve recognition of the Police Service of Northern Ireland – a key DUP demand – at its special conference.

The republicans' acceptance of policing has been a key stumbling block to agreement. Sinn Fein has demanded that the assembly and executive be set up first.

The deal might then be endorsed by referendum or by fresh elections to the assembly.

After lengthy overnight talks, Thursday's pessimistic mood began to dissipate. A news conference originally scheduled for midday was deferred and was expected at around 4pm local time.

Mr Adams, who spoke briefly to reporters outside the isolated hotel where the talks were being held, refused to go into detail about how discussions were going.

However, he hinted at a growing sense of optimism.

"I don't want to add to any rumour machine or anything else. All I'm going to say at this point is thank God it's a lovely day and it's work in progress...This process is based on optimism of the will."

Peter Hain, Northern Ireland secretary, has said the government will dissolve the assembly by parliamentary order and stop paying the representatives' salaries if the parties fail to meet the November deadline for agreement.

Mr Blair said there would be some process of electoral endorsement in March, either with a referendum or elections.

The prime minister put a positive gloss on the talks, but acknowledged there was still some way to go to secure a deal and that the talks could yet unravel.

"It is a pretty brave and bold move to say absolutely for sure that no-one will attempt to unpick any aspect of it [the draft agreement]," he said.

Mr Paisley declared afterwards: "The days of the gunman in government are hopefully over."

"More work is required on a number of issues, not least to institutions and structures of devolved power." he said

And, referring to concerns over Sinn Fein's stance on policing, he added that "it is deeds not deadlines that count".

DOJ_NMG_0081369

Mr Adams said he would consult with Sinn Fein members and the wider republican community. "Republicans have delivered big time in recent times...in order to be part in a progressive way of finding a solution we have to acknowledge we have been part of the problem," he said.

N. Ireland Talks Yield Progress (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

Both sides are optimistic after Blair and Ahern draw up a proposal for a new joint government.

LONDON — After three days of intense negotiations while locked in at a Scottish golf resort, the prime ministers of Britain and Ireland failed to bring Northern Ireland's feuding parties to immediate agreement on power sharing, but worked out a proposal that could establish a new joint government by March.

The talks diplomatically ignored a Nov. 24 deadline for settling the long-standing conflict, but held out the possibility of a resolution during another five months of consultations, concessions and tentative steps toward a shared future.

"Today we stand at a crossroads," the Rev. Ian Paisley, leader of the Democratic Unionist Party, said Friday after the talks, which he said made "considerable progress."

"We stand at a place where there is a road to democracy and there is a road to anarchy, and I trust that we will see in the coming days the vast majority of people taking to the road of democracy," the Protestant leader said. "The days of the gunmen in government are hopefully over forever."

Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams said he was committed to "put all these divisions behind us and to resolve all of these differences."

"Common sense, political realism and the interests of all sections of our people demand that we achieve this," the republican leader said.

Years of violent conflict between Protestant British loyalists and Roman Catholic republicans hoping for a united Ireland have been followed by more years of missed deadlines and failed agreements toward achieving a lasting peace. The result was that the British government turned up the heat on the process and imposed the November deadline for the parties to either reach agreement on restoring the Northern Ireland Assembly and a shared executive, as the administration is called, or face dissolution of the Assembly and return to direct rule by London.

Both sides have been generally willing to work out an agreement, but ran aground once again this week on two issues: Sinn Fein's reluctance to recognize a police force that has often been used as an instrument of repression; and the refusal of DUP leaders to sit in a government with Sinn Fein until assured it had abandoned its militant, Irish Republican Army-linked past and, especially, was willing to accept the police.

The proposed agreement and timetable set out by British Prime Minister Tony Blair and his Irish counterpart, Bertie Ahern, recognizes that the remaining hurdles are as much choreography as substance — if Sinn Fein accepts the police, the DUP will probably accept Sinn Fein, but who blinks first? — and establishes a series of confidence-building measures.

The proposal demands agreement on police and power sharing. But it also gives the parties time to consult with their bases and seek voter approval of significant policy moves.

Each party has until Nov. 10 to respond. If they agree in principle, the Northern Ireland Assembly will nominate a leader, presumably from the DUP, and a deputy leader, from Sinn Fein, on Nov. 24. But significantly, the executive does not take power until elections are held in March.

If all goes smoothly, party leaders would nominate members of the full governing executive March 14, and London would hand over governing authority March 26.

The British prime minister, who has worked to make resolution of the Northern Ireland conflict a hallmark of his administration, flew to the Scottish city of St. Andrews and blocked out a full 48 hours from his schedule to sit with Ahern and try to push the parties to agreement. He said the proposed deal provided "a sound basis" that required compromises from both sides.

"We want a new dispensation in Northern Ireland where there is a shared future and where people can resolve their differences in a democratic way," Blair said. "And so it's a simple deal in the end. It's about, on the one hand, equality, respect for people who hold different views … and exclusively peaceful means being used in order to decide differences."

Ahern said the proposed agreement provided "all of the elements" needed for a final resolution. "If not perfect by anybody's agenda, it is a fair and sustainable balance to try to, by March, make sure we have a working executive based on power sharing and acceptance of policing and the rule of law."

Chile Holds Own In Global Market (LAT)

By Marla Dickerson

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

While other countries fear China and maintain high tariffs; the Latin nation is tearing down trade barriers to Beijing.

SANTIAGO, Chile — Chinese competition has put hundreds of textile manufacturers in Latin America out of business. It gave Jose Ramon de Camino Muxi a new start.

After visiting China many times in the 1990s, the Chilean entrepreneur was convinced that his family's wool and cotton operations would be shredded by mammoth factories there. But he didn't despair. He decided to let China do his manufacturing for him.

De Camino now peddles Chinese-made footwear through his 10 Payless ShoeSource retail shops in Chile. And he sells wholesale shoes and fabrics with the "Made in China" label to mom-and-pop stores around the country. De Camino said his $12-million enterprise is growing 20% a year. Business has never been better.

"China is my partner," he said on a recent afternoon amid the clatter of electric drills and hammers wielded by construction workers expanding his jam-packed warehouse. "I would not like to have the Chinese as an enemy."

De Camino's if-you-can't-beat-'em-join-'em attitude is an example of how Chile has cobbled one of Latin America's most successful trading relationships with the Asian giant. While other countries in the region maintain high tariffs on Chinese goods, Chile is busy tearing down trade barriers.

Over the last decade, China has become Chile's second-largest trading partner, behind the United States. Chile signed a free-trade agreement with China last year, the only Latin American country to have done so.

That might seem foolhardy for a nation of only 16 million souls, whose manufacturing base is dwarfed by that of the world's most populous country. But Chile ran a $1.9-billion trade surplus with China last year, mainly because of surging copper exports to feed voracious Chinese demand.

Chinese-made merchandise is swamping store shelves and showrooms in Chile. Chinese imports hit a record $2.5 billion last year, about 8.5% of Chile's total purchases from foreigners. China supplies nearly half of Chile's imported consumer goods such as clothing and electronics, up from one-tenth in 1996.

But in contrast to countries such as Mexico, where domestic producers are clamoring for protection, Chilean manufacturers are among the strongest supporters of the free-trade deal with China.

"You can't close the door. That's the reality," said Patricia Perez, general manager of a Santiago-based medical products company and president of AsexmaChile, an exporters' trade group. "We see an opportunity to find niches for our products in China … and to make Chile a platform" for Chinese manufacturing and trade with the rest of Latin America.

That view is not widely shared across the region despite a Chinese-led commodities boom that is fueling robust economic growth. In addition to snapping up raw materials from aluminum to wood pulp, China is investing in railways, pipelines, highways and satellites. Analysts credit low-cost Chinese-made consumer goods for helping keep inflation in check and for boosting the buying power of the poor. Still, many in Latin America view China and other fast-growing Asian nations as rivals that are stealing jobs, soaking up foreign investment, threatening domestic industries and pushing them out of world markets.

In 1980, the combined economies of the nations of Latin America and the Caribbean were twice as large as those of China and India together. By 2004, they were 20% smaller than the two Asian countries, according to a recent World Bank report.

China and India's share of world exports is 50% larger than those of Latin America and the Caribbean. In 1990, the reverse was true. China's economy averaged 8.5% growth from 1981 to 2000, while Latin America's barely budged and poverty remains entrenched.

"Blame for the private sector's poor performance … often falls on the growing presence of China," said the World Bank report released in August.

Mexico and the natural resource-poor nations of Central America are particularly wary. In contrast to their South American counterparts, they sell little to China and are running trade deficits with the Asian nation.

They are also losing out in export markets. Ten years ago, China wasn't even ranked among Chile's top-ten trading partners. Today it's No. 2, behind the United States.

Central America has lost thousands of apparel and textile jobs to Asia. Mexico, Brazil and Argentina together have initiated more anti-dumping cases against China than the European Union, the United States or Canada, according to the World Bank, which says the approach is counterproductive.

"Instead of responding with protectionist policies, the region should adopt offensive strategies to take advantage of the overall positive effects of high Chinese and Indian growth," said Guillermo Perry, chief economist of the Latin America region for the World Bank.

Chile, which is thinly populated but blessed with natural resources and educated citizens, has been opening its economy for more than three decades.

In the 1970s, its military rulers decided that trade, private enterprise and increased productivity were keys to raising living standards. They adopted a policy of unilateral liberalization to drop tariffs, open Chile's markets and force its companies to sink or swim against global competitors.

Now a full-fledged democracy, Chile enjoys one of the highest standards of living in Latin America and has become an accomplished world trader. Gross national income per capita was $5,870 in 2005, second to Mexico's $7,310 in Latin America, according to the World Bank.

Exports accounted for nearly 40% of the nation's gross domestic product last year. The nation has free-trade agreements with some of the world's largest economies, including the U.S., Canada, Mexico, the European Union and South Korea. It's currently in negotiations with Japan and India.

Thus Chile had no fear of signing a pact with China, Perez of AsexmaChile said.

Chilean stores were stocked with plenty of Chinese goods before the agreement, thanks to Chile's meager tariffs averaging about 6%. Perez said most of AsexmaChile's 500 members figure that Chile got the better end of the deal because it will eventually win tariff-free access for 92% of its exports to China.

"We're already competing with the whole world here," she said. "We aren't afraid."

Still, the agreement underscores how important Asia trade is to Chile. Although Chile's exports are well-balanced, with about 23% of its $39 billion in 2005 exports going to North America and 25% to Europe, Asia now accounts for the largest chunk at 36%. Chile last year shipped $4.4 billion worth of copper, wine, fish meal, vegetables, wood pulp and other products to China. That's more than 11% of Chile's total exports and nearly one-third of its exports to Asia.

Chile's Ministry of Exterior Relations has beefed up its Asian department. Entrepreneurs are taking Mandarin classes and going on trade missions to China.

Shoe importer De Camino recently returned from his 34th trip there since 1987. An exuberant man who wears pinstriped suits and drives a Jaguar, he credits China for helping keep inflation low and for allowing Chileans to stretch their pesos.

A room in his offices in the capital's outskirts is crammed with this season's offerings — spike-heeled boots, sexy pumps, sleek basketball shoes.

Chileans are fashion conscious, he said, but most can't afford to spend a fortune on footwear. De Camino said Chilean design combined with Chinese manufacturing prowess have allowed him to deliver good-looking shoes at reasonable prices.

"Ten years ago you would have paid $100 for these," he said, grabbing a pair of Air Jordan knockoffs. "I can sell them for $20 now, thanks to China."

De Camino acknowledges that his staff of 100 is half what it was when his family had manufacturing plants in Chile. But he dismisses the notion that China's development is a danger.

He said that China would eventually become the world's largest economy and that the rest of Latin American would do well to learn how to work with it rather than throw up trade barriers.

"It's impossible to go back," he said. "Everybody needs China."

Book Outlines How Spy Exposed U.S. Intelligence Secrets To Cuba (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - A senior Cuba analyst for the Defense Intelligence Agency gave Havana detailed information on U.S. eavesdropping programs aimed at the Castro government, allowing Cuba to mount effective counterintelligence and deception operations for year, according to a new book on U.S. intelligence failures.

Cuban spy Ana Belen Montes, who was born in Puerto Rico, enjoyed nearly unfettered access to classified information until she was caught in 2001. She's now serving a 25-year prison term.

The book, "Enemies: How America's Foes are Stealing Our Vital Secrets and How We Let it Happen" was written by Bill Gertz, a defense correspondent for The Washington Times.

In it, Gertz reports that Montes leaked so many significant U.S. secrets to Havana that some U.S. officials rank the damage she did with that caused by Aldrich Ames and Robert Hanssen, the infamous CIA and FBI turncoats for Moscow whose information resulted in the deaths of dozens of U.S. agents.

"Montes was the first national-level analyst from the intelligence community known to have turned traitor and the most damaging Cuban spy arrested to date," Gertz wrote, quoting from a still-classified damage assessment report on Montes.

DOJ_NMG_0081372

U.S. intelligence officials consulted by McClatchy Newspapers confirmed that Gertz's book reflects the intelligence community's assessment of the Montes case, although some of the more sensitive information remains under wraps.

Gertz has written several books on intelligence matters.

U.S. officials believe Montes did the greatest damage by giving Cuba information on U.S. electronic eavesdropping systems, which were the primary sources of intelligence on Cuba since Washington had long found it all but impossible to recruit spies within the island, Gertz wrote.

During a briefing from the National Security Agency she received in 1999, Montes learned about "every single NSA eavesdropping program targeted against Cuba and Latin America," according to Gertz's book.

She also learned about current and proposed electronic spying systems by taking part in planning sessions for future imagery and other intelligence-gathering programs, the book adds.

Montes had access to an intelligence community computer system, the Corporate Information Retrieval and Storage system, which includes information from the CIA, the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research, the NSA, the FBI and other sources, Gertz wrote.

The book notes that Montes also sat on an interagency group known as the Hard Target Committee, which discussed operations in places such as Iran, China and North Korea. The book doesn't say if the information was passed to those countries.

Through Montes, the Cubans obtained a clear picture of what Washington knew and didn't know about Cuba, allowing Havana to carry out "a robust denial and deception program," according to the damage assessment report.

Some of her disinformation included a 1998 U.S. intelligence report that downplayed the threat of Cuban armed forces and its bio-weapons capabilities, and a 1993 paper that said the Cuban military wanted closer ties with the United States, Gertz wrote.

The book also says there are "indications" that her spying may have led to the deaths of some U.S. agents in Latin America, but it provides no details. Court records show Montes leaked the identities of four U.S. agents in Cuba. Those agents weren't harmed.

The damage assessment report, however, paints an embarrassing picture for U.S. spy-catchers: Montes met her Cuban handlers, posing as business people, students or academics, at Washington restaurants more than 100 times, sometimes twice a week.

Montes, who pleaded guilty to spying charges, told a Washington courtroom that she had spied for Cuba out of conviction that U.S. policies were causing undue suffering to Cubans and that Havana paid her little or no money for her work.

According to Gertz, Cuba recruited Montes around 1985. She first came under U.S. suspicion in 1994, when Cuba detected a highly secret electronic surveillance system. Montes took a polygraph test and passed it.

Montes came under suspicion again in 2000, when Cuban officials uncovered a U.S. agent working in Cuba for a special intelligence program, Gertz wrote. Montes was one of the few U.S. officials familiar with the operation. The FBI placed her under surveillance and arrested her in 2001.

Micro-Credit Pioneer Wins Peace Prize (WP)

By Molly Moore, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Economist, Bank Brought New Opportunity to Poor

PARIS, Oct. 13 -- Bangladeshi economist Muhammad Yunus and the Grameen Bank he created won the Nobel Peace Prize on Friday for leveraging small loans into major social change for impoverished families.

The Grameen Bank's pioneering use of micro-credit has been duplicated across the globe since Yunus started the project in his home village three decades ago. Loans as low as $9 have helped beggars start small businesses and poor women buy cellular phones and basket-weaving materials.

"Lasting peace cannot be achieved unless large population groups find ways in which to break out of poverty," the Norwegian Nobel Committee said in its citation released Friday in Oslo. "Micro-credit is one such means."

The committee praised Yunus, 66, as "a leader who has managed to translate visions into practical action for the benefit of millions of people, not only in Bangladesh but across cultures and civilizations."

In a telephone interview, Yunus said he was overcome by the excitement of winning the prize after several years of being nominated.

"I was trying to find people to tell, and the phone kept buzzing, so I could hardly tell anybody," said Yunus, speaking from his home in Dhaka, the capital of Bangladesh. "Then people started coming and bringing flowers. It's fantastic."

DOJ_NMG_0081373

Still exuberant after hours of telephone calls and hundreds of visitors pouring into his house, Yunus said: "This prize is so overwhelming, it will affect our work tremendously. It will bring the issues I'm raising to the attention of people who can make a difference in the world.

"From this day on, micro-credit will become part of the financial center, it can't be kept as some kind of subsector," he said. "As a bank you have to reach the poor people. That's a big change, and banking will not be the same."

Yunus said he believes the Nobel committee endorsed his view that bridging the gap between rich and poor countries in an age of increasing globalization is critical to reducing conflict around the world.

"You cannot go on having absurd amounts of wealth when other people have problems of survival," he said. "If you can bring an end to poverty, at least from an economic point of view, you can have a more livable situation between very rich people and very poor people, very rich countries and very poor countries. That's our basic ingredient for peace."

Bangladesh's first Nobel Prize exhilarated a poor nation more accustomed to news of natural disasters, disease and political upheaval. A massive public assembly was planned for Saturday in Dhaka to honor Yunus and the Grameen Bank, according to bank officials who said their offices were besieged Friday by customers, citizens and politicians offering congratulations.

Yunus and the bank were surprise winners among the 191 nominees for the most prestigious of the Nobel awards. Speculation in recent days had focused on diplomats and officials who brokered last year's Aceh peace accord, which ended 29 years of fighting in the Indonesian province, and on global celebrities that included Bono, the U2 lead singer and anti-poverty campaigner.

The $1.4 million prize will be split between the Grameen Bank and Yunus, the bank's managing director. Yunus said he would use his share to set up a company to make low-cost, nutritious food for the poor and to establish an eye hospital for poor Bangladeshis.

Yunus and the Grameen Bank are hardly household names outside of Bangladesh, but Yunus has been one of the world's most prominent and renowned leaders of poverty alleviation. The Grameen Bank model has been duplicated in more than 100 countries, from Uganda to Malaysia to Chicago's South Side.

The Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation recognized the bank's efforts in August, providing a $1.5 million grant to expand its work worldwide through the Grameen Foundation.

A gentle, soft-spoken man who has been feted by kings and presidents for his groundbreaking and tireless efforts to improve the lives of poor families, Yunus nonetheless has remained most at ease in the steamy Bangladeshi villages where the bank's clients -- mostly sari-clad women -- line up at makeshift tables to repay their loans.

Yunus launched the idea of the Grameen Bank after he returned to Bangladesh from the United States to take a teaching job in the economics department at Chittagong University.

Alarmed at the poverty created by ongoing famine, he and his students started an experimental project giving women $27 loans to buy straw to make stools.

The bank they created -- Grameen means "village" in the Bengali language -- not only defied conventional lending rules by making loans to the poorest of the poor, but challenged cultural taboos by giving most of the loans to women in a Muslim-dominated society where rural women at the time were seldom allowed to touch money or work outside of their homes. The bank issues most of its loans to women because Yunus discovered that they spent their money more carefully and paid back the loans in far high percentages than did men.

Today, the bank has 6.61 million borrowers and 2,226 branches. The bank reports that it has lent $5.72 billion over the past 30 years and claims a 98 percent repayment rate.

"Micro-credit has proved to be an important liberating force in societies where women in particular have to struggle against repressive social and economic conditions," the Nobel Prize committee said in its citation Friday.

Three years ago, the bank started a program to give beggars -- or "struggling members" -- lines of credit of about $9 to purchase small items such as bread, candy, pickles and toys. Recipients of the loans then resell the goods "to supplement their begging," according to the bank's description of the program, which is intended not only to empower beggars, but to boost their morale and dignity.

"Yunus's long-term vision is to eliminate poverty in the world," the Nobel Prize committee said. "That vision cannot be realized by means of micro-credit alone. But Muhammad Yunus and Grameen Bank have shown that, in the continuing efforts to achieve it, micro-credit must play a major part."

Peace Prize To Pioneer Of Loans To Poor No Bank Would Touch (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0081374

A Bangladeshi economist, Muhammad Yunus, and the bank he founded 30 years ago won the Nobel Peace Prize yesterday for pioneering work in giving tiny loans to millions of poor people no commercial bank would touch — destitute widows and abandoned wives, landless laborers and rickshaw drivers, sweepers and beggars.

The Nobel Committee praised Mr. Yunus, 66, and the Grameen Bank for making microcredit, as the loans are called, a practical solution to combating rural poverty in Bangladesh and inspiring similar schemes across the developing world.

"Microcredit has proved to be an important liberating force in societies where women in particular have to struggle against repressive social and economic conditions," the committee said in announcing the prize.

Mr. Yunus has long been an influential champion of the idea that even the most impoverished people have the drive and creativity to build small businesses with loans as small as $12, and Grameen Bank has dedicated itself to helping the poorest of the poor.

The borrowers used the money to buy milk-giving cows, or bamboo to craft stools, or yarn to weave into stoles, or incense to sell in stalls, among myriad other money-making schemes.

Reached in Dhaka, Bangladesh, by telephone yesterday, Mr. Yunus recalled the day in 1976 when he reached into his own pocket to give his first loan, $27, to 42 villagers living near Chittagong University where he said he was then teaching "elegant theories of economics." The borrowers invested the money and repaid him in full, though they had no collateral and signed nothing.

He said he asked himself that day, "If you can make so many people so happy with such a small amount of money, why shouldn't you do more of it?"

Still, over the years, Mr. Yunus faced skeptics and detractors, as it became clear that microcredit loans, alluring as they were, were not by themselves a panacea for poverty.

Some in the microfinance business have questioned the Grameen Bank's focus on serving the poorest, arguing the industry would grow faster and have more impact if it aimed at a wider pool of borrowers, including those struggling just above the poverty line.

Others have sometimes criticized what they see as Grameen's unconventional accounting practices (which Mr. Yunus said yesterday were fully transparent) — or maintained that Grameen should have been more of a leader in combining microcredit with health and education services, or in lending to poor people who need money not to start businesses, but to pay their bills, or cover their children's school fees.

But in interviews yesterday, Mr. Yunus's skeptics and fans alike credited him and Grameen with helping to fundamentally change the way the world saw the potential of poor people and to popularize the movement to provide financial services to the poor.

"Yunus was one of the early visionaries who believed in the idea of poor people as viable, worthy, attractive clients for loans," said Elizabeth Littlefield, who heads the Consultative Group to Assist the Poor, a research institution supported by microfinance donors. "That simple notion has put in motion a huge range of imitators and innovators who have taken that idea and run with it, improved on it, expanded it."

Or, as the Nobel committee put it: "Yunus's long-term vision is to eliminate poverty in the world. That vision cannot be realized by means of microcredit alone. But Muhammad Yunus and Grameen Bank have shown that, in the continuing effort to achieve it, microcredit must play a major part."

The prize was another that fell under a broader definition of peace, awarded by the committee not for traditional conflict resolution, but rather development work, and followed the 2004 award to a Kenyan environmentalist, Wangari Maathai.

Indeed, in the decades since Mr. Yunus's first loan, microcredit has become one of the most popular antipoverty strategies in the world. Last year, more than 100 million people received small loans from more than 3,100 institutions in 130 countries, according to Microcredit Summit, a Washington-based nonprofit advocacy group that Mr. Yunus helped found. The average loan from Grameen Bank was $130.

Over the years, the movement to provide financial services to the poor has become more capacious, stressing the need for services beyond loans — for safe places to save small amounts of money, for crop and life insurance, for inexpensive ways to transfer money earned in distant cities and foreign countries to families back home.

In the 1970's, when Mr. Yunus was getting started, the idea that poor people were a good credit risk seemed far-fetched. The United States Agency for International Development had conducted a global survey of banking services in poor communities and found failure after failure, said Jonathan J. Morduch, an economics professor at New York University who co-wrote a book on microcredits.

Many of the lenders then were state-owned banks that gave credit to politically connected elites rather than the poor people they were supposed to serve. And often at election time, vote-seeking politicians pressed the banks to forgive loans wholesale, leaving the institutions in terrible financial shape.

DOJ_NMG_0081375

In 1974, Mr. Yunus, trained as an economist at Vanderbilt University, found himself teaching economics at Chittagong University when Bangladesh was struck by famine. “I decided I must do something,” he said. He began working in nearby villages, among them Jobra, where he made his first loan in 1976.

He said he tried to persuade commercial banks to give loans to poor people who had no assets and had always been dependent on local moneylenders. But the bankers only did so when he personally co-signed as a guarantor.

Mr. Yunus’s new model of banking for the poor had several unusual features, Professor Morduch said. Grameen lent to groups of five people, who helped ensure that each member repaid his or her share. It lent not only to farmers, but also to laborers and women who had a knack for crafts and shopkeeping. And it required borrowers to repay their loans in manageable, bite-sized weekly installments.

“He proved the impossible: that the poor were bankable,” Professor Morduch said.

But Mr. Yunus’s approach went beyond giving the poor economic opportunity to seeking deeper social change, said Amartya Sen, who, like Mr. Yunus, is a Bengali, an economist and a Nobel prize winner.

Mr. Sen, a professor at Harvard, noted that Grameen’s loans had gone overwhelmingly to women, giving financial clout to women who had little power in Bangladeshi society and often lived cloistered in their homes.

In the overwhelmingly Muslim nation of Bangladesh, Mr. Yunus’s approach also offered hope and ideas to compete with the allure of fundamentalist Islamic causes.

“It’s a very secular movement,” Professor Sen said, “very egalitarian, market friendly and socially radical.”

Those who have watched Mr. Yunus over the years remarked on his gifts as a salesman — his personal warmth, his talent for telling a story, his sheer ability to charm an audience. Those qualities were very much on display last month when he participated in a panel at a Sheraton hotel in New York during Bill Clinton’s gathering of international do-gooders.

The theme was “Building a Sustainable Future,” and Mr. Yunus told about how Grameen gave loans to beggars. He made hundreds of rich people — many of them looking for causes to support — laugh out loud and also tugged at their heartstrings.

“All we are doing is telling beggars that, well, since you go house to house begging, would you like to take some merchandise with you, some cookies, some candy, something?” he asked a crowd that hooted with delight at this clever notion.

“A typical loan for a beggar is something like $12,” he said. “With $12, she has a basket of merchandise she carries around and goes house to house.”

“Today, we have more than 80,000 beggars in the program,” he said. “Many of them have already quit begging completely.”

At that, the audience erupted in a sustained burst of applause. Mr. Yunus beamed.

Economist, Bank Win Nobel Peace Prize (AP)

By Farid Hossain, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

The simple yet revolutionary idea of loaning tiny sums to poor people looking to escape poverty by starting businesses won Bangladeshi economist Muhammad Yunus and the Grameen Bank he founded the Nobel Peace Prize on Friday.

Yunus' notion — today, known as microcredit — has spread around the globe in the past three decades and is said to have helped more than 100 million people take their first steps to rise out of poverty.

Some bought diary cows, others egg-laying hens. In recent years, money for a single cell phone has been enough to start thriving enterprises in isolated villages without phone lines from East Asia to West Africa.

"Lasting peace cannot be achieved unless large population groups find ways in which to break out of poverty," the Nobel Committee said in its citation in Oslo, Norway. "Microcredit is one such means. Development from below also serves to advance democracy and human rights."

The 65-year-old economist said he would use part of his share of the $1.4 million award to create a company to make low-cost, high-nutrition food for the poor. The rest would go toward setting up an eye hospital for the poor in Bangladesh, he said. The food company, to be known as Social Business Enterprise, will sell food for a nominal price.

Yunus is the first Nobel Prize winner from Bangladesh, a poverty-stricken Southeast Asian nation of about 141 million people on the Bay of Bengal.

"I am so, so happy, it's really a great news for the whole nation," Yunus told The Associated Press after the prize was announced. He was reached by telephone at his home in the Bangladeshi capital, Dhaka.

His joy was shared by those his microcredit program has helped.

"I can't express in words how happy I am," said Gulbadan Nesa, 40, who five years ago used $90 from the Grameen Bank to buy chickens so she could sell eggs. She's since taken more loans and expanded into selling building materials.

DOJ_NMG_0081376

"Not long ago I was almost begging for money to feed my family," she said from Bishnurampur, her village in northern Bangladesh. "Today, I've got my own house and enough money to feed my children and send them to school."

Grameen, which means rural in the Bengali language, was the first lender to hand out microcredit, giving small loans to poor Bangladeshis who did not qualify for loans from conventional banks. No collateral is needed for Grameen loans, which average about $200.

But there is social pressure to repay. Recipients form groups of five and members qualify for future loans only if all are current on their old ones.

The results are hard to argue with — the bank says it has a 99 percent repayment rate.

The bank says it has loaned $5.72 billion to 6.6 million Bangladeshi, 97 percent of whom were women, and today provides services in more than 70,000 villages.

The success has allowed Grameen to expand its credit to include housing loans, financing for irrigation and fisheries as well as traditional savings accounts.

But Grameen is not without critics, many of whom focus on the bank's high interest rates. Its business loans carry a rate of 20 percent, significantly higher than the 10-15 percent charged by commercial banks.

"While the poor pay 20 percent interest for their loan, the rich pay much less. It can't be called social justice," said S.M. Akash, an economics professor at Dhaka University.

Reports routinely circulate in Bangladesh's media of people being forced to borrow from second or third sources, often at higher interest rates, to repay Grameen loans. But almost no one is willing put their names to such criticism in Bangladesh, where Yunus was considered a national hero even before the Nobel Prize was announced.

How much impact Grameen has had on Bangladesh's economy also remains an open question.

Poverty has decreased since Grameen was founded in 1983. Bangladesh's per capita income has grown from $280 in 1985 to $440 in 2006, according to World Bank figures.

While the bank was "a factor" in that success, economists "can't apportion exactly how much credit has to go with Grameen," said Jonathan Morduch, an expert on microfinance at New York University.

And even if per capita income has increased, overwhelmingly Muslim Bangladesh remains one of the world's poorest countries, a land beset by political unrest and the ever-present specter of another military coup.

In fact, the spread of Yunus' and Grameen's microcredit schemes around the world — they are now considered a key approach to spurring development — is arguably one of the few bright spots for Bangladesh since it won independence from Pakistan in 1973.

Worldwide, microcredit financing is estimated to have helped 92 million families last year alone, according to Jove Oliver, spokesman for the Microcredit Summit Campaign, part of the Washington-based Project Results Educational Fund.

Yunus told The Associated Press in 2004 that his "eureka moment" came while chatting to a shy woman weaving bamboo stools with calloused fingers.

Sufia Begum was a 21-year-old mother of three when he met her in 1974 and asked how much she earned. She replied that she borrowed about five taka, the equivalent of nine cents, from a middleman for the bamboo for each stool.

All but two cents of that went back to the lender.

"I thought to myself, my God, for five takas she has become a slave," Yunus said in the interview.

The following day, he and his students did a survey in the woman's village, Jobra, and discovered that 43 villagers owed a total of $27.

"I couldn't take it anymore. I put the $27 out there and told them they could liberate themselves," he said, and pay him back whenever they could. The idea was to buy their own materials and cut out the middleman.

Over the following year, they all paid him back — day by day.

TERRORISM NEWS:

US May Charge KSM With Pearl Murder. McClatchy Newspapers (10/15, Rosenberg) reports, "U.S. military officials intend to charge Guantanamo Bay captive Khalid Sheikh Mohammed with the murder of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, according to a Time magazine report." However, "the Pentagon's chief war-crimes prosecutor told The Miami Herald on Friday that the Time report may be premature." Time "attributed to 'national security officials' the detail that Mohammed admitted under interrogation to having killed Pearl ... The magazine also reported that it compared the hands seen on the videotape executing Pearl to Mohammed's hands and confirmed it was him."

Final PENTTBOM Detainee Remains Jailed In Arizona. The AP (10/15, Mendoza) reported, "In a jail cell at an immigration detention center in Arizona sits a man who is not charged with a crime, not suspected of a crime, not considered a danger to society. But he has been in custody for five years. His name is Ali Partovi," and "he is the last to be held of about 1,200 Arab and Muslim men swept up" by US investigators after 9/11. The AP notes, "The FBI operation was called PENTTBOM; it was swift and fierce, and the stakes couldn't have been higher. When in doubt, the orders came, arrest now and ask questions later. … Then came demands, from Congress, from the Justice Department's Inspector General, from the ACLU and Human Rights Watch and from Arab and Muslim activists, that these individuals must be accounted for. To date that hasn't occurred. … Here's what is known: 762 of the 1,200 PENTTBOM arrestees were charged with immigration violations at the behest of the FBI because agents thought they might be associated with terrorism. Partovi was one of these 762."

Paralegal And Lawyer Are Ordered Not To Discuss Guantanamo Charges. The AP (10/14, Leitsinger) reports, "A paralegal and a military lawyer who brought forward allegations about prisoner abuse at the Guantanamo Bay detention center have been ordered not to speak with the press, lawyers and a military spokeswoman said Saturday." USMC Lt. Col. Colby Vokey and Sgt. Heather Cerveny have been directed "not to communicate with the media."

Military Defense Lawyers Fear For Careers. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Williams, 918K) reports, "The order has heightened fears among the military defense lawyers for Guantanamo prisoners that their careers will suffer for exposing flaws and injustices in the system," according to Muneer Ahmad, a law professor and lawyer for a detainee. Detainees' lawyers "say the personal stakes are high and point to the Navy's failure to promote Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift after he successfully challenged the legitimacy of the Pentagon's war-crimes commissions." In addition, "at least three other military defense lawyers for the 10 charged terrorism suspects have also been passed over for promotion in what some consider a subtle reprimand of their vigorous defense of their clients."

Plight Of Detainees Highlighted In Media. Following the Washington Post's previous coverage of Abdul Rahim, who claims he was wrongly sent to Guantanamo, the New York Times (10/15, Golden, 1.21M) reports, "Abdul Rahim Al Ginco thought he was saved when the United States invaded Afghanistan in 2001 and overthrew the Taliban regime. Mr. Ginco, a college student living in the United Arab Emirates, had gone to Afghanistan in 2000 ... But rather than help Mr. Ginco return home, American soldiers detained him again." Ginco "remains in the United States military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba -- in part, it appears, on the strength of a propaganda videotape made by his [Taliban] torturers." The Times observes that he appears in two, possibly coerced "propaganda videos" shot by the Taliban and that a law awaiting President Bush's signature "would also sweep away most federal court challenges to the detention of Guantánamo prisoners, including perhaps the one filed by American lawyers for Mr. Ginco, who is now 28."

Last 9/11 Detainee Languishes In Arizona Detention Center. The AP (10/15, Mendoza) reports in a highly critical article, "In a jail cell at an immigration detention center in Arizona sits a man who is not charged with a crime, not suspected of a crime, not considered a danger to society. But he has been in custody for five years. His name is Ali Partovi. And according to the Department of Homeland Security, he is the last to be held of about 1,200 Arab and Muslim men swept up by authorities in the United States after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks." After erroneous reportage that all such detainees had been freed, "the Department of Homeland Security insists he really is the last one in custody." The AP quotes several very critical human rights advocates and lawyers about the detention policies that followed 9/11 and also interviews Partovi by telephone.

LAT Applauds Prosecution Of US Terrorist In Contrast To Foreign Detainees. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, 918K) editorializes in support of charging Adam Yahiye Gadahn with treason, writing, "The government's attempts to circumvent the Constitution in its war on terror -- by establishing military tribunals lacking in due process and wiretapping Americans without a warrant -- have been roundly and rightly criticized. But in this case, the Justice Department is relying on the U.S. court system and the most venerable of U.S. laws to bring a high-profile U.S. operative of Al Qaeda to justice."

NYTimes Faults Supporters Of Military Commissions Act. The New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) editorializes about the Military Commissions Act, writing that Sen. Lindsey Graham "and other supporters of this dreadful legislation seem to have forgotten that American justice does not merely deliver swift punishment to the guilty. It also protects the innocent. ... Mr. Bush wants Americans to trust him to apply these powers only to truly dangerous men. Even if our system were based on that sort of personal power and not the rule of law, it would be hard to trust the judgment of a president and an administration whose records are so bad."

US Security Policy Could Help Free 9/11 Suspect In Germany. McClatchy Newspapers (10/15, Schofield) reports from Hamburg, Germany, "There is no dispute that Mounir el-Motassadeq was close to the men who carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. .. .He spent three months at an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan. He lived near lead hijacker Mohammed Atta in Hamburg and signed as the witness to Atta's will. He held power of attorney over the bank account of another hijacker, Marwan al-Shehhi. He transferred $2,500 to plotter Ramzi Binalshib. He even sent money to the United States that was used to help finance the hijackers' pilot training." McClatchy continues, "German authorities charged him with 3,066 counts of accessory to murder, and in February 2003 he was convicted — the first person to stand trial in the attacks. .. .But that conviction was overturned by a German appeals court in 2004. This year, he was ordered released pending resolution of appeals. … Now el-Motassadeq, who is free on bond, is about to learn whether U.S. security policy will help him walk away from criminal charges in the worst terrorist attack in American history." McClatchy adds, "A German court Thursday began a hearing into whether the accessory-to-murder charges should be restored. The German government is seeking a third trial in the matter. … Among the issues is whether the United States will allow German lawyers to question two key figures in the Sept. 11 plot: alleged ringleader Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and co-conspirator Binalshib."

Supermax Prison Housing Terrorists Is Understaffed. The AP (10/15, Tsai) reports, "Staffing at the Supermax prison [in Colorado] has gotten so low that job hazards have increased for correctional officers watching over the nation's worst terrorists," including al-Qaida member Zacarias Moussaoui, Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski and Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols, "an arbitrator has ruled. ... The American Federation of Government Employees had said assaults and threats increased after staffing at the Supermax was reduced last year." The AP notes, "Housing units at Supermax require three officers per shift, but entire units were sometimes left unstaffed, and cells were not being searched regularly, the arbitrator found."

Islamic Schools Test British Principle Of Integration. The New York Times (10/15, Cowell, 1.21M) reports on Islamic schools operating in Britain, "The visible differences -- the way female teenagers wear the full-length dress and head-covering and the boys wear black robes and skullcaps -- play into a ferocious debate about the sense of separateness or readiness to integrate Britain's estimated 1.8 million Muslims, about 3 percent of the population." The Times writes, "Only 7 Islamic schools receive public financing, compared with 36 Jewish schools, and about 7,000 Christian schools. The parents of just 3 percent of Muslim students enroll them in Islamic schools, where the education is generally rigorous and there is a code to nurture their Islamic identity, shield them from discrimination and provide moral guidance." However, some analysts express "fear that a premium on cultural separateness has Britain 'sleepwalking into segregation.'" One Islamic principal says that "students from Islamic schools…were not associated with either the religious and racial riots in northern England in the early 2000's or in any of the recent terrorism conspiracies," but police say that in heavily Muslim Leicester "they rounded up what they called an Al Qaeda cell" in 2002.

Hyde Park Visitors Discuss Islam. The Washington Post (10/15, A14, Corner, 748K) reports on a typical day at Speakers' Corner in Hyde Park, "The hot topics on this day were immigration in general and Muslim immigrants in particular." One woman asks Muslim women why they wear hijabs and has heard "heard answers ranging from 'I am happy to wear it' to 'It's the way of my husband.'"

PATRIOT ACT:

Ashcroft Claims ACLU Benefits From Its Attacks On The Patriot Act. In a short interview with the New York Times Magazine (10/15, Solomon) former US Attorney General John Ashcroft answered a question regarding the Patriot Act by saying, "After years of misrepresentation and pillorying by a variety of groups like the A.C.L.U. that ended up making a lot of money by opposing it and developed a lot of membership by opposing it, its renewal passed by 89 votes in the Senate. … If you think they don't care about membership, I think that's a naïve understanding of the way politics works in America."

DOJ_NMG_0081382

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Former Sen. Daschle Calls For Action In Anthrax Case. In a commentary for the Washington Post (10/15, B7, 748K), former Sen. Tom Daschle recalls the anthrax mailings that targeted his office and killed five people elsewhere. He points up four areas for improvement: "We ought to use this fifth anniversary of the attack to rededicate ourselves to solving the crime and ensuring that we are better prepared to confront similar attacks. First, the FBI and the Justice Department must treat this investigation with urgency. ... Second, the Sept. 11 commission called for the creation of an FBI national security workforce and for a recalibration of the FBI mission -- from sole concentration on its criminal justice mission and toward increased focus on national security. ... Third, progress on the investigation and needed reforms are hindered by a lack of congressional oversight. ... Finally, there has been precious little reform of our public health infrastructure to ensure that we are prepared for future terrorist attacks and health emergencies."

WAR NEWS:

Bush's Justification For War Seen As Evolving. The AP (10/15, Raum) reports, "President Bush keeps revising his explanation for why the U.S. is in Iraq, moving from narrow military objectives at first to history-of-civilization stakes now. ... 3 1/2 years later, with no weapons found, still no end in sight and the war a liability for nearly all Republicans on the ballot Nov. 7, the justification has become far broader and now includes the expansive 'struggle between good and evil.'" Brookings pundit Michael O'Hanlon said that the "shifting rationales" each had "some validity"; however, he added, "The problem is they can't change the realities on the ground in Iraq, which is that we're in the process of beginning to lose." The negative AP piece calls recent events "dispiriting" and contends, "The more ominous and determined his words, the more skeptical the American public appears."

26 Iraqis Dead After Revenge Killing Spree. The New York Times (10/15, Lou, Mizher, 1.21M) reports that Balad, "a rural Shiite town northwest of" Baghdad "exploded in sectarian reprisals on Saturday as angry residents, many roving the streets in armed packs on the backs of pickup trucks, killed at least 26 people from a nearby Sunni village" of Dhuluiya, following the discovery of "14 Shiite construction workers…beheaded bodies…in an orchard in Dhuluiya. The workers, from Balad, had been kidnapped. Hamad al-Qaisi, governor of Salahuddin Province, which includes both towns, met with "tribal sheiks to urge restraint. He said he exacted their promises to do what they could." He also "has asked the American military to help him impose order."

The Washington Post (10/15, A14, Knickmeyer, Aldin, 748K) adds that medical workers, residents, police and militia leaders said many of the dead were "brought to a hospital bearing the marks of electric drills and other signs of torture." According to Shiite leaders in Balad, "they responded to the farmworkers' killings by asking a Baghdad office of Moqtada al-Sadr, an influential Shiite cleric, to send militiamen and weapons." During the night "reinforcements from the Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry arrived and residents cowered in their homes." This "fighting in the Tigris River towns served as a microcosm of the Shiite-Sunni killing that has increased dramatically this year."

The AP (10/15, Bodeen) reports that, besides the 26 Sunni Arabs' deaths, "the U.S. military, meanwhile, reported the deaths of a Marine and four soldiers." Sectarian fighting "has killed 43 people so far in Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad."

US Military Works To Prepare Iraqis To Take Control Of Security. NBC Nightly News (10/14, story 3, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported that "in Baqouba, the Iraqi army is taking on increased responsibility for security with American forces providing support." NBC (Arraf): "In a region ripped apart by sectarian violence they are fighting an uphill battle to make Iraqis trust them." Col. Brian Jones, Cmdr. 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team: "As the al Qaeda elements come in the extremists from the Sunni side, the extremists from the Shia side, are coming in to combat them. And so again spinning into a cycle that continues to build." Arraf: "Brigadier General Dana Petard oversees military training teams. As Iraqi troops take on more responsibility Americans are working with them make sure they don't take sides." Brigadier General Dana Petard: "Any mission the transition teams are on, there is no problems with sectarian violence on those missions." Arraf: "The officers planning the latest raid have reasons to want revenge. 'We call this operation "hunting rats,"' this captain says. Their battalion, Sunni and Shia, has lost 170 of its 700 men over the last two years. But Colonel Ibrahim Abid tells them to make sure their soldiers treat people with respect. ... It is a cycle of violence that could spiral out of control unless people are persuaded to turn to the Iraqi army for protection."

Shakeup Begins In Iraqi Police. The AP (10/14, Rising) reports, "Iraq's Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry, whose police forces have been accused of complicity in sectarian attacks, has fired 3,000 employees accused of corruption or rights abuses and will change top commanders, a spokesman said Saturday." The spokesman said "up to 600" of the fired employees will be prosecuted. The AP comments, "The Shiite-led national police force, controlled by the Interior Ministry, is widely accused of being infiltrated by Shiite militias blamed in slayings of Sunni Arabs. Critics say Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has been reluctant to move against the militias since many are linked to parties in his coalition. ... Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite slum of about 2 million where radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia draws much of its support, has been left alone, and U.S. commanders say they are waiting on the command from al-Maliki's government." The Washington Times publishes an abbreviated version of this article.

Al Qaeda In Iraq Calls "Insurgent Video" Fake. The AP (10/14) reports, "Al-Qaida in Iraq said Saturday that a recent video tape made by a man claiming to be an insurgent who called for the replacement of the head of the terrorist group was fabricated. ... On Friday, a man who said he was an Iraqi Islamic insurgent released a video tape urging Osama bin Laden to replace al-Qaida in Iraq's leader with an Iraqi national." The umbrella Mujahedeen Shura Council claimed that the false videotape "shows the great dilemma that the Crusaders' coalition is passing through in Iraq especially after the calls for withdrawal that were released by the British army," a reference to the statement by Gen. Richard Dannatt. About 35 sites carried this story.

Attacks On Journalists In Iraq Continue. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Smith, Rasheed, 918K) reports, "Gunmen killed a radio journalist and kidnapped a television reporter, Iraqi police said Saturday, continuing a spate of attacks that has killed 14 media employees in recent weeks." The continuing attacks "are raising concern that the groups responsible for Iraq's sectarian bloodletting are turning their attention to the news media." Most of the recent victims have worked for "relatively independent" organizations. The Times continues, "The Committee to Protect Journalists, based in New York, reported Friday that 85 journalists and 35 media support workers had been killed in Iraq since March 2003, making the war there the deadliest conflict for the media in the last 25 years."

Disfigured Iraqi Girl Receives Plastic Surgery At UCLA. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Streeter, 918K) reports in a 5,399-word article on the 9-year-old Iraqi Marwa Naim, who was disfigured by shrapnel in an explosion that killed her mother. The Times reports, "The Americans were invading Baghdad, and Marwa Naim blamed them. She would never forget the explosion." However, "the UCLA Medical Center and its chief of plastic surgery, Dr. Tim Miller, offered to restore her face -- for free. But if Americans had hurt her, could they be trusted to heal her?" The Times describes her months of multiple surgeries in America and her bittersweet return to an unstable Iraq: "She said that she was happy to be home but that she was rarely allowed to go outside, because of the violence."

Besieged Baghdadis Seek Inspiration In Billboards. The AP (10/14, Hendawi) reports, "Thousands of posters and billboards dot Baghdad with messages of hope for a city of gloom, where residents largely stay home, afraid of the streets, their pain and grief deepening every day amid unending violence. ... The images are in stark contrast to the blitz of upbeat street ads that filled the Iraqi capital in the two years after Saddam Hussein's ouster in 2003." Today's billboards "are an unusually blunt acknowledgment of just how grave conditions have become" in a society where "the use of images is a particularly important part of" public life."

The bleak article describes what Baghdadis now see in daily life: "On any given day, citizens step from their homes to see police trucks loaded with dead, blood-drenched corpses, the beheaded bodies of men snatched from their homes or workplace by gunmen in police uniforms, body parts strewn across a street or dangling from a roof in the wake of a bombing. ... Baghdad has an unemployment rate of a staggering 30 percent. Power outages are routine and last up to three days at a time. The price of gasoline has risen by as much as 12-fold since Saddam's ouster and fuel is often scarce." More than 40 sites carried this story.

Baghdadis Turn To "Doctor Phil" For Comfort. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Daragahi, 918K) reports, "Syndicated and subtitled versions of 'Dr. Phil' and 'The Oprah Winfrey Show' are growing popular throughout the Middle East. For Iraqis, they offer a window to a world in which people are more concerned with bedroom and workplace foibles than mortar rounds and death squads." The Times follows a 50-year-old Iraqi family man who "worries about the unspeakable" but "hopes 'Dr. Phil' can serve as a substitute social world for his children, who aren't able to spend time with friends, date, or even leave their home after dusk."

Lawyers Try To Free American Held In Iraq. The New York Times (10/15, Lewis, 1.21M) reports, "An American citizen who was tried in an Iraqi court on charges that he had assisted in the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists last year has been sentenced to death, along with five Iraqi co-defendants, a spokesman for the United States Embassy in Baghdad said Saturday." Mohammad Munaf's lawyers have argued "that his death sentence undermined one of the United States government's principal arguments for transferring him, namely that he would be in no danger of physical abuse in Iraqi custody." The DOJ has argued "Mr. Munaf was not actually in United States custody but was being held by a multinational force." The Times lists earlier cases in which judges have ruled against the military's claim that "an American [is] being held by a multinational force" rather than by the US military.

NATO Commander Shifts To More Aggressive Tactics In Face Of Attacks. The New York Times (10/15, Gall, 1.21M) reports on NATO commander Lt. Gen. David Richards's assessment of the war with the Taliban. He "talked like a peacekeeper" when he arrived in Afghanistan, but "was quickly forced to put many of those plans aside and engage in hard fighting, not least to show the insurgents, and the wavering local population, that his troops were a force to be reckoned with." Richards's troops "came under repeated attacks, both on patrol and at their bases, forcing NATO to call in air and artillery strikes that inevitably killed scores of the very civilians he was trying to win over. It was not exactly the hearts-and-minds strategy he had planned." However, he "says that about 10 percent of the population in the south may support the Taliban, that 20 percent are opposed to them, and that the rest are stuck in the middle."

Two NATO Soldiers Are Killed. The New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) reports, "NATO reported that two of its soldiers died in combat in Kandahar Province on Saturday, and a bomb struck a provincial governor's convoy east of Kabul, the capital, narrowly missing him, Afghan officials said."

Boston Globe Denounces Tillman "Coverup." The Boston Globe (10/15, 425K) editorializes, "Of the thousands of deaths, military and civilian, in the Afghanistan and Iraq wars, none so captures the mix of patriotism, impulsiveness, and dishonesty in the US mission as the shooting death of Pat Tillman by members of his own platoon. ... Tillman's life and death have come under a new spotlight as a result of a revealing 12,749-word article by Gary Smith in Sports Illustrated," which reveals that he "told a fellow soldier that he thought the war was '[expletive] illegal.' According to Smith, Tillman was looking forward after his discharge to having a friend arrange a meeting with Noam Chomsky." The Globe concludes, "If the inspector general does not provide a persuasive and public accounting of what occurred, Congress should do the job itself."

Sen. Kerry Critiques Conduct Of War In Woodward Interview. In the Washington Post (10/15, 748K), Sen. John Kerry gives a 2,538-word interview with Bob Woodward in which Kerry sharply criticizes the administration's conduct of the war. Kerry faults the administration for failing to install a "pretty extensive outreach effort" (consisting of "President George Herbert Walker Bush, President Jimmy Carter, President Bill Clinton ... President Ford, Brent Scowcroft, Zbig Brzezinski, Jim Baker, George Shultz") before starting the GWOT and for ignoring Secretary of State Powell's misgivings. He adds about Iraq, "[I]t wasn't really until three months before the war starts that Bush got involved in aftermath planning," and charges that the administration ignored the "fairly elaborate plan" drawn up by the State Department.

Kerry sharply criticizes Secretary Rumsfeld, expressing "incredulity" at "the notion that you have to send people to war simply because you put them there." He concludes, "I think history is going to be very, very tough on not just the way the war has been managed, but on the way in which the decision to go to war was carried out."

Former Ambassador Dennis Ross Proposes "Plan For Iraq." In a commentary for the Washington Post (10/15, 748K), former Middle East negotiator Dennis Ross proposes three steps: "First, it's time for the Bush administration to insist that a national reconciliation conference be held and not be disbanded until agreement is reached on amendments to the constitution. ... Second, a long-discussed regional conference with all of Iraq's neighbors should be held. ... While Iraq's neighbors may agree on little else, the common interest of wanting to avoid an all-out civil war in Iraq could create a basis for a general set of understandings on what they will and will not do to help foster stability there. ... Third, President Bush should inform Maliki that we will not impose a deadline for withdrawal but we are going to negotiate with his government a timetable for our departure."

Lawyer Suggests More Advisors, Less Force In Iraq. In a commentary for the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M), lawyer and former "embedded advisor" Philip Carter writes, "When I finally left Baquba, the violent capital of Iraq's Diyala Province, I found myself questioning many aspects of our mission and our accomplishments, both in a personal search for meaning and a quest to gather lessons that might help those soldiers who will follow me." Carter worked "to build the provincial police so they could provide security and the rule of law." After his experiences, he warns, "This is the central paradox of the Iraq war in fall 2006: we are making progress in developing the Iraqi Army and police, yet the violence gripping the country continues to worsen. ... Given Iraq's historic antipathy to invaders and the strength of today's insurgency, I believe only a wholly unconventional approach will work. This means many more embedded advisers like myself, working in tandem with teams from the State Department and other agencies, supported by combat forces only when force is necessary."

Book Reviews Focus On Conduct Of Iraq War. In the Washington Post Book World (10/15), British journalist Martin Kettle writes of Hubris, "This [book], however, pulls together with unusually shocking clarity the multiple failures of process and statecraft that led so many people to persuade themselves that the evidence pointed to an active Iraqi program to develop weapons of mass destruction and that it was in the interests of the United States to overthrow Saddam Hussein."

New Biography Of Powell Portrays Him As "Loyal To A Fault." In a review for the Washington Post Book World (10/15), journalist George Packer discusses the new Colin Powell biography Soldier. Packer calls Powell "an uncommonly decent man, a stellar product of great American institutions. But when those institutions failed -- when the Bush administration took the country to war in Iraq, rashly and under false pretexts -- Powell did not have the imagination to challenge or, finally, defy the system that had made him." Secretary Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney are called "more intellectually aggressive" and "far more ruthless" than Powell in the run-up to war.

NYPost Review Praises New Book About Fallujah Retaking. In the New York Post (10/15, 608K), former Special Forces Lt. Col. Gordon Cucullu says of We Were One by Patrick O'Donnell, "With unprecedented initiative Patrick K. O'Donnell volunteered to live and fight alongside American soldiers and Marines in Iraq in order to construct a real-time, eyewitness history of the fighting." O'Donnell focuses on the Second Battle of Fallujah and puts a "human face on the troops who are fighting against some of the fiercest enemies America has ever encountered."

NYPost Review Praises New Max Boot Book. In the New York Post (10/15, 608K), columnist Ralph Peters says of War Made New: Technology, Warfare and the Course of History, 1500 To Today that it is "worth every penny. It's not only a terrific read; it's a cheap education on how, for half a millennium, machines made war and war made machines." However, Peters faults Boot for being "reluctant to burn bridges to establishment figures. Despite his fateful errors in Iraq, Donald Rumsfeld slips from the author's hands like a cobra covered in K-Y Jelly, eluding criticism."

Advocate Calls For VA To Better Plan To Handle Iraq, Afghanistan Veterans' Claims. CNN's This Week At War (10/14, 7:44 p.m., Roberts) recaps an earlier report by Sanjay Gupta about the demands that returning veterans put on the VA healthcare system. CNN then interviews Paul Sullivan of Veterans for America, who says VA faces a "crisis." Sullivan: "They have Vietnam veterans coming, still filing claims from the Vietnam war, veterans coming in an defiling claims from the Gulf War, and now we have returning Afghanistan and Iraq veterans to the tune of hundreds of thousands." Sullivan estimates this could result in 400,000 to 700,000 veterans seeking VA healthcare and benefits. Invited by the CNN interviewer, Sullivan drew a comparison to Vietnam veterans, saying veterans may file claims that aren't immediately obvious and develop over years. Sullivan says, "Right now, VA has a window of opportunity. They have no plan to address this huge tidal wave of veterans coming back and congress and the Department of Veterans affairs need to act now: Develop a plan, collect some data," and "find out how much this is going to cost taxpayers."

Morford Takes Over As Interim US Attorney In Nashville. The Nashville City Paper (10/15, Allen) reports, "Just before he left office, Jim Vines, who recently stepped down as Nashville's U.S. Attorney, said one of his greatest accomplishments was building up the Nashville office to a point where it could handle another Tennessee Waltz-type investigation. … 'Even though it centered around the legislature, it had to be handled out of the Memphis office,' Vines said last month in an interview with The City Paper, explaining that when the investigation into corruption at the Capitol began, the Nashville office was simply not up to the task of leading it. … 'But if we were to have another ethics scandal, we could do it here now,' Vines said. … So it seems fitting that after Vines' exit, the man selected to replace him – at least in the interim – is credited with cleaning up what was formerly the single most corrupt city is the United States: Youngstown, Ohio." The City Paper continues, "Youngstown is the hometown of former U.S. Rep James Traficant, who was indicted on federal corruption charges in 2002 and sentenced to eight years in prison. … For decades, most of Youngstown's local leaders were controlled by mafia bosses, who routinely blew up one another with car bombs. … That was until a U.S. attorney named Craig S. Morford arrived in Cleveland." The City Paper adds, "Over a period of five years, Morford investigated, prosecuted and convicted 70 individuals, including mob bosses, the county sheriff, county prosecutor, a nearby police chief, four judges and 10 attorneys. … Two weeks ago, the U.S. Department of Justice named Morford to head up the Nashville U.S. Attorney's Office. … The appointment is temporary for now – Morford's family is staying in Cleveland for the time being – but the career prosecutor, armed with decades of experience in high-profile cases, is already diving into his job in Nashville. … And he is prepared to lead the office in whatever direction it needs to go."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Options Probe Tarnishes Finance Jobs. The San Francisco Chronicle (10/15, D - 1, Said) reports, "Headhunter Larry Ormsby was seeking a new chief financial officer for a Silicon Valley company recently. Then news cropped up that one of his candidates had big black mark on his resume: The company where he had previously been CFO was implicated in the stock options backdating scandal now grabbing headlines. … 'That was enough for us to say, "Let's not pursue this person,"' said Ormsby, senior client partner at Korn/Ferry International in San Francisco specializing in CFO and other senior finance positions. 'Clients aren't comfortable making a hire when there is some gray area of uncertainty about what happened' at a candidate's previous jobs." The Chronicle continues, "People caught up in probes over improper backdating of stock options may have bigger worries than their next job. But recruitment experts and others say the scandal may tarnish the careers of those in decision-making positions at the companies being investigated, regardless of whether they are ever charged with a crime. … About 125 companies, nearly a quarter of them in Silicon Valley, are facing probes over whether they improperly granted stock options that were retroactively linked to dates when their stock price was low, thus giving recipients a leg up on potential profits. Such backdating is illegal unless it is disclosed and accounted for properly -- something that many companies evidently failed to do." The Chronicle adds, "Investigators from the Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and the companies themselves are sifting through documents to try to figure out who did what when. … About 30 executives and board members have gotten the ax over their involvement in backdating, but experts expect the toll to rise as companies finalize investigations of themselves. Only two cases so far have resulted in criminal charges being filed."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Mehlman Allegedly Ordered State Dept. Official's Ouster At Abramoff's Behest. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Wallsten, 918K) in an article titled, "Displease A Lobbyist, Get Fired," reports, "For five years, Allen Stayman wondered who ordered his removal from a State Department job negotiating agreements with tiny Pacific island nations -- even when his own bosses wanted him to stay. Now he knows. Newly disclosed e-mails suggest that the ax fell after intervention by one of the highest officials at the White House: Ken Mehlman, on behalf of one of the most influential lobbyists in town, Jack Abramoff. The e-mails show that Abramoff, whose client list included the Northern Mariana Islands, had long opposed Stayman's work advocating labor changes in that U.S. commonwealth, and considered what his lobbying team called the 'Stayman project' a high priority." According to the Times, "The latest revelations provide more detail than the Bush administration has acknowledged about how Abramoff and his team reached into high levels of the White House, not just Capitol Hill, which has been the main focus of the influence-peddling investigation. The e-mails, disclosed as part of a report by the House Government Reform Committee, show how Abramoff manipulated the system through officials such as Mehlman." The Times notes Mehlman "said he did not recall the details of his contacts with the Abramoff team, including discussions about Stayman."

Weldon Was Unaware Of FBI Corruption Investigation. The AP (10/15, Hefling, Jordan) reports on the active FBI investigation of Rep. Curt Weldon regarding whether he "used his influence to secure lobbying and consulting contracts for his daughter," Karen Weldon. The AP notes that Weldon's chief of staff, Russ Caso, "said Saturday no one had notified him of an investigation. … Caso said Weldon and his staff were '100 percent caught off guard' when they learned of the investigation, first reported late Friday by McClatchy Newspapers." The AP adds, "Two people familiar with the investigation told the AP on Saturday that the inquiry was being handled by agents from the FBI's field offices in Washington and Philadelphia and was being coordinated by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section."

Police Chiefs Blame Rise In Violent Crime On Federal Focus On Homeland Security. NBC Nightly News (10/14, story 5, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Iowa tonight authorities are investigating the death of a family of five, in an unrelated case a family of four was found murdered Friday along the Florida turnpike. Examples of a growing trend in this country, violent crime on the rise." NBC (Williams): "Many police chiefs claim the Federal government has put so much emphasis on homeland security it is neglecting crime on the street."

Web Gambling Sites Continue Advertising Despite Crackdown. The AP (10/15, Caruso) reports, "Despite repeated warnings from law enforcement officials, offshore Internet gambling companies have continued to advertise heavily in the United States." The AP continues, "Giant billboards in Manhattan, some several stories high, brazenly advertise Internet gambling sites like Sportsbook.com, now based in Antigua. … Promotions for BetUS, a Canadian and Costa Rican company that takes wagers on American sports, run regularly on the Howard Stern Show on Sirius Satellite Radio. Fantasy football magazines on sale at newsstands are packed with ads for online bookies and casinos." The AP adds, "The advertisements -- which the companies insist are legal -- have helped attract millions of customers to online gambling, and may have left the impression that both the ads and online wagering are legal. … They are not, said Paul Larrabee, a spokesman for New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. … 'Gaming and bookmaking are not legal in New York, so anyone who markets to a New Yorker may be in violation of New York state law,' Larrabee said. 'We have done case after case after case involving instances where an act that is illegal in New York is marketed to New Yorkers.' … Actual prosecutions of advertisers for promoting gambling are rare, however, and media companies accepting the ads insist they are breaking no law. … That position sometimes hangs on a looser interpretation of gambling laws. … ESPN, for example, runs ads for online poker sites during its broadcasts of the Word Series of Poker, but says it does so only for Web pages that don't actually process bets. … 'We only accept advertising for educational, learn-to-play, for-free sites,' said ESPN spokeswoman Keri Potts. … Many of these so-called 'educational' sites, however, are simply companion pages to full-fledged gambling operations, easily reachable with a few mouse clicks or by changing the last few characters of a Web address from '.net' to '.com.' … Potts said it wasn't up to ESPN to investigate those affiliations. … The Justice Department has taken a different view. In 2003 it warned that publishers and broadcasters who advertise gambling sites could be prosecuted for aiding and abetting a crime. … A year later, federal authorities pressured the parent company of the Discovery Channel into forfeiting $6 million in advertising money that had come from online poker sites."

Web Data Controls Seen As Lacking. The AP (10/15) reports, "If you don't like what your favorite Internet search engine or e-commerce site does with information it collects about you, your options are limited to living with it or logging off." The AP continues, "Major search engines, for instance, all keep records of your searches for weeks, months or even years, often tied to your computer's Internet address or more. Retailers, meanwhile, generally presume the right to send marketing e-mails. … Although online companies have become better at disclosing data practices, privacy advocates say the services' stated policies generally don't give consumers real choice. … 'None of them have gotten to the point of giving a lot of controls in users' hands,' said Ari Schwartz, deputy director of the technology watchdog group Center for Democracy and Technology. Privacy policies 'are about notice ... not about control.'" The AP adds, "Recent developments - from companies losing laptops containing sensitive data to Time Warner Inc.'s AOL releasing customers' search terms - have again turned the spotlight on Internet privacy. … But the push for stronger federal protections is countered by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' desire to require Internet providers preserve customer records to help prosecutors fight child pornography. Officials have released few details, though they say any proposal would keep the data in company hands until the government seeks a subpoena or other lawful process." The AP notes, "Federal law already limits how personal financial and health care data may be used, but U.S. privacy laws are generally considered weak compared with Europe and Canada. … Industry groups have stepped in with guidelines that go beyond legal requirements."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

San Francisco Behind Schedule For Police-Conduct Plan. The San Francisco Chronicle (10/15, A-1, Sward) reports, "Eight months after Mayor Gavin Newsom vowed to ride 'roughshod' over the Police Department to ensure adoption of a computerized system to track officers' use of force and other conduct, the plan has yet to be submitted to the Police Commission for a vote." The Chronicle continues, "In a February interview, after The Chronicle reported on use of force by San Francisco officers, Newsom said he wanted such a system adopted by the end of the year and added the move was 'in the best interest of the department in terms of public confidence and a kind of respect we are hoping to build again ...' … Since then, negotiations over the system's details have not led to a formal agreement by the participants, which include the department, the American Civil Liberties Union and the Police Officers Association." The Chronicle adds, "The proposal, which involves complex technology, has yet to be put out to bid, and the department -- rather than talking about having the system in place by year's end as the mayor pledged -- is now saying it plans to have a pilot program operating before the year is over. … Deputy Police Chief Charles Keohane said the proposed tracking system will soon be presented to the department's command staff and then will be forwarded to the Police Officers Association, which has "meet and confer" rights on any such change. … A series of articles in The Chronicle in February reported that about 100 San Francisco officers were responsible for a quarter of the incidents of force logged by the 2,100-officer department from 1996-2004, and that in recent years San Francisco officers had more force allegations filed against them than those in San Jose, Oakland, San Diego and Seattle combined. … The series also found that the department did not have an effective, computerized system for tracking the performance of officers and often failed to intervene with officers who reported using force much more than their peers."

Louisiana Community Continues Dialogue After Racial Bus Incident. The Shreveport (LA) Times (10/15, Welborn) reports, "A second community forum held Saturday (in Coushatta, LA) in response to an August incident in which nine black children allege they were seated at the back of a school bus because of their race drew a much smaller but no less interested crowd." The Times continues, "About 50 people gathered in Springville Baptist Church, compared to the 200 or so that crowded inside Will of God Ministries in early September for the first public forum. Only a sprinkling of adults indicated Saturday they did not attend last month's session. … Not in attendance were the parents or the children at the center of issue that has gained worldwide attention. But they were represented by Patricia Wilson-Sessoms and her mother, Coushatta councilwoman Rosetta Wilson, both of whom are related to three of the children." The Times adds, "Sessoms said she wished more had attended Saturday, but she realizes there were many events going on in Coushatta and other communities that likely drew people away. Still, she's pleased that the community dialogue is continuing and she looks forward to the next step in the process that is being led by Carmelita Pope Freeman, southwest regional director of the Justice Department's Community Relations Service. … Within the next few weeks, Sessoms and others will build teams that will act as negotiators in a meeting with the school system's negotiators." The Times notes, "More than bus seating is drawing comments from the public. Hiring practices, teacher certification, discipline, pupil-teacher ratios, testing and much more have been listed as concerns when it comes to the Red River Parish school system. … But it was the bus situation that has gained the most attention. The nine children complained at the beginning of school in mid August that their white bus driver, Deloris Davis, made them give up their seats to the white children. After the children's mothers filed racial discrimination complaints with the school system, Davis made new seating assignments but still put the children at the rear of the bus on two seats."

Farmers Collect Multiple Forms Of Federal Aid For Single Disaster. As part of a series titled, "Harvesting Cash: Double-Dipping When Disaster Strikes," the Washington Post (10/15, A1, Gaul, Morgan, Cohen, 748K), in a front-page article titled, "Aid Is A Bumper Crop For Farmers," reports that "shortly after passing the Agricultural Risk Protection Act" in 2008, Congress "lost its fiscal will. One week before the presidential election, it passed a new $1.8 billion disaster bill to assist farmers hurt by bad weather. Two others followed in subsequent years, totaling more than $6 billion. Today, after a searing drought in the Plains, farm-state legislators are pushing for billions more in aid. The result is that farmers often get paid twice by the government for the same disaster, once in subsidized insurance and then again in disaster assistance, a legal but controversial form of double-dipping, a Washington Post investigation found."

In a related article the Washington Post (10/15, Gaul, 748K) profiles a farmer in North Carolina who received $4.7 million in federal disaster payments between 2001 and 2005. In another related piece, the Washington Post (10/15, Gaul, Cohen, 748K) reports, "There is an alternative to giving struggling farmers emergency disaster aid after every drought, hurricane and storm. … They can take out federally subsidized low-interest loans up to $500,000 for each disaster they experience. But the farmers tend to pass up the emergency loans in favor of the emergency cash."

Federal Aid Rules Said To Influence Crop Decisions. The Washington Post (10/15, A13, Gaul, 748K) reports, "Crop insurance helps to protect farmers against the vagaries of weather. But it can also alter the landscape of farming in a region, resulting in higher losses for taxpayers. Consider the lowly sweet potato. For years, it was excluded from federal crop insurance. But in the late 1990s, growers and legislators in North Carolina successfully lobbied federal officials for coverage. Soon, the number of acres planted with sweet potatoes was doubling and tripling, as were the claims filed by farmers."

Government Programs Bring Fresh Produce To Urban Areas. The Washington Post (10/15, A3, Goldstein, 748K) reports on "a new strategy for social change: a government campaign to bring supermarkets stocked with healthful food into neglected inner-city neighborhoods to improve public health. The Pennsylvania Fresh Food Financing Initiative, leveraging $30 million in state money with $90 million in private funds, is the most ambitious of a spate of state and local projects around the country. They represent a different model for public nutrition programs, which have relied since the 1960s on federal subsidies, such as food stamps and WIC."

CMS Genetic Testing Rules Considered Inadequate. The Washington Times (10/15, Price, 88K) reports, "Some scientists and consumer health groups are angry that the U.S. Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) has decided not to write new rules designed to improve the quality of laboratories that perform genetic testing, keeping in place current guidelines. … Late last month, the Genetics and Public Policy Center -- along with the Genetic Alliance and the Public Citizen Health Research Group -- filed a petition with CMS demanding the agency create a 'genetic testing specialty' under the provisions of the Clinical Laboratories Improvement Amendments (CLIA) of 1988, which CMS administers. The groups argued that additional regulation was necessary to ensure high-quality genetic test results, which they say are now used to diagnose more than 900 diseases."

Faith Community Taking More Activist Stance Against Global Warming. The New York Times (10/15, Banerjee, 1.21M) reports, "Over the last year, religious activism on global warming has won much attention. Last February, 86 evangelical Christian leaders backed an initiative to combat global warming, a move that broke the evangelical movement's broad silence on the issue but exposed stark divisions." This month, 4,000 congregations of various faiths will show films on global warming, including 'An Inconvenient Truth.' [On Oct. 8, Christian, Muslim, Jewish and Buddhist leaders met in Philadelphia to discuss global warming.]" And "Greg Wickersham, a high school teacher and a member of the environmental ministry at Intown Community Church in Atlanta, which is affiliated with the theologically conservative Presbyterian Church in America, says, 'If you do worship the Creator, you take care of his creation.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Cartel Informant Lashes Out At US. The Dallas Morning News (10/15, Corchado) reports, "A former informant whose participation in drug-related murders in Mexico caused turmoil in the U.S. agency that paid him says that there were more killings than reported and that drug corruption extends into the U.S. and Mexican governments." The News continues, "In sworn testimony and in response to questions submitted through his attorney, Guillérmo Eduardo Ramírez Peyro, the man known as 'Lalo,' provided new details about his work as a drug cartel operative and as a U.S. government informant, and he claimed to have personal knowledge of extensive government corruption." The News adds, "Mr. Ramírez also lashed out at his former U.S. employers, saying they are turning their backs on him after he helped them apprehend dozens of drug traffickers. … 'With the names I provided they were able to arrest more than 50 people, and they took millions of dollars from drug proceeds from U.S. streets,' he said. 'In spite of that, I'm jailed here without any protection and without any guarantee that I will stay in the United States.'" The News notes, "Mr. Ramírez, 35, is being held by the U.S. government at an undisclosed location in the Midwest, fighting deportation to Mexico, where he insists he faces 'certain death.' … U.S. authorities characterize him as a renegade informant whose independent actions led, in part, to the August 2004 killing of an El Paso man, Abraham Guzmán, outside a hamburger restaurant in that border city. … Mr. Ramírez made his remarks in a written response to questions submitted through his attorney, Jodi Goodwin. He had agreed to speak with reporters from The Dallas Morning News, which first reported about his role in the cartel killings in March 2004; the Mexico city weekly magazine Proceso; the London Observer; and Narco News, an Internet blog, but prison officials transferred him hours before the scheduled interview."

IMMIGRATION:

Newspapers Seek Data On Immigrant Convicts. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/15, Carr) reports, "A federal court of appeals hears oral arguments Tuesday in a case that has broad implications in the debate over illegal immigration and the public's right to know about illegal immigrant convicts who have not been deported as required by law." The AJC continues, "Cox Newspapers is asserting in its appeal that the Justice Department should release the names, birthdates and identity numbers of illegal immigrants who have served prison time for serious crimes, including child molestation, manslaughter, drug dealing and drunken driving. … Cox, which includes The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, revealed in a published report four years ago that hundreds of felons were never picked up in Georgia by immigration officials after serving their sentences." The AJC adds, "The Justice Department says that it has turned over some of the information requested by Cox under the Freedom of Information Act, which requires federal agencies to disclose government records to the public. The department gave Cox information about the illegal immigrants, including convicts' native country, date taken into custody and date of release, according to legal briefs filed in federal court. … But divulging personally identifiable information such as their full name, date of birth, alien registration number and FBI number would invade the privacy of convicted illegal immigrants and serve no public interest, Justice Department lawyers wrote in legal briefs." The AJC notes, "The case raises the question of whether illegal immigrants should be granted the same privacy protections that citizens and legal residents have in the Freedom of Information Act. … The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that privacy protections extend to personally identifying information and they encompass criminal convictions that are a matter of public record, Justice Department lawyers wrote in a legal brief."

GOP's Split Over Immigration Said To Be Most Evident In Arizona. In a extensive 8,279-word piece for the New York Times Magazine (10/15) Joseph Lelyveld writes, "In Arizona, it becomes evident, the battle over illegal immigration is, in one of its dimensions, a battle over the future of the Republican Party in the state and, because of [Sen. John] McCain's ambitions, nationally as well. It also becomes evident that what anti-immigrant zealots call an 'invasion' is taking place not in spite of federal policies but, at least in Arizona, partly because of them." Lelyvel asks, "how come, if the issue of illegal immigration is the House majority's ticket to remaining in power, its own creature, the National Republican Campaign Committee, was spending money in the Republican primary held last month to defeat…a down-the-line, seal-the-border, anti-immigrant crusader named Randy Graf, in the one House race in Arizona in which a seat was clearly up for grabs? A self-proclaimed Minuteman, running in the Eighth Congressional District…Graf was leading in polls of likely primary voters. Yet the smart money in both parties seemed to be betting that a Graf victory would guarantee that the seat, Republican for the last 22 years, would swing Democratic. So while national parties normally steer clear of local primaries…out-of-state Republican money was flowing in the Eighth to a moderate with a 'common sense' approach to immigration issues not unlike John McCain's, while national Democratic money, in a peculiar twist, was paying for ads portraying that same moderate as a wimp on illegals, in hopes of putting the supposedly beatable Randy Graf over the top in the other party's primary."

Hispanic Immigrants Drive US Population To 300 Million. The Washington Times (10/15, Price, 88K) reports the U.S. Census Bureau "says it expects the nation's population to reach 300 million on Tuesday, 39 years after the 200 million mark was reached and 91 years after the county's population hit 100 million." The Times goes on to report that the primary engine of population growth in the US has been the influx of Hispanic immigrants. According to the Times, "The first effort to count them came in the 1970 census, which found a total U.S. population of 203 million and 9.6 million Hispanics. There are about 43 million Hispanics in the country today, according to the Census Bureau." By 2050 Hispanics "will account for about a quarter of the U.S. population."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Dedicates Air Force Memorial. NBC Nightly News (10/14, story 8, 2:00, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Unlike the Army, Navy and the Marines, the Air Force has not had a memorial to its veterans near our nation's capital. That changed today on a hilltop in Arlington, Virginia, when President Bush dedicated a striking monument to the men and women of the youngest branch of the military." He "honored the 54,000 men and women of the Air Force who died in combat." Bush: "To all that climbed and chased the shouting wind America stops to say your service and sacrifice will be remembered forever." Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld: "We commemorate the aviators who captured our country's imagination and proved critical to the defense of our nation time and again." Siegenthaler: "With the nation again at war, veterans say they hope it inspires future generations to serve." Unidentified: "Most people out here come and immediately get it. They understand what the memorial is all about."

Noting Bush's reference to the war against terrorism both the AP and the Washington Times (10/15, Emerling, 88K) quote Bush saying, "And looking from this promontory to a place once filled with smoke and flames, we remember why we need them."

The AP (10/15, Loven) reports, "President Bush helped the Air Force make a dream come true on Saturday, dedicating a hilltop monument for the service to the memory of airmen lost defending America and to those that fight for it still." Bush said, "To all who have climbed sunward and chased the shouting wind, America stops to say your service and sacrifice will be remembered forever and honored in this place by the citizens of a free and grateful nation."

In its metro section the Washington Post (10/15, C11, Shapira, 748K) focuses on the experience of veterans at the ceremony and only mentions that Bush and Rumsfled made speeches as "hundreds of VIPs joined current and retired Air Force brass underneath the dizzying monument."

Despite Public Support For Son, Aides To Bush's Father Say Discord A Reality. The New York Daily News (10/15, DeFrank, 729K) reports, "At this month's christening of the nuclear aircraft carrier bearing his name, former President George H.W. Bush delivered a rousing endorsement of his son. 'I am very proud of our President,' the elder Bush said in rain-swept ceremonies in Newport News, Va. 'I support him in every single way with every fiber in my body.'" However, "Many of his closest former aides beg to differ. Indeed, one of the worst-kept secrets in Bush World is the dismay, in some cases disdain, harbored by many senior aides of the former President toward the administration of his son -- 41 and 43." The Daily News continues, "As the war in Iraq has worsened and public support for the current administration has tanked, loyalists of the elder Bush have found it impossible to suppress their disillusionment -- particularly their belief that many of 43's policies are a stick in the eye of his father." One "key member of 41's team said, 'Forty-three has now repudiated everything 41 stands for, and still he won't say a word. Personally, I think he's dying inside.'"

Increase In Uninsured Children Coincides With Bush's Years In Office. The Los Angeles Times' Ronald Brownstein (10/15) writes, "Until recently, children had been a bright spot in a dismal healthcare picture. Since President Bush took office, the total number of people in America without insurance has jumped from 39.8 million in 2000 to more than 46.5 million in 2005. The percentage of people receiving healthcare through their employer has dropped every year since 2000. Children haven't been immune to that trend. The share of children receiving healthcare through their parents' employer has also been falling. But until last year, government had stepped in to offset those losses." In 2005, "with state budgets squeezed, the number of children receiving insurance from public programs also fell. These twin retrenchments produced a jump of nearly 400,000 in the number of uninsured children -- the largest annual increase since 1995."

Bush Seen As Taking More Aggressive Stance On Issues As Elections Approach. Julie Mason in her "White House Watch" column in the Houston Chronicle (10/15, 535K) reports, "With the Republican political message galloping out of his control in the final weeks of the congressional campaign, President Bush tried corralling it last week with a news conference in the Rose Garden" which was noteworthy because "Bush has been using a different speaking style lately, with more angry-sounding, often highly partisan rhetoric and stronger body language." Bush "grips the podium, jabs a finger and raises his voice. He squares his shoulders, mocking Democrats and scoffing at critics of his policies." He is "in full-throttle campaign mode" because if he "can't lead his party to another majority in the House and Senate, his domestic agenda may wind up as scraps of forgotten rhetoric. He could also face stronger and more effective resistance to his Iraq policy."

Man Arrested After Jumping White House Fence. The AP (10/15) reports, "The Secret Service on Saturday apprehended a man who climbed over the fence along the North Lawn of the White House. Around 6:30 p.m. EDT, Alexis Janicki, 24, jumped the fence, said Secret Service spokeswoman Kim Bruce. He was immediately apprehended by the Secret Service uniformed division and taken into custody." He "was charged with trespassing and possession of a controlled substance, which was cannabis … President Bush was at the presidential retreat at Camp David in Maryland when the incident occurred."

OTHER NEWS:

Low Gas Prices Boost Economy But Expert Warns Prices Could Increase Sharply. NBC Nightly News (10/14, story 10, 2:20, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The continuing fall of gasoline prices is fueling record highs in the stock market, and raising consumer confidence. The monthly consumer survey is at its highest point in more than a year as the prices at the pump slid for the eighth straight week. The national average stands at $2.24 a gallon." Energy analyst John Kilduff: "The collapse in prices we are experiencing is unprecedented. We have never seen it go from being so valuable to be so unvaluable in relation to crude oil. Still looking for prices on a national average to break $2.00. Really none of our worst fears materialized." But Kilduff noted the US has "a huge vulnerability because a lot of the crude oil we rely on is in countries and places that are unfriendly towards the US" and that the US is "merely a headline or two away from $70 or $80 oil again."

OPEC To Consider Voluntary Supply Cuts. The New York Times/Bloomberg (10/15) reports that OPEC "will hold an emergency meeting in Doha, Qatar, on Oct. 19 to discuss a 1 million barrel-a-day output cut, an OPEC delegate said." They will "discuss a voluntary supply cut aimed at reviving oil prices that have fallen by a quarter in the last three months. Members will debate whether to cut actual production or to lower the cartel's 28 million barrel-a-day output quota."

Competition Fails To Lead To Decrease In Electricity Utility Rates. The New York Times (10/15, Johnston, 1.21M) reports, "A decade after competition was introduced in their industries, long-distance phone rates had fallen by half, air fares by more than a fourth and trucking rates by a fourth. But a decade after the federal government opened the business of generating electricity to competition, the market has produced no such decline." The Times notes, "Instead, more rate increase requests are pending now than ever before, said Jim Owen, a spokesman for the Edison Electric Institute, the association for the investor-owned utilities that provide about 60 percent of the nation's power. … The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and other federal agencies warn in a draft report to Congress that 'customers may experience rate shock' as utilities seek to make up for revenue they did not collect during the period of artificially reduced prices and to cover higher costs of fuel. They warned that 'this rate shock can create public pressure' to turn back from electricity prices set by the market to prices set by government regulators."

Recent Decline In Workers' Wages And Benefits Compared To Rise In 1990s. Eduardo Porter in an "Economic View" article in the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) states, "Five years into a relatively robust economic expansion, it's understandable that many American workers feel that they are not getting their fair share of the pie." It's because "the share of the economy devoted to workers' wages and benefits has eroded in the United States over the last five years. But if it's any consolation, the trend for workers in other rich industrial nations isn't much better." According to the Bureau of Economic Analysis workers' wages and benefits "declined 2.5 percentage points from 2000 to 2005, to 56.5 percent of" GDP. That's in contrast to the late 1990s "when robust growth bolstered employment and increased labor's bargaining power. Workers' share of the economy grew 2.3 percentage points from 1995 to 2000."

Federal Reserve May Postpone Interest Rate Cut Over Concern About Inflation. Conrad De Aenlle in a "Market Week" article in the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) writes, "Just when it looked as though a Federal Reserve interest-rate cut might be on the way, the Fed sent a message to Wall Street: not so fast. That, at least, was the way many traders interpreted the record, released last week, of the last meeting of the central bank's policy makers. It revealed that the policy makers continue to be concerned about inflation. That concern had been largely lifted in the minds of traders, but the Fed's statement is likely to revive it, especially this week, when reports are due on September wholesale and retail prices."

Bush And Rove's Optimism About Midterms Described As A "Self-Delusion." The Washington Post (10/15, A4, Abramowitz, 748K), in an article titled "White House Upbeat About GOP Prospects: Self-Assurance of Bush, Rove and Others Is Not Shared by Many in the Party," reports, "Amid widespread panic in the Republican establishment about the coming midterm elections, there are two people whose confidence about GOP prospects strikes even their closest allies as almost inexplicably upbeat: President Bush and his top political adviser, Karl Rove." Although "some" Republicans "are bracing for losses of 25 House seats or more," Rove "is predicting that, at worst, Republicans will lose only 8 to 10 seats." As for the Senate, Rove is said to believe, "a Democratic victory would require the opposition to 'run the table,' as one official put it, to pick up the necessary six seats -- a prospect the White House seems to regard as nearly inconceivable." The Post adds, "The official White House line of supreme self-assurance comes from the top down. Bush has publicly and privately banished any talk of losing the GOP majorities, in part to squelch any loss of nerve among his legions. … The question is whether this is a case of justified confidence -- based on Bush's and Rove's electoral record and knowledge of the money, technology and other assets at their command -- or of self-delusion. Even many Republicans suspect the latter. Three GOP strategists with close ties to the White House flatly predicted the loss of the House, though they would not do so on the record for fear of offending senior Bush aides."

GOP Hopes To Counter Democrats' Enthusiasm With Proven GOTV Effort. The New York Times (10/15, Toner, 1.21M) reports, "Pollsters say enthusiasm among Democrats is particularly high this year — significantly higher, by several important measures, than the intensity of Republicans. Republican strategists counter that they can compensate for any gap in enthusiasm with their legendary get-out-the-vote operation. The party has built its electoral success in the last two elections on identifying and producing nearly every obtainable Republican vote at the polls; this time may be more challenging, they say, but no different. 'I do think our base is coming together and will be coming together later, but four weeks is an eternity in this business,' said Representative Tom Cole, an Oklahoma Republican and longtime party strategist. Republicans will ultimately be motivated to vote, Mr. Cole said, and they will turn out on Election Day even if 'this is a race where professionalism has to make up for enthusiasm.'" The Times goes on to report, "The Republican machine was on full display last weekend in Ohio, where volunteers worked phone banks in all 88 counties on what the party called Super Saturday. They contacted 100,000 carefully selected potential Republican voters and knocked on the doors of 50,000."

The AP (10/15, Sidoti) reports, "In the battle for control of Congress, Democrats hope enthusiasm trumps Republican efficiency. Otherwise, they concede, they will have problems on Nov. 7 as a party still struggling to catch up with the GOP's ability to turn voters out of seeming thin air. 'Makes me green with envy,' says Ellen Malcolm, the president of EMILY's List, which backs female candidates who support abortion rights. She was speaking of the Republican Party program that relies on reams of polling data, publicly available information and consumer choice records to identify likely GOP voters in even the most Democratic precincts."

Most Congressional Incumbents Safe Despite Series Of Scandals. The Washington Times (10/15, Lambro, 88K) reports, "The overwhelming majority of House incumbents have little if any serious opposition in November's midterm elections, whose outcome likely will be decided by 30 to 40 tossup races out of a total of 435 contests. That is the inherent contradiction in an election portrayed as a titanic battle of fed-up voters unhappy with members of Congress when, in fact, a majority approve of their representatives' performance in office and are expected to return most incumbents to Washington, many by large majorities. … While voter approval of Congress has plunged to 32 percent in the wake of the lobbying and congressional-page scandals, a Washington Post-ABC News poll of voters last week found that at least 60 percent liked and supported their representatives."

Washington Scandals Dog House Members Seeking Statewide Office. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Barabak, 918K) reports Rep. Jim Gibbons "has represented a big chunk of Nevada in Congress, enjoying the advantages of incumbency as he coasted to one easy reelection after another. But as he tries to move up to statewide office this fall, Gibbons isn't promoting all those years spent in Washington. … Gibbons, a square-jawed former airline pilot, is one of 16 House members -- nine of them Republican -- who have tried to move on to either a governorship or the Senate in this year's midterm election. Most have struggled in a political climate that nonpartisan pollster Andrew Kohut described as'anti-incumbent, anti-Washington, anti-Republican.' In Minnesota," GOP Rep. Mark Kennedy trails badly in his Senate bid. … In Colorado, where Republican Rep. Bob Beauprez is trying to become governor, 'the Washington burden' has all but killed his chances, said Floyd Ciruli, an independent polltaker in Denver. Even here in Nevada, where Gibbons is ahead in polls, Republicans fret that the Mark Foley sex scandal and other frustrations with the GOP-run Congress could depress party turnout and cost them an open governor's seat in Carson City."

Many Negative Ads Tie Candidates To Lobbyists And Special Interests. The Washington Post (10/15, A10, Birnbaum, 748K) reports, "The dirtiest word on the campaign trail this year is 'lobbyist.' In close contests from Connecticut to California, Republicans and Democrats are attacking each other for getting too close to 'special interests' and lobbyists. The accusation, a longtime election staple, is carrying greater heft than usual, election experts agree, thanks to the guilty plea of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff in January. … Candidates and independent organizations have run more than 300 political ads suggesting that the incumbents, the challengers or both have been co-opted by narrow interests or, worse, have actually lobbied."

Ickes' Group Targets Bush In Ad To Air In Competitive House Districts. The New York Times (10/15, Broder, 1.21M) describes an ad created by the September Fund, "a new independent group founded by the Democratic operative Harold M. Ickes," which "was first broadcast Thursday on CNN and will be shown in as many as a dozen competitive Congressional districts starting next week." In the ad, a "succession of Americans are standing in a park posing the questions to a shrub. The handheld camera moves in and out to show the people and the plant. The bush, of course, does not respond to their questions, and they walk away in disgust." The "shrub" is supposed to represent President Bush. The Times notes this is the first ad from the September Fund, which "hopes to raise as much as $20 million to counteract the Republicans' significant financial edge in this election. Mr. Ickes has not said how much he has raised nor has he named his major donors. He has also not revealed what races he plans to single out."

Women Key Constituency In Midterm Elections. David Broder in his column in the Washington Post (10/15, B7, 748K) writes, "Men have been making policy in Washington for as long as most of us can remember. But much of the political future rests in the hands of women." According to Broder, "In the narrowest terms, with Democrats needing 15 seats to capture a majority of the seats in the House of Representatives, there are 17 highly competitive districts with female candidates. More broadly, much of the voter mobilization effort in both parties -- and their allied groups -- is aimed at women, especially those who normally vote in presidential years but skip the midterm elections." Broder writes, "That this election could result in placing a woman, Nancy Pelosi, in line to be speaker of the House for the first time in history only emphasizes the growing role of women in setting the political course."

Democrats See Opportunity To Regain Voters Lost To Reagan In 1980. In a "Week in Review" piece for the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) David Kirkpatrick writes, "Some political analysts…say they see a chance for a potential Democratic comeback, an opportunity for another historic realignment of the political parties. … In recent Harris Interactive polls, the number of respondents who refuse to acknowledge a preference for either party has risen to about 25 percent of the electorate from about 12 percent for most of the last decade." Kirkpatrick adds, "polls showing Democrats poised for big gains this fall in both chambers of Congress are reigniting the debate: Can Democrats crack apart the Reagan coalition of white blue-collar workers, evangelical Protestants, Southerners and chambers of commerce?"

New Poll Shows Allen Barely Ahead Of Webb 49-47. The Washington Post (10/15, A1, Barnes, Shear, 748K) reports Sen. George Allen and James Webb "are virtually tied." According to the Post, Allen gets 49 percent, compared with 47 percent for Webb, within the 3 percentage point margin of error for the poll conducted over three days last week. With few respondents saying they are undecided and most seemingly locked in for their candidate, the poll indicates that the candidates' strategies for turning out supporters will be vital and that changes in the national political climate could tilt the outcome. … Independent Gail Parker receives 2 percent of the support in the poll. For Webb, the 60-year-old Democratic Party newcomer who launched his campaign eight months ago, the poll provides new evidence that his underfunded, long-shot bid has created one of the country's most competitive races." However, "the poll contains plenty of concern for the former Navy secretary and author from Falls Church. Webb owns a solid lead only in Northern Virginia, and his supporters, as a group, are far less enthusiastic about his candidacy than are Allen's voters."

Klobuchar Leading Kennedy 55-34 According To Minnesota Poll. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (10/15, Lopez, Diaz, Hotakainen, 398K) reports DFL Senate candidate Amy Klobuchar "continues to hold a substantial lead over her GOP rival Mark Kennedy, according to the latest Minnesota Poll, and there are signs that national Republican leaders are now turning their focus to other Senate campaigns. The poll shows Klobuchar with 55 percent to Kennedy's 34 percent, a margin that is nearly the same as it was in September. Kennedy's campaign challenged the poll results, as it has with every Minnesota Poll on the Senate race." The Star Tribune notes, "The two candidates will debate today on NBC's 'Meet the Press.' The poll, conducted from Oct. 6 to Wednesday with 818 likely voters, has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3.4 percentage points. A Rasmussen poll conducted earlier this month also showed a double-digit lead for Klobuchar."

Both Talent And McCaskill Avoiding Stem Cell Debate. The New York Times (10/15, Saulny, 1.21M) reports, "Over cocktails one recent Monday night at a Democratic fund-raiser in New York, Claire McCaskill, the Democratic Senate candidate in Missouri, played up her support for stem cell research. But at a campaign appearance here in rural and largely conservative Kirksville, Ms. McCaskill never mentioned the subject. Similarly, her Republican opponent, Senator Jim Talent, came out against a statewide ballot measure on stem cell research at the strong urging of conservative Christians. But when Mr. Talent recently addressed an electricians' trade group at a resort on the Lake of the Ozarks, he did not speak of his opposition." According to the Times, "Just a few months ago, the Missouri stem cell research initiative on the November ballot was a defining issue of the campaign. … But now, as Mr. Talent and Ms. McCaskill reach beyond their traditional bases, the emotionally charged ballot measure — which would allow the research and possibly provide state financing for it — is almost too hot to touch."

Casey Portrayed As Humble Social Conservative "Well Suited" To Defeat Santorum. The Washington Post (10/15, A4, Finkel, 748K) reports on the race between Sen. Rick Santorum and Bob Casey. According to the Post, "In going after a high-ranking Senate Republican, Democrats picked someone well suited for the role: the state treasurer and a member of one of Pennsylvania's best-known political families, who has strong conservative views on social issues, a liberal economic philosophy and opposition to the war in Iraq. Casey is against abortion and gun control, and he agrees with the current federal policy that limits embryonic stem cell research -- all positions that have inoculated him against attacks from the right. … Since formally announcing his candidacy in March 2005, Casey has held a steady lead over Santorum in the polls. Yet even as he appears on the verge of a victory with national implications, many in his state and throughout the country know little about his background. Casey, 46, gives new meaning to political humility, and he discourages attention to his personal life or comparisons to his father, the late Robert P. Casey, a former governor."

NYTimes Endorses Clinton. The New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) endorses Sen. Hillary Clinton in her reelection campaign against John Spencer, who the Times dismisses as "an unknown, unqualified opponent."

Feinstein's GOP Challenger Garnering Very Little Support. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Martelle, 918K) reports, "During a national election cycle marked by a bitter fight for control of the Senate and the House of Representatives, the campaign for California's senior Senate seat has the feel of a foregone conclusion as [Sen. Dianne] Feinstein, one of the state's most popular vote-getters, holds a commanding lead among likely voters in the race" against Republican Dick Moutjoy.

National GOP Said To Have Written-Off Several High-Profile Ohio Races. The AP (10/15, Smyth) reports, "As the GOP scrambles nationwide to retain its majority, scandal-ridden Ohio appears to be falling off the financial radar screen. Television time is being forsaken for House candidates. And national promotions of the state's gubernatorial candidate by the Republican Governors Association popped up, then disappeared." The AP adds that the National Republican Congressional Committee "pulled advertising it had planned in the race between Republican Craig Foltin and Democrat Betty Sutton for [Rep. Sherrod] Brown's open House seat, which the GOP initially thought it could wrest from Democrats. The committee also viewed the seat being vacated by Democratic U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland, who is running for governor, as a potential gain, but has backed away from that hope." The AP continues, "Meanwhile, after an aggressive early advertising push, Republican gubernatorial nominee Ken Blackwell, Ohio's secretary of state, has disappeared from the airwaves — a surprising turn of events for the leading candidate on the party's ticket. A one-time strategy called for the RGA to air its own ads in support of Blackwell, but the governor's group appears to have written off the state."

Murtha And Portman Assist Opposing House Candidates In Ohio. The AP (10/15) reports Rep. John Murtha "campaigned in Ohio for fellow Democrat Victoria Wulsin, who is challenging first-term Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt in the state's 2nd District. Schmidt criticized Murtha's call to pull troops out of Iraq on the floor of the House last year." Schmidt "received campaign help Saturday from Rob Portman, the White House budget chief and the district's representative for 12 years before Schmidt."

Murtha Defends Opposition To Iraq War. In an op-ed in The Washington Post (10/15, B1, 748K), Rep. John Murtha writes, "The Republicans are running scared. In the White House, on Capitol Hill and on the campaign trail, they're worried about losing control of Congress," Murtha writes, adding, "And so the administration and the GOP have launched a desperate assault on Democrats and our position on the war in Iraq. Defeatists, they call us, and appeasers and -- oh so cleverly -- 'Defeatocrats.'" According to Murtha, "It's all baseless name-calling, and it's all wrong. Unless, of course, being a Defeatocrat means taking a good hard look at the administration's Iraq policy and determining that it's a failure. In that case, count me in."

The AP (10/15) reports the details of Murtha's essay for Sunday's Washington Post "blasting Republicans for referring to him and other Iraq war opponents as 'Defeatocrats.'"

Despite Criticisms Of Murtha's Views On Iraq, Polls Show He Has A Substantial Lead Over GOP Challenger Irey. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/15, Toland, 241K) reports, "Rarely in the annals of American politics has the much-used David-Goliath analogy been so apropos," as Murtha "is literally and figuratively daunting — literally because he's 6 feet, 3 inches tall and broad-shouldered with a booming voice; figuratively because he's a giant in Congress, a 32-year veteran of the House of Representatives." According to the report, PA12 challenger Diana Irey (R) "is the opposite — soft-spoken, slight, barely clearing 5 feet, a neophyte on the national stage. We know how the Bible story ended. But can Mrs. Irey slay this towering Johnstown warrior?" According to the report, despite Irey's "hopes of using Mr. Murtha's well-publicized Iraq comments to nationalize the race and her fund-raising base…a recently published poll showed her trailing 57 percent to 30."

Unexpectedly Close PA7 Race Highlights Change In Politics Of National Security. The New York Times (10/15, Zernike, 1.21M) reports that when PA7 challenger Joe Sestak (D) "announced he was running for Congress, national Democrats and media consultants told him not to talk about pulling troops out of Iraq, arguing it would only encourage the image of Democrats as weak on national security. Nine months later, having ignored their advice, Mr. Sestak has put a 20-year Republican incumbent on the run for the first time, turning a bid by a political novice into a real race." Surveys "show that Mr. Sestak is running even or better with" Rep. Curt Weldon and "the war more than any other issue is propelling voters toward him." His "persistence on the issue, and Mr. Weldon's efforts to recalibrate his position, highlight some of the ways Iraq may be altering the politics of national security after decades in which the advantage has gone to the Republicans."

Dogged By Bribery Probe, Rep. Jefferson Fails To Get Party's Endorsement. The AP (10/15) reports, "The Louisiana Democratic Party on Saturday turned down" Eight-term LA2 Rep. William Jefferson, and endorsed state Rep. Karen Carter (D) "one of a dozen challengers who emerged after Mr. Jefferson became a target of a federal bribery investigation." According to the report, "This is the first time in recent memory that an incumbent has failed to win the state party's endorsement."

Prominent Colorado Republicans Refuse To Back GOP Candidate Lamborn. The Washington Times (10/15, Richardson, 88K) reports that Colorado state Sen. Doug Lamborn's (R) "fiercest opponent in the 5th District race isn't his Democratic foe. It's the Republican he's trying to succeed," 10-term CO5 Rep. Joel Hefley (R). According to the report, Lamborn is running "neck and neck" Jay Fawcett (D), "a veteran and small-business owner, in the ultraconservative district, according to a Denver Post poll released last week. One of the reasons: Mr. Hefley." Soon "after Mr. Lamborn won a six-candidate primary on Aug. 8, Mr. Hefley, who is retiring, said he would refuse to endorse the Republican candidate, pointing to what he described as his 'sleazy, dishonest campaign.' That stinging rebuke, coming from the highly regarded Mr. Hefley, delivered a devastating blow to Mr. Lamborn's candidacy. Several other prominent Republicans soon joined Mr. Hefley in refusing to endorse Mr. Lamborn, pointing to ads and mailings they say unfairly demonized his Republican foes."

Democrats Have Advantage At Ballot In Race For Tom Delay's Former Seat. The AP (10/14, Stinebaker) reports that when former TX 22 Rep. Tom Delay's name was on the ballot, "Voting Republican in this conservative district was never difficult. … With DeLay out of the race and the GOP unable by law to substitute a name on the ballot, voters must write in the Republican candidate," Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs (R)." The AP notes, "That could prove to be such a chore that Democrats might walk away with a seat that has long been in the GOP's hands."

Denver Post Endorses Salazar For Re-Election. The Denver Post (10/14, 256K) endorses CO3 Rep. John Salazar (D) for re-election, writing, "In his first term representing the sprawling 3rd Congressional District, Salazar gained a seat on the House Veterans Affairs Committee and used the position to push for expanded veterans health care, fairer treatment of military widows and for cracking down on fraudulent claims for military medals. … Salazar's freshman performance and keen interest in 3rd District issues has earned him re-election."

California Democrats Seek Rare Victories In Longtime Republican House Districts. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Perry, 918K) reports, "The congressional election isn't until Nov. 7, but the real decisions may have been made in 2001, the last time district lines were redrawn in California. Of 53 districts in the state, only three have drawn much interest, two of those because of the ethical problems of the Republican incumbents." According to the report, "Still, Democrats are hoping for electoral lighting to strike in the districts that are represented by" incumbents CA4 Rep. John T. Doolittle, CA11 Rep. Richard W. Pombo and CA50 Rep. Brian Bilbray (R)." Yet "if lightning is to strike, it will have to defy some daunting numbers from the past. In four decades" UC San Diego congressional scholar Gary Jacobson says "no Democrat has beaten a Republican in a congressional district in which Republicans held a registration edge of four percentage points or greater. In Doolittle's district, the pro-GOP margin is 18 percentage points, in Pombo's 6 and in Bilbray's 14."

GOP Expected To Fare Well In California Races. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Finnegan, 918K) reports, "Reliably Democratic California looks more GOP-friendly this year than much of the U.S.," as Schwarzenegger "is heavily favored for reelection Nov. 7 over" challenger state Treasurer Phil Angelides (D). According to the report, "Several other Republicans seeking statewide office are mounting surprisingly competitive races against Democratic rivals, though the outcomes are far from sure. And billions of dollars in bonds and taxes on the ballot face tough prospects, thanks largely to Republican voters' aversion to government growth."

California Redistricting May Hurt Democrat's Chances Of Retaking House. In an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (10/15, 918K), former GOP consultant Tony Quinn writes, "With the Mark Foley sex scandal dropping on congressional Republicans like a brick on a teacup, bipartisan decisions made five years ago to gerrymander congressional district lines in California and other states may be all that's left to save the GOP from losing control of Congress." Quinn adds, "So, if [House Minority Leader Nancy] Pelosi comes up short of the 15 seats needed to make her the next House speaker, she'll know where to place the blame. She can just look in the mirror."

Schwarzenegger's Celebrity Seen As Asset At Polls. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Salladay, 918K) reports, "If the historic recall election three years ago upended California politics, the race between" Angelides Schwarzenegger "has returned the political system to its regularly scheduled programming. Between state Treasurer Angelides and the incumbent Gov. Schwarzenegger, there is little talk about sweeping away special interests or transforming the political system as we know it. Instead, potential voters have been given a choice between established politicians from the two major parties, each with traditional corporate or union backers, each with slightly different but relatively mainstream views on public policy." According to the report, "Still, an unusual and important factor hangs over the campaign, and brings a benefit to the incumbent: Schwarzenegger's status as a worldwide celebrity."

Los Angeles Times Endorses Schwarzenegger. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, 918K) endorses Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger writing, "After his historic election in the 2003 recall, followed by some early promise and a disappointing sophomore year, Arnold Schwarzenegger has been a solid, pragmatic governor who has steered a moderate course for California. He deserves a sequel." According to the Times, "Angelides may be more specific about many of California's problems. But Schwarzenegger is more likely to solve them."

Politics Of California Governor, New York Mayor Similar. In a Week In Review piece in the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M), Jennifer Steinhauer compares the styles of California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg saying, "Both men are moderate centrists, estranged from their party's mainstream, who first ran for office on what seemed like a lark. Both watched their popularity sink mid-term to embarrassing levels." According to Steinhauer, "Mr. Bloomberg came back to beat handily -- and greatly outspend -- a Democratic machine politician whose attempts to claw away at the mayor and paint him as the president's buddy flopped. Mr. Schwarzenegger's re-election bid does not end until next month, but his campaign has uncannily mirrored Mr. Bloomberg's 2005 race."

Maryland Gubernatorial Rivals Square Off In Two Debates. The Washington Post (10/15, A1, Wagner, Mosk, 748K) in a front page story reports that Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley "traded scathing assessments of each other's records yesterday during a pair of debates in which they did little to hide their mutual disdain. Ehrlich accused his Democratic rival of neglecting Baltimore's low-performing schools, of wrongfully arresting thousands of its citizens and of practicing a 'leadership style of whining and blaming others for your failures.'" According to the Post, "For months now, the governor has succeeded in keeping the campaign focused largely on Baltimore crime and education, two topics he had identified as weaknesses for an opponent who has overseen one of the nation's largest cities for seven years. But it is unclear whether his message is working with statewide voters -- O'Malley has consistently led in independent polls."

The Washington Times (10/15, Miller, 88K) reports that Ehrlich and O'Malley "clashed yesterday in two debates that frequently dwelled on [Baltimore's] crime problems and poorly performing schools, despite the mayor's attempts to shift the focus to the governor." Afterward, "both candidates claimed victory. The Ehrlich campaign said the governor 'convincingly demonstrated that Maryland is better off today than it was four years ago" while O'Malley's campaign "said the mayor won by 'showcasing new ideas for progress for Maryland's hardworking families.'"

WPost Faults Maryland Candidates For Raising Questions About Election Process. The Washington Post (10/15, 748K) in an editorial asks, "How come, when Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) expresses no confidence in state election officials and urges voters to use absentee ballots, Democrats squawk about a conspiracy to suppress the vote, but when Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) says the same thing, there is silence? Given the importance of voting, playing politics in this way isn't forgivable." Maryland political leaders should "not add to the confusion with suggestions that paper is the only safe way to vote. Instead of sowing unease that could well give pause to prospective voters, Mr. Ehrlich and Mr. Duncan should be focusing on the constructive steps that they are taking to try to ensure a smooth election."

Kerry's Attacks On Bush Said To Be Part Of His 2008 Campaign Strategy. The Washington Post (10/15, A7, Balz, 748K) reports that Sen. John Kerry, while speaking to Democrats in New Hampshire recently, "left little doubt that if he runs again in 2008, he intends to be the chief prosecutor of the record of the Bush presidency. 'A lie, a lie, a lie and a lie,' he said after recounting Republican claims that Iraq is not in a civil war, that North Korea's nuclear advancement is former president Bill Clinton's fault and that Democrats were behind the release of salacious e-mails that Mark Foley sent to former House pages. It was as if the Kerry of 2006 was channeling the Howard Dean of 2003. 'What we have in Washington is a house of lies, and in November, we need to clean house,' he said." However, "even Democrats have been reluctant to follow Kerry's recommendations for changing policy by setting a timetable for withdrawing U.S. forces" from Iraq.

Former President Clinton Helps Raise Funds For Iowa Democrats. The AP (10/15) reports former President Bill Clinton "said Saturday that voters 'know something is wrong' in Washington and urged Democrats to create change in the November elections. 'I have never seen the American people so serious,' said Clinton. 'I think I know why. People know things are out of whack. The rhythm of our public life and our common life in America has been disturbed.' The former president was the keynote speaker at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner, the Iowa Democratic Party's biggest annual fundraising event. He drew more than 3,500 activists."

Edwards Blasts Bush's Iraq Strategy While Campaigning In Iowa. The AP (10/15) reports former Sen. John Edwards "on Saturday bashed the Bush administration for 'proactive stupidity' by sticking with a failed policy in Iraq and being unable to admit its mistakes. He predicted the Iraq war and a wave of scandals in the Republican-run Congress will prompt voters to demand change in November. … Edwards was spending the weekend in eastern Iowa raising money for Democratic legislative candidates." He "diverted from his campaign schedule to speak at a University of Iowa conference on poverty issues."

Thompson Mulling 2008 Presidential Campaign. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (10/15, Skiba, 259K) reports, "Political analysts say Tommy G. Thompson faces long odds if he tries for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. Aides to Thompson, 64, announced last week that he was launching a political action committee, Forward America, and mulling a run for the White House. That comes after discussions with key advisers and a pair of visits to Iowa, whose caucuses kick off the presidential nominating season. Ahead, aides said, Thompson plans a trip to New Hampshire, which hosts the first primary of 2008."

Obama Said To Lack "Big Ideas" Necessary For Presidential Bid. Time's Joe Klein (10/15) writes that Sen. Barack Obama "has become an American political phenomenon in what seems about a nanosecond, and the folks are giddy with anticipation. … The question of when Obama -- who has not yet served two years in the U.S. Senate -- will run for President is omnipresent. That he will eventually run, and win, is assumed by almost everyone who comes to watch him speak." According to Klein, "He encourages those expectations by promising great things -- at least, in the abstract. 'This country is ready for a transformative politics of the sort that John F. Kennedy, Ronald Reagan and Franklin Roosevelt represented,' he told me. But those were politicians who had big ideas or were willing to take big risks, and so far, Barack Obama hasn't done much of either. … His record has been predictably liberal."

New York Bid To Land 2008 Democratic National Convention In Jeopardy. The New York Times (10/15, Cardwell, 1.21M) reports, "New York City's bid to land the 2008 Democratic National Convention is in jeopardy" because Mayor Michael Bloomberg "is spread so thin with fund-raising commitments that he may not be able to raise the money from private donors needed to pay for it, an official said on Thursday. The fund-raising worries come as Democrats have been seriously considering bringing the convention to New York rather than to the other competing city, Denver, which offers a politically attractive location, but has logistical problems because of a scarcity of hotel rooms."

Conservatives Seek To Rein In "Activist" Judges With Ballot Initiatives. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Simon, 918K) reports, "Judges across several Western states could soon face new limits on their authority and threats to their independence, as conservatives campaign for ballot measures that aim to rein in what they describe as 'runaway courts.' Frustration among the right has been building for years, especially since the high court in Massachusetts legalized same-sex marriage in 2003." For example, "South Dakota's ballot contains the most radical provision: It would empower citizens to sue judges over their rulings. Other proposals would make Colorado the first state to impose term limits on top judges and give Montana residents the right to recall judges over any 'dissatisfaction.' In Oregon, an amendment would require Supreme and Appeals court judges to be elected by geographic district, so they reflect the values of conservative rural communities as well as the liberal legal establishment in Portland."

Rep. Gerry Studds Dies After Collapse. NBC Nightly News (10/14, story 7, :10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "From Massachusetts comes word of the death of former Democratic congressman Gerry Studds. He won re-election until his retirement in 1997. He collapsed last week and was recovering in Boston at a hospital when doctors say he succumbed to a blood clot. He was 69."

The New York Times (10/15, Cave, 1.21M) reports that after he was censured for having an affair with a 17-year-old Congressional page, Studds "seemed emboldened by his re-election." Author Charles Kaiser said, "In a sense, he became a role model. … His experience convinced other people that it would now be possible to run as an openly gay person." The recent scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley "revived interest in Mr. Studds's own dalliance with a teenage page in 1983" as "several Republican candidates sought to deflect criticism aimed at their own party by reminding voters about Mr. Studds." The NRCC "chastised Democrats in this year's race for taking contributions from party leaders who had served with Mr. Studds."

The Washington Post (10/15, C7, Lamb, 748K)quotes Sen. Edward Kennedy saying, "His work on behalf of our fishing industry and the protection of our waters has guided the fishing industry into the future and ensured that generations to come will have the opportunity to love and learn from the sea. … He was a steward of the oceans." The AP (10/15, Lindsay) reports similar details.

Columnist Suggests Republicans Should Follow Example Of Social Traditionalists. David Brooks in his column in the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) contrasts the differences between religious conservatives and social libertarians with the philosophies of social traditionalists, who believe "that when policies fail, it's usually because they are based on inaccurate assumptions about human nature" rather than abstract theories and are "are interested in how to strengthen institutions that breed responsible people." Brooks argues that the "culture war has become self-parodic, so people are hungry for a morality that is neither absolutist nor nihilistic. As the economy has opened up opportunities, it's become clear many people lack the cultural capital to take advantage of them." Brooks concludes, "A Republican Party in danger of dividing between religious conservatives on the one side and libertarians on the other might return to these traditionalist values after the coming deluge."

Households With Married Couples Now A Minority. The New York Times (10/15, Roberts, 1.21M) reports, "Married couples, whose numbers have been declining for decades as a proportion of American households, have finally slipped into a minority, according to an analysis of new census figures by The New York Times. The American Community Survey, released this month by the Census Bureau, found that 49.7 percent, or 55.2 million, of the nation's 111.1 million households in 2005 were made up of married couples -- with and without children -- just shy of a majority and down from more than 52 percent five years earlier." The Times adds, "The total number of married couples is higher than ever, and most Americans eventually marry," but "a growing number of adults are spending more of their lives single or living unmarried with partners, and the potential social and economic implications are profound."

Bush Applauds UN Vote To Impose "Strict Sanctions" North Korea. The Administration's response to the UN vote to sanction North Korea received significant media coverage, leading the single network newscast on Saturday evening and appearing on the front pages of major newspapers. President Bush's remarks that the "swift and tough" sanctions sent "a clear message" to North Korea were repeated in virtually all stories of the UN vote.

NBC Nightly News (10/14, lead story, 2:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "World leaders sent a strong message to North Korea today. The UN Security Council voted unanimously to punish them for its nuclear program. North Korea rejected the move and warned further pressure would be considered a declaration of war and then its ambassador walked out of the session. It is all part of a growing international crisis." US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton: "We will give them time to respond. I hope they choose the correct path – give up the pursuit of weapons of mass destruction." NBC (Jordan): "President Bush welcomed the vote." President Bush: "This action by the United Nations which was swift and tough says that we are united in our determination to see to it the Korean peninsula is nuclear weapons free." Jordan: "But nonproliferation expert Joseph Cirincione said the U.S. is no longer in control of the negotiations." Nonproliferation expert Joseph Cirincione: "We may be seeing the beginning of a more assertive diplomatic role for China."

In a front page story, the New York Times (10/15, A1, Hoge, 1.21M) reports it will be "the toughest international action against North Korea since the end of the Korean War" and "hit most of the tough points that the United States and Japan, in particular, had been seeking." Also, "a ban on the shipment of luxury goods in the resolution was particularly championed by" US Ambassador John Bolton :and J. D. Crouch, the deputy national security adviser, as a way to harm the North's leader, Kim Jong-il." The Times notes, "Current and former Bush administration officials, and experts on the North, said that while the sanctions did not go as far as Washington wished, they probably gave it and Japan the legal means to squeeze the country. They provide the basis to inspect ships in ports around the world -- though not necessarily on the high seas -- and gives Washington a way to expand a program to force banks to halt dealings with the country." President Bush "praised the resolution, saying it sent 'a clear message to the leader of North Korea regarding his weapons programs.'"

And in it's front page story the Washington Post (10/15, A1, Lynch, Kessler, 748K) notes Bush and Bolton's responses and adds, "U.S. officials believe the resolution will give them the international tools to put the squeeze on North Korea. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Japan, South Korea and China later this week to discuss the implementation of the resolution as well as possible actions that could be taken by countries to punish Pyongyang, U.S. officials said." For now, "U.S. officials are focused on implementing this resolution and are not contemplating more resolutions, officials said. When President Bush travels to Hanoi next month for an Asian economic summit, there is the possibility that Bush and the leaders from China, South Korea, Japan, Russia and possibly other countries will meet on North Korea and 'take stock' of the resolution's effectiveness."

The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Farley, 918K) says the UN vote "was a hard-fought act of unity." China's resistance to inspecting North Korean cargo "throws into doubt how effective the sanctions will be" but "U.S. officials portrayed the unanimous vote as a political victory for the United States in bringing together countries that had been reluctant to take a hard line on North Korea — in particular, China and Russia." And Bush "described the Security Council resolution as a 'clear message' to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il that 'the world is united in our opposition to his nuclear weapons plans.'"

The AP (10/15, Loven) notes, "Despite the softer provisions and no threat of military action to enforce them, Bush pronounced the measure 'a clear message' to North Korea." In addition Rice and Bolton will appear "on the Sunday morning television talk shows to bolster the U.S. case." Meanwhile, "Democrats responded by saying that the apparent test is evidence Bush's approach to North Korea has failed." Pennsylvania House candidate Patrick Murphy said, "We have seen the number of terrorist attacks increase around the world. We have seen North Korea and Iran -- two members of the president's axis of evil -- enhance their nuclear weapons capabilities."

After his radio message Bloomberg (10/15, Murray, Varner) reports Bush "told reporters…that if North Korea verifiably ends its weapons program, the U.S. and other nations will provide economic help." In his radio address Bush "said the U.S. will keep consulting with allies in the region." The Financial Times (10/15) and the Washington Times/AP (10/15, A1, Lederer) publish similar details.

Washington's Approach To Nuclear Proliferation Said To Reveal US Weakness. The Washington Post (10/15, Pincus, 748K) reports that "it is hard to remember a moment when the world's sole superpower seemed less positioned to manage a fractured world." Even "as America barrels toward this nuclear showdown on opposite sides of Asia, perhaps the best measure of America's power in these matters is its need for Russia and China to cooperate." After all, "diplomacy works best from a position of strength. And even though the United States still boasts the world's largest military, most dynamic economy and a culture that the world snaps up, there is rising evidence that many countries -- Russia and China among them -- sniff a distinct change in the strategic atmosphere," and behind North Korea's and Iran's "threats lies an understanding of American vulnerabilities."

Rice's Challenge On Asia Trip Said To Be Convincing Chinese. The Washington Post (10/15, Pincus, 748K) reports, "The challenge facing Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice this week on her trip to Beijing, Seoul and Tokyo is to change" China's mindset. While "the Chinese are now plenty mad with the nation they once said was 'as close as lips and teeth' to China," what "Beijing fears more than a nuclear North Korea is an imploded North Korea. They fear hungry refugees rushing over the border. They don't want a power grab for North Korea's territory that could put them in conflict with other big powers."

Nuclear North Korea Developed Over Fifty Year & Both Parties' Administrations. The Washington Post (10/15, A16, Pincus, 748K) follows the history of nuclear proliferation in Korea saying, "Democrats and Republicans have been quick to use North Korea's apparent nuclear test to benefit their own party…but a review of history shows that both sides have contributed to the current situation." The North Korean nuclear project was "triggered in part by threats from Presidents Harry S. Truman and Dwight D. Eisenhower to end the Korean War," when they indicated the possibility of using nuclear weapons to end it. The US also kept nuclear weapons in South Korea from 1957 until 1991. More recently, when "intelligence analysts at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory completed a highly classified report that concluded North Korea had begun construction of a plant to enrich uranium," the Administration "waited until October 2002 before confronting the North Koreans," and it soon "ended its participation in the 1994 agreement," after which North Korea began reprocessing its fuel rods.

South Koreans Disappointed Approach To North Korea Rejected. NBC Nightly News (10/14, story 2, 2:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "While Japan has been urging tough sanctions, China and South Korea have taken a more restrained approach." NBC (Colt): "In South Korea, days after the apparent nuclear test there is still disbelief and anger. The south built a highway, laid down a new railroad line and they have yet to carry anyone across the DMZ. The 150 mile barbed border remains impenetrable. It's called the 'sunshine policy' and its aim is to remove the barriers that exist between North and South. Many South Koreans say it is clear from Monday's test it is not working." Experts "say the North has nothing to lose." Han Sung-Joo, former South Korean Foreign Minister: "They are saying to the world we are not going to be intimidated by the outside world." Colt: "Maybe not intimidated but tonight the North is more isolated from the outside world than any time in recent memory."

In a front page article the Washington Times (10/15, A1, Salmon, 88K) reports, "public opinion in the South has turned sharply against a South Korean policy of engaging the enemy in the belief it will eventually bring peace on the divided peninsula," and "South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun has conceded the 'sunshine' policy of engagement with North Korea is under threat because of the nuclear test." However, "the architect of South Korea's engagement with the North, former President Kim Dae-jung, remained unmoved by the test." Instead, he "blamed American hard-liners for the crisis and said engagement must continue.

Next UN Secretary General Praises Resolution, Calls For More Talks. The AP (10/15, Lederer) reports that new UN Secretary General, Ban Ki-moon said he "welcomed the U.N. Security Council's 'very clear, strong and unified message to North Korea,'" but "stressed…that 'we need a two-pronged approach at this time,' relying not only on sanctions but on dialogue and talks."

Bloomberg (10/15, Bliss, Varner) reports that analysts support Ban's position. They say that the resolution "will only be effective if the Bush administration backs it with negotiations to end the weapons program." Stephen Bosworth, a former U.S. ambassador to South Korea under President Bill Clinton, said that "the administration should be congratulated for quickly unifying world opinion," but it is "Very unlikely" to change North Korea's behavior. Still, John Tkacik, a former U.S. diplomat in China, said that "the UN resolution may force the North Koreans back into those talks." However, it if doesn't "the crisis might 'persist indefinitely.'"

Newsweek Experts Urge Administration To Open Dialogue With North Korea. Newsweek (10/15, 3.12M) on its web site publishes the advice of five experts on how to handle North Korea. Former South Korean President Kim Dae Jung recalls that former Presidents Nixon, Reagan and Eisenhower all engaged in dialogues with their enemies and states, "From a country that is very much responsible for world peace, the United States' refusal to talk is quite unacceptable."

Former U.S. Ambassador to South Korea during the Clinton Administration Stephen Bosworth writes, "We've got to listen to the North Koreans as they tell us what they think they want -- that is, direct contact with the United States, not simply through the six-party process, but they want direct contact of the sort that we had under Bush One and under Clinton. To say we've tried that and it failed, as the president did [Thursday] -- I simply don't agree with that. What is the disadvantage? Rewarding their bad behavior? That's patent nonsense. We talk all the time to people who behave badly."

Former UN weapons inspector Hans Blix writes, "With the elections coming up in America, Bush wants to be seen as firm, to look macho. In [an earlier crisis] in 1994, when I was at the IAEA, [former President] Jimmy Carter went to Pyongyang and met Kim Il Sung. Maybe another such trick is needed today."

Hazel Smith, a professor in international relations at Warwick University in Britain, writes, "The U.S. has to cut the rhetoric and get on with [diplomacy]. That means it has to have something to offer the North Koreans rather than just beating them about the head. All the other parties in the six-party talks now want America to start direct talks [with Pyongyang] and it could be done without loss of face in the context of multilateral negotiations. If America stops tightening the screws, the North Koreans will give. That's diplomacy."

In contrast, Gordon Chang, author of "Nuclear Showdown: North Korea Takes on the World," states, "The Bush administration put sanctions in place about a year ago [to stop] North Korea's currency counterfeiting program. They've been surprisingly effective in constricting the flow of funds in and out of North Korea. They are really starting to hurt the regime. I don't think it's the time to loosen them; on the contrary, I believe the sanctions should be tightened."

Columnist Calls Talks With North Korea Inevitable. In her column for the Philadelphia Inquirer (10/15, 399K), Trudy Rubin argues, "Republicans contend that the Clinton-era negotiations with North Korea were a failure and demonstrate why talks are pointless. But that assessment stands history on its head. ... True, the Clinton administration's negotiations didn't end North Korea's nuclear program -- but they did delay the production of weapons for eight years. Some on the Bush team now advocate bombing Iran's nuclear energy facilities -- at terrible risk -- just to delay the Iranian program perhaps three to five years." Yet, "at some point, the White House will have to decide whether it wants to pursue the small chance of freezing Pyongyang's program, or at least limiting the number of weapons." James Baker III "has already spoken with an Iranian representative. Pyongyang next?"

Scholar Says China's Soft Power Might Stop North Korea, Open China To Acting More Responsibly. Joshua Kurlantzick, a visiting scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (10/15, B3, 748K), "China has quietly reoriented its foreign policy to emerge as a new advocate of 'soft power." Which "could raise a host of problems internationally." However, this soft power "could also -- if properly exploited by other nations -- transform the Asian giant into a more responsible member of the world community." The more "Beijing's profile rises," the more" its foreign policy will also come under greater scrutiny. Its leaders will have to do more to maintain the country's appeal -- and this could be the opportunity the West needs to bend China toward becoming a more responsible international power and moving away from some of its more roguish friends." It can use that power to "do more than fume and condemn" North Korea.

Additional Countries May Pursue Nuclear Weapons. North Korea's nuclear test has prompted speculation in prominent US newspapers about the development of nuclear weapons by other countries. In a font page article, the New York Times (10/15, A1, Broad, Sanger, 1.21M) reports that "atomic officials estimate that as many as 40 more countries have the technical skill, and in some cases the required material, to build a bomb," and officials and arms control specialists say that opportunity, "coupled with new nuclear threats in Asia and the Middle East, risks a second nuclear age…in which nations are more likely to abandon the old restraints against atomic weapons." Director general of the IAEA Mohamed ElBaradei "estimated that up to 49 nations now know how to make nuclear arms, and he has warned that global tensions could push some over the line." Furthermore, "the spread of nuclear technology is expected to accelerate as nations redouble their reliance on atomic power." Although "it is not clear if the expansion of the world's civilian atomic infrastructure will ultimately lead to a rise in the number of countries building nuclear arms, it could give more countries the means to do so."

The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Rubin, 918K) adds that North Korea's test "was just the latest sign that the effort to contain the spread of atomic weapons was breaking down." Policymakers and experts say that a few "countries are on the verge of beginning uranium enrichment programs, and others have already started such efforts." Those "that have pursued nuclear capability outside the treaty or by hiding their programs have, after an initial distancing by the international community, gone unpunished over the long term," and India, Pakistan and Israel, which "refused to sign the" nonproliferation treaty, "enjoy the favor and respect of world leaders, setting an example of what countries can get when they acquire nuclear weapons." Additionally, the IAEA "has failed to detect cheating by countries" and "has no enforcement power."

Other Nations May Engage In "Near-Nuclear" Proliferation. Andrew Grotto, a senior national security analyst at the Center for American Progress, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (10/15, B3, 748K), "Pyongyang's test could encourage 'near-nuclear' proliferation -- a world in which states master key technologies that are ostensibly for harmless energy-related purposes but can be quickly adapted for deadly, offensive ends," and "A world in which countries have the capability to go nuclear on short notice is fraught with peril." There are "five nations in particular that may pursue that path." Iran may be "may be emboldened" by North Korea's test. Japan, South Korea, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia all have the technology or access to a nuclear power needed to make or buy a nuclear weapon. They are also concerned about North Korea or Iran's possession of nuclear weapons, and may feel they need parity.

Reporter Argues Nuclear Proliferation Is "Inevitable." William Langewiesche, international correspondent for Vanity Fair and the author of "Atomic Bazaar: The Rise of the Nuclear-Armed Poor," writes in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (10/15, 918K) that "the acquisition of atomic weapons by North Korea is the worst development yet in the ongoing story of nuclear proliferation by upstart states," but "what's done is done, and though we may protest and bluster, there is very little the U.S. can do to stop it from proceeding." Instead, "we would do well to calm down," as "the spread of nuclear weapons is, and always has been, inevitable." Today "the desire for nuclear weapons is spreading in inverse relation to the lowered risk of an all-out global nuclear war," and this trend "is accelerating in a world where countries must turn to themselves for protection and where the U.S., especially after the invasion of Iraq, is seen as an aggressor and a threat."

Expert Blames Bush Foreign Policy For Failure To Prevent Proliferation Of Nuclear Weapons. Nonproliferation expert Joseph Cirincione in an op-ed titled "Bush Unleashes The Nuclear Beast" in the Los Angeles Times (10/15, 918K) describes how the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty prevented most countries from developing nuclear weapons for years and asks, "suddenly, the threat is back. In the last six years, we seem awash in nuclear threats: First it was Saddam Hussein, then North Korea and Iran. How did it happen? Is nuclear restraint dead?" Cirincione blames "the problem is the strategy George W. Bush chose, which rejects international treaties as the solution to proliferation. He and his advisors saw these agreements as limiting U.S. flexibility and viewed the United Nations and other global gatherings as arenas where the world's Lilliputians could tie down the American Gulliver." Cirincione concludes, "Bush administration officials have proved expert at smashing the agreements their predecessors so painstakingly built, but in doing so they broke the bars that had caged the nuclear beast. Those who will have to repair the damage would do well to look back at the handiwork of the past. They might learn a thing or two."

Japan And South Korea Now Have Incentive To Go Nuclear. In a commentary for the Newark Star Ledger (10/15) CFR.org editor Michael Moran warns, "Japan and South Korea have predicated most of their defense and foreign policy decisions on the assumption they would be protected, in the final analysis, by America's nuclear umbrella. ... With the decision of North Korea to test a nuclear weapon, those days may now be numbered…the temptation of going nuclear, and of having a permanent seat at the world's big table as a result, may prove too much to resist."

WPost Is Pessimistic About Future Nonproliferation Efforts. The Washington Post (10/15, B6, 748K) editorializes, "The most critical question following North Korea's reported nuclear test is whether anything can be done to stop other states or terrorist groups from acquiring such weapons in coming years. … Based on the response to North Korea last week, the outlook isn't good." Countries "such as North Korea and Iran can be stopped only if a powerful coalition of countries emerges against them, combining the United States and Europe with Russia, China and regional powers," and "nuclear counterproliferation has to become those governments' highest priority. They have to be willing to make sacrifices and take risks. As the diplomacy at the United Nations last week once again demonstrated, neither China nor Russia regard stopping the spread of nuclear weapons as essential." Russian President Vladimir Putin is "willing to make a gesture toward preventing a world that bristles with nuclear weapons…only if he can get some help in his attempt to crush" Georgia, "a government that resists Russia's neo-imperialism. If such politics continue to underlie counterproliferation, we can expect a much more dangerous world."

Iran Suggests Old Nuclear Proposal. The Washington Times/AFP (10/15) reports that Iran's foreign ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini "said yesterday a year-old offer from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for foreign countries to handle its uranium enrichment activities still stands as a way to break the deadlock over its nuclear program," adding that "a suggestion made by Iran earlier this month for a French-led consortium to enrich uranium for Iran on Iranian soil remained 'appropriate.'" However, previously that "idea was met with a cool reception from Western powers, who object to enrichment done in Iran."

Germany Dismisses Possibly Of Successful Iran Talks. The AP (10/15, Moulson) reports that German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier "said there is currently no prospect of successful nuclear talks with Iran but that pressure on the country would be applied gradually, leaving the door open to future negotiations." He "gave no details of sanctions that might be taken against Tehran. However, he noted that a package of incentives aimed at persuading Iran to halt uranium enrichment is still being offered." Iran on called the "threats of sanctions 'psychological warfare' and said it would not be intimidated."

Israel Increases Effort To Stop Palestinian Rocket Fire. The New York Times (10/15, Myre, 1.21M) reports that in "another in a series of periodic escalations since an Israeli soldier was seized on June 25," Israeli soldiers "killed seven Palestinian militants in fighting Saturday as tanks and other armored vehicles rolled into areas east of Gaza City" as part of "a stepped-up effort to halt Palestinian rocket fire." During the last three days, "Israeli troops have staged ground operations in eastern Gaza…killing 20 Palestinians and wounding about 30. Most of the dead were Hamas militants who were targets of airstrikes, but several civilians also died." Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Palestinian Authority government, accused Israel "of 'going ahead with evil plans for a bloody military escalation and seeking the highest possible Palestinian losses.'"

Sudan Signs Peace Agreement With Eastern Rebels. The New York Times (10/15, Gettleman, 1.21M) reports, "The Sudanese government signed a peace deal on Saturday with a small rebel movement in the eastern part of the country" called the Eastern Front. It will "end fighting that has lasted 10 years though with nowhere near the intensity of the conflict in Darfur." The agreement gives the Eastern Front "more representation in the national and regional administrations, including high-ranking posts in Khartoum, the capital." Sudanese president Omar Hassan al-Bashir "called it an example of 'Africans solving an African problem without foreign help,' a clear reference to his government's continuing refusal to allow United Nations peacekeepers into Darfur."

The AP (10/15, Osman) adds, "Al-Bashir promised…that all the money that was being spent on war will be paid for development." This "agreement is considered a relief to Khartoum, which has been struggling to put down rebellions on both sides of the country, as well as to keep a shaky peace after a civil war with the south."

Somali Courts Embrace Varying Interpretations Of Islam. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Sanders, 918K) reports, "Four months after they seized control of Somalia's capital, Islamists have won widespread praise for reestablishing order and stability in Mogadishu and surrounding areas after 15 years of anarchy. But the Islamists are by no means uniform in their application of justice," and "a clash of ideologies has emerged between leaders of the Islamist union and nearly three dozen smaller, semiautonomous courts that function as local governments throughout southern Somalia. These clan-based courts, some of which have their own militias, sometimes pursue distinct and competing interpretations of Islamic law." While "On big issues…the Islamists show few signs of discord," as Somalis debating how to create an Islamic-based government, "cracks are beginning to show."

Kristof Extols Positive Aspects Of Islam. Nicholas Kristof writes in his column in the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M), "Islam sometimes comes across the airwaves in the West as the faith of medieval fanatics wielding swords and wearing explosive vests." However, those are "some stones in a complex mosaic. And those images can't explain why Islam appears to be in percentage terms the fastest-growing major religion in the world today." Islam provides "a firm moral code, spiritual reassurance and orderliness to people vexed by chaos and immorality around them, and they offer dignity to the poor," hence its growth. There is also "a broad ferment for more gender equality in the Muslim world," as part of "the thread of reform" that exists within it. Not only is Islam "much more complex than the headlines might suggest," but "we would be close-minded ourselves if we ignored the more hopeful rumblings that are also taking place within the vast Islamic world."

Venezuela Uses Petrodollars To Boost Security Council Seat. The New York Times/AP (10/15) reports, "As Venezuela lobbies for a U.N. Security Council seat, President Hugo Chavez has bolstered its chances by spreading petrodollars across the Americas and beyond," and, "Ironically, this aid is bankrolled in large part by oil sales to the United States." That "international support will be put to the test on Monday as Venezuela goes up against U.S.-backed Guatemala in a General Assembly vote." At least one country, Dominica, "has acknowledged that Venezuela's aid 'cannot go unnoticed' as a factor in the decision" to support Venezuela. At the same time, "Chavez's aid pledges…have come under attack ahead of Venezuela's Dec. 3 presidential vote by opposition candidate Manuel Rosales, who says poor Venezuelans need the money."

Ecuador Frontrunner's Intentions Unknown, But Of Concern To Washington. The Washington Post (10/15, A15, Forero, 748K) reports, "In his unlikely race to power, Rafael Correa is as anti-establishment as any politician on a continent where populists have surged by spewing invective against market reforms and the Bush administration," but "it remains unclear if Correa, the front-runner among a dozen candidates, would be a strident nationalist in the mold of Chávez or a center-left pragmatist." While "associates and some influential business executives who oppose him say he is a brilliant thinker who, though deeply concerned about the poor, is unlikely to follow the same path as Chávez," he "has cast himself as such a radical that Wall Street has winced with every point he has risen in the polls." Certainly "a win by a leftist with ties to Chávez -- particularly in a country where American oil companies have significant investments -- would be a setback for Washington."

Obrador Using Gubernatorial Election To Reinvigorate His Political Fortunes. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Enriquez, 918K) reports that Lopez Obrador's "political future, and that of his fledgling leftist movement, may rest on today's gubernatorial election in Tabasco." Obrador "spent the last several weeks campaigning for Cesar Raul Ojeda" and if he won it "would also be a triumph for Lopez Obrador." However, "Support for Lopez Obrador has dwindled since protesters closed down their Mexico City encampments a month ago after judges rejected demands for a national recount," and his "so-called campaign of civil resistance has scared people off."

"New Left" Said To Be Becoming More Influential In Chinese Policy. The New York Times (10/15, Mishra, 1.21M) reports that China's New Left "advocate a 'Chinese alternative' to the neoliberal market economy." They also disagree that a market economy inevitably encourages democracy. The New Left "view the Communist leadership as a likely force for change." While "New Leftists have never directed government policy, their concerns are increasingly amplified by the central leadership," and "this spring it began to become clear that the New Left's advocacy of a welfare state is being echoed within the Communist leadership, which is fearful of social instability and is keen to consolidate its power and legitimacy."

Kissinger Delves Into Role Of Secretary Of State. Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger writes in a review of Robert Beisner's "Dean Acheson: A Life in the Cold War," in the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) that "accolades for" Acheson "have become bipartisan," and "Secretaries of state appointed by the party of his erstwhile tormentors have described him as a role model; Condoleezza Rice is the most recent example." Acheson said, "'Americans must reconcile themselves to "limited objectives" and work in congress with others, for an essential part of American power was the "ability to evoke support from others -- an ability quite as important as the capacity to compel. The importance of that perception has not changed with the passage of time."

TERRORISM NEWS:

US May Charge KSM With Pearl Murder. McClatchy Newspapers (10/15, Rosenberg) reports, "U.S. military officials intend to charge Guantanamo Bay captive Khalid Sheikh Mohammed with the murder of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, according to a Time magazine report." However, "the Pentagon's chief war-crimes prosecutor told The Miami Herald on Friday that the Time report may be premature." Time "attributed to 'national security officials' the detail that Mohammed admitted under interrogation to having killed Pearl ... The magazine also reported that it compared the hands seen on the videotape executing Pearl to Mohammed's hands and confirmed it was him."

Final PENTTBOM Detainee Remains Jailed In Arizona. The AP (10/15, Mendoza) reported, "In a jail cell at an immigration detention center in Arizona sits a man who is not charged with a crime, not suspected of a crime, not considered a danger to society. But he has been in custody for five years. His name is Ali Partovi," and "he is the last to be held of about 1,200 Arab and Muslim men swept up" by US investigators after 9/11. The AP notes, "The FBI operation was called PENTTBOM; it was swift and fierce, and the stakes couldn't have been higher. When in doubt, the orders came, arrest now and ask questions later. … Then came demands, from Congress, from the Justice Department's Inspector General, from the ACLU and Human Rights Watch and from Arab and Muslim activists, that these individuals must be accounted for. To date that hasn't occurred. … Here's what is known: 762 of the 1,200 PENTTBOM arrestees were charged with immigration violations at the behest of the FBI because agents thought they might be associated with terrorism. Partovi was one of these 762."

Paralegal And Lawyer Are Ordered Not To Discuss Guantanamo Charges. The AP (10/14, Leitsinger) reports, "A paralegal and a military lawyer who brought forward allegations about prisoner abuse at the Guantanamo Bay detention center have been ordered not to speak with the press, lawyers and a military spokeswoman said Saturday." USMC Lt. Col. Colby Vokey and Sgt. Heather Cerveny have been directed "not to communicate with the media."

Military Defense Lawyers Fear For Careers. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Williams, 918K) reports, "The order has heightened fears among the military defense lawyers for Guantanamo prisoners that their careers will suffer for exposing flaws and injustices in the system," according to Muneer Ahmad, a law professor and lawyer for a detainee. Detainees' lawyers "say the personal stakes are high and point to the Navy's failure to promote Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift after he successfully challenged the legitimacy of the Pentagon's war-crimes commissions." In addition, "at least three other military defense lawyers for the 10 charged terrorism suspects have also been passed over for promotion in what some consider a subtle reprimand of their vigorous defense of their clients."

Plight Of Detainees Highlighted In Media. Following the Washington Post's previous coverage of Abdul Rahim, who claims he was wrongly sent to Guantanamo, the New York Times (10/15, Golden, 1.21M) reports, "Abdul Rahim Al Ginco thought he was saved when the United States invaded Afghanistan in 2001 and overthrew the Taliban regime. Mr. Ginco, a college student living in the United Arab Emirates, had gone to Afghanistan in 2000 ... But rather than help Mr. Ginco return home, American soldiers detained him again." Ginco "remains in the United States military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba -- in part, it appears, on the strength of a propaganda videotape made by his [Taliban] torturers." The Times observes that he appears in two, possibly coerced "propaganda videos" shot by the Taliban and that a law awaiting President Bush's signature "would also sweep away most federal court challenges to the detention of Guantánamo prisoners, including perhaps the one filed by American lawyers for Mr. Ginco, who is now 28."

Last 9/11 Detainee Languishes In Arizona Detention Center. The AP (10/15, Mendoza) reports in a highly critical article, "In a jail cell at an immigration detention center in Arizona sits a man who is not charged with a crime, not suspected of a crime, not considered a danger to society. But he has been in custody for five years. His name is Ali Partovi. And according to the Department of Homeland Security, he is the last to be held of about 1,200 Arab and Muslim men swept up by authorities in the United States after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks." After erroneous reportage that all such detainees had been freed, "the Department of Homeland Security insists he really is the last one in custody." The AP quotes several very critical human rights advocates and lawyers about the detention policies that followed 9/11 and also interviews Partovi by telephone.

LAT Applauds Prosecution Of US Terrorist In Contrast To Foreign Detainees. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, 918K) editorializes in support of charging Adam Yahiye Gadahn with treason, writing, "The government's attempts to circumvent the Constitution in its war on terror -- by establishing military tribunals lacking in due process and wiretapping Americans without a warrant -- have been roundly and rightly criticized. But in this case, the Justice Department is relying on the U.S. court system and the most venerable of U.S. laws to bring a high-profile U.S. operative of Al Qaeda to justice."

NYTimes Faults Supporters Of Military Commissions Act. The New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) editorializes about the Military Commissions Act, writing that Sen. Lindsey Graham "and other supporters of this dreadful legislation seem to have forgotten that American justice does not merely deliver swift punishment to the guilty. It also protects the innocent. ... Mr. Bush wants Americans to trust him to apply these powers only to truly dangerous men. Even if our system were based on that sort of personal power and not the rule of law, it would be hard to trust the judgment of a president and an administration whose records are so bad."

US Security Policy Could Help Free 9/11 Suspect In Germany. McClatchy Newspapers (10/15, Schofield) reports from Hamburg, Germany, "There is no dispute that Mounir el-Motassadeq was close to the men who carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. .. .He spent three months at an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan. He lived near lead hijacker Mohammed Atta in Hamburg and signed as the witness to Atta's will. He held power of attorney over the bank account of another hijacker, Marwan al-Shehhi. He transferred $2,500 to plotter Ramzi Binalshib. He even sent money to the United States that was used to help finance the hijackers' pilot training." McClatchy continues, "German authorities charged him with 3,066 counts of accessory to murder, and in February 2003 he was convicted — the first person to stand trial in the attacks. .. .But that conviction was overturned by a German appeals court in 2004. This year, he was ordered released pending resolution of appeals. … Now el-Motassadeq, who is free on bond, is about to learn whether U.S. security policy will help him walk away from criminal charges in the worst terrorist attack in American history." McClatchy adds, "A German court Thursday began a hearing into whether the accessory-to-murder charges should be restored. The German government is seeking a third trial in the matter. … Among the issues is whether the United States will allow German lawyers to question two key figures in the Sept. 11 plot: alleged ringleader Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and co-conspirator Binalshib."

Supermax Prison Housing Terrorists Is Understaffed. The AP (10/15, Tsai) reports, "Staffing at the Supermax prison [in Colorado] has gotten so low that job hazards have increased for correctional officers watching over the nation's worst terrorists," including al-Qaida member Zacarias Moussaoui, Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski and Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols, "an arbitrator has ruled. ... The American Federation of Government Employees had said assaults and threats increased after staffing at the Supermax was reduced last year." The AP notes, "Housing units at Supermax require three officers per shift, but entire units were sometimes left unstaffed, and cells were not being searched regularly, the arbitrator found."

Islamic Schools Test British Principle Of Integration. The New York Times (10/15, Cowell, 1.21M) reports on Islamic schools operating in Britain, "The visible differences -- the way female teenagers wear the full-length dress and head-covering and the boys wear black robes and skullcaps -- play into a ferocious debate about the sense of separateness or readiness to integrate Britain's estimated 1.8 million Muslims, about 3 percent of the population." The Times writes, "Only 7 Islamic schools receive public financing, compared with 36 Jewish schools, and about 7,000 Christian schools. The parents of just 3 percent of Muslim students enroll them in Islamic schools, where the education is generally rigorous and there is a code to nurture their Islamic identity, shield them from discrimination and provide moral guidance." However, some analysts express "fear that a premium on cultural separateness has Britain 'sleepwalking into segregation.'" One Islamic principal says that "students from Islamic schools…were not associated with either the religious and racial riots in northern England in the early 2000's or in any of the recent terrorism conspiracies," but police say that in heavily Muslim Leicester "they rounded up what they called an Al Qaeda cell" in 2002.

Hyde Park Visitors Discuss Islam. The Washington Post (10/15, A14, Corner, 748K) reports on a typical day at Speakers' Corner in Hyde Park, "The hot topics on this day were immigration in general and Muslim immigrants in particular." One woman asks Muslim women why they wear hijabs and has heard "heard answers ranging from 'I am happy to wear it' to 'It's the way of my husband.'"

PATRIOT ACT:

Ashcroft Claims ACLU Benefits From Its Attacks On The Patriot Act. In a short interview with the New York Times Magazine (10/15, Solomon) former US Attorney General John Ashcroft answered a question regarding the Patriot Act by saying, "After years of misrepresentation and pillorying by a variety of groups like the A.C.L.U. that ended up making a lot of money by opposing it and developed a lot of membership by opposing it, its renewal passed by 89 votes in the Senate. … If you think they don't care about membership, I think that's a naïve understanding of the way politics works in America."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Former Sen. Daschle Calls For Action In Anthrax Case. In a commentary for the Washington Post (10/15, B7, 748K), former Sen. Tom Daschle recalls the anthrax mailings that targeted his office and killed five people elsewhere. He points up four areas for improvement: "We ought to use this fifth anniversary of the attack to rededicate ourselves to solving the crime and ensuring that we are better prepared to confront similar attacks. First, the FBI and the Justice Department must treat this investigation with urgency. ... Second, the Sept. 11 commission called for the creation of an FBI national security workforce and for a recalibration of the FBI mission -- from sole concentration on its criminal justice mission and toward increased focus on national security. ... Third, progress on the investigation and needed reforms are hindered by a lack of congressional oversight. ... Finally, there has been precious little reform of our public health infrastructure to ensure that we are prepared for future terrorist attacks and health emergencies."

WAR NEWS:

Bush's Justification For War Seen As Evolving. The AP (10/15, Raum) reports, "President Bush keeps revising his explanation for why the U.S. is in Iraq, moving from narrow military objectives at first to history-of-civilization stakes now. ... 3 1/2 years later, with no weapons found, still no end in sight and the war a liability for nearly all Republicans on the ballot Nov. 7, the justification has become far broader and now includes the expansive 'struggle between good and evil.'" Brookings pundit Michael O'Hanlon said that the "shifting rationales" each had "some validity"; however, he added, "The problem is they can't change the realities on the ground in Iraq, which is that we're in the process of beginning to lose." The negative AP piece calls recent events "dispiriting" and contends, "The more ominous and determined his words, the more skeptical the American public appears."

26 Iraqis Dead After Revenge Killing Spree. The New York Times (10/15, Lou, Mizher, 1.21M) reports that Balad, "a rural Shiite town northwest of" Baghdad "exploded in sectarian reprisals on Saturday as angry residents, many roving the streets in armed packs on the backs of pickup trucks, killed at least 26 people from a nearby Sunni village" of Dhuluiya, following the discovery of "14 Shiite construction workers…beheaded bodies…in an orchard in Dhuluiya. The workers, from Balad, had been kidnapped. Hamad al-Qaisi, governor of Salahuddin Province, which includes both towns, met with "tribal sheiks to urge restraint. He said he exacted their promises to do what they could." He also "has asked the American military to help him impose order."

The Washington Post (10/15, A14, Knickmeyer, Aldin, 748K) adds that medical workers, residents, police and militia leaders said many of the dead were "brought to a hospital bearing the marks of electric drills and other signs of torture." According to Shiite leaders in Balad, "they responded to the farmworkers' killings by asking a Baghdad office of Moqtada al-Sadr, an influential Shiite cleric, to send militiamen and weapons." During the night "reinforcements from the Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry arrived and residents cowered in their homes." This "fighting in the Tigris River towns served as a microcosm of the Shiite-Sunni killing that has increased dramatically this year."

The AP (10/15, Bodeen) reports that, besides the 26 Sunni Arabs' deaths, "the U.S. military, meanwhile, reported the deaths of a Marine and four soldiers." Sectarian fighting "has killed 43 people so far in Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad."

US Military Works To Prepare Iraqis To Take Control Of Security. NBC Nightly News (10/14, story 3, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported that "in Baqouba, the Iraqi army is taking on increased responsibility for security with American forces providing support." NBC (Arraf): "In a region ripped apart by sectarian violence they are fighting an uphill battle to make Iraqis trust them." Col. Brian Jones, Cmdr. 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team: "As the al Qaeda elements come in the extremists from the Sunni side, the extremists from the Shia side, are coming in to combat them. And so again spinning into a cycle that continues to build." Arraf: "Brigadier General Dana Petard oversees military training teams. As Iraqi troops take on more responsibility Americans are working with them make sure they don't take sides." Brigadier General Dana Petard: "Any mission the transition teams are on, there is no problems with sectarian violence on those missions." Arraf: "The officers planning the latest raid have reasons to want revenge. 'We call this operation "hunting rats,"' this captain says. Their battalion, Sunni and Shia, has lost 170 of its 700 men over the last two years. But Colonel Ibrahim Abid tells them to make sure their soldiers treat people with respect. ... It is a cycle of violence that could spiral out of control unless people are persuaded to turn to the Iraqi army for protection."

Shakeup Begins In Iraqi Police. The AP (10/14, Rising) reports, "Iraq's Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry, whose police forces have been accused of complicity in sectarian attacks, has fired 3,000 employees accused of corruption or rights abuses and will change top commanders, a spokesman said Saturday." The spokesman said "up to 600" of the fired employees will be prosecuted. The AP comments, "The Shiite-led national police force, controlled by the Interior Ministry, is widely accused of being infiltrated by Shiite militias blamed in slayings of Sunni Arabs. Critics say Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has been reluctant to move against the militias since many are linked to parties in his coalition. ... Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite slum of about 2 million where radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia draws much of its support, has been left alone, and U.S. commanders say they are waiting on the command from al-Maliki's government." The Washington Times publishes an abbreviated version of this article.

Al Qaeda In Iraq Calls "Insurgent Video" Fake. The AP (10/14) reports, "Al-Qaida in Iraq said Saturday that a recent video tape made by a man claiming to be an insurgent who called for the replacement of the head of the terrorist group was fabricated. ... On Friday, a man who said he was an Iraqi Islamic insurgent released a video tape urging Osama bin Laden to replace al-Qaida in Iraq's leader with an Iraqi national." The umbrella Mujahedeen Shura Council claimed that the false videotape "shows the great dilemma that the Crusaders' coalition is passing through in Iraq especially after the calls for withdrawal that were released by the British army," a reference to the statement by Gen. Richard Dannatt. About 35 sites carried this story.

Attacks On Journalists In Iraq Continue. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Smith, Rasheed, 918K) reports, "Gunmen killed a radio journalist and kidnapped a television reporter, Iraqi police said Saturday, continuing a spate of attacks that has killed 14 media employees in recent weeks." The continuing attacks "are raising concern that the groups responsible for Iraq's sectarian bloodletting are turning their attention to the news media." Most of the recent victims have worked for "relatively independent" organizations. The Times continues, "The Committee to Protect Journalists, based in New York, reported Friday that 85 journalists and 35 media support workers had been killed in Iraq since March 2003, making the war there the deadliest conflict for the media in the last 25 years."

Disfigured Iraqi Girl Receives Plastic Surgery At UCLA. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Streeter, 918K) reports in a 5,399-word article on the 9-year-old Iraqi Marwa Naim, who was disfigured by shrapnel in an explosion that killed her mother. The Times reports, "The Americans were invading Baghdad, and Marwa Naim blamed them. She would never forget the explosion." However, "the UCLA Medical Center and its chief of plastic surgery, Dr. Tim Miller, offered to restore her face -- for free. But if Americans had hurt her, could they be trusted to heal her?" The Times describes her months of multiple surgeries in America and her bittersweet return to an unstable Iraq: "She said that she was happy to be home but that she was rarely allowed to go outside, because of the violence."

Besieged Baghdadis Seek Inspiration In Billboards. The AP (10/14, Hendawi) reports, "Thousands of posters and billboards dot Baghdad with messages of hope for a city of gloom, where residents largely stay home, afraid of the streets, their pain and grief deepening every day amid unending violence. ... The images are in stark contrast to the blitz of upbeat street ads that filled the Iraqi capital in the two years after Saddam Hussein's ouster in 2003." Today's billboards "are an unusually blunt acknowledgment of just how grave conditions have become" in a society where "the use of images is a particularly important part of" public life."

The bleak article describes what Baghdadis now see in daily life: "On any given day, citizens step from their homes to see police trucks loaded with dead, blood-drenched corpses, the beheaded bodies of men snatched from their homes or workplace by gunmen in police uniforms, body parts strewn across a street or dangling from a roof in the wake of a bombing. ... Baghdad has an unemployment rate of a staggering 30 percent. Power outages are routine and last up to three days at a time. The price of gasoline has risen by as much as 12-fold since Saddam's ouster and fuel is often scarce." More than 40 sites carried this story.

Baghdadis Turn To "Doctor Phil" For Comfort. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Daragahi, 918K) reports, "Syndicated and subtitled versions of 'Dr. Phil' and 'The Oprah Winfrey Show' are growing popular throughout the Middle East. For Iraqis, they offer a window to a world in which people are more concerned with bedroom and workplace foibles than mortar rounds and death squads." The Times follows a 50-year-old Iraqi family man who "worries about the unspeakable" but "hopes 'Dr. Phil' can serve as a substitute social world for his children, who aren't able to spend time with friends, date, or even leave their home after dusk."

Lawyers Try To Free American Held In Iraq. The New York Times (10/15, Lewis, 1.21M) reports, "An American citizen who was tried in an Iraqi court on charges that he had assisted in the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists last year has been sentenced to death, along with five Iraqi co-defendants, a spokesman for the United States Embassy in Baghdad said Saturday." Mohammad Munaf's lawyers have argued "that his death sentence undermined one of the United States government's principal arguments for transferring him, namely that he would be in no danger of physical abuse in Iraqi custody." The DOJ has argued "Mr. Munaf was not actually in United States custody but was being held by a multinational force." The Times lists earlier cases in which judges have ruled against the military's claim that "an American [is] being held by a multinational force" rather than by the US military.

NATO Commander Shifts To More Aggressive Tactics In Face Of Attacks. The New York Times (10/15, Gall, 1.21M) reports on NATO commander Lt. Gen. David Richards's assessment of the war with the Taliban. He "talked like a peacekeeper" when he arrived in Afghanistan, but "was quickly forced to put many of those plans aside and engage in hard fighting, not least to show the insurgents, and the wavering local population, that his troops were a force to be reckoned with." Richards's troops "came under repeated attacks, both on patrol and at their bases, forcing NATO to call in air and artillery strikes that inevitably killed scores of the very civilians he was trying to win over. It was not exactly the hearts-and-minds strategy he had planned." However, he "says that about 10 percent of the population in the south may support the Taliban, that 20 percent are opposed to them, and that the rest are stuck in the middle."

Two NATO Soldiers Are Killed. The New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) reports, "NATO reported that two of its soldiers died in combat in Kandahar Province on Saturday, and a bomb struck a provincial governor's convoy east of Kabul, the capital, narrowly missing him, Afghan officials said."

Boston Globe Denounces Tillman "Coverup." The Boston Globe (10/15, 425K) editorializes, "Of the thousands of deaths, military and civilian, in the Afghanistan and Iraq wars, none so captures the mix of patriotism, impulsiveness, and dishonesty in the US mission as the shooting death of Pat Tillman by members of his own platoon. ... Tillman's life and death have come under a new spotlight as a result of a revealing 12,749-word article by Gary Smith in Sports Illustrated," which reveals that he "told a fellow soldier that he thought the war was '[expletive] illegal.' According to Smith, Tillman was looking forward after his discharge to having a friend arrange a meeting with Noam Chomsky." The Globe concludes, "If the inspector general does not provide a persuasive and public accounting of what occurred, Congress should do the job itself."

Sen. Kerry Critiques Conduct Of War In Woodward Interview. In the Washington Post (10/15, 748K), Sen. John Kerry gives a 2,538-word interview with Bob Woodward in which Kerry sharply criticizes the administration's conduct of the war. Kerry faults the administration for failing to install a "pretty extensive outreach effort" (consisting of "President George Herbert Walker Bush, President Jimmy Carter, President Bill Clinton ... President Ford, Brent Scowcroft, Zbig Brzezinski, Jim Baker, George Shultz") before starting the GWOT and for ignoring Secretary of State Powell's misgivings. He adds about Iraq, "[I]t wasn't really until three months before the war starts that Bush got involved in aftermath planning," and charges that the administration ignored the "fairly elaborate plan" drawn up by the State Department.

Kerry sharply criticizes Secretary Rumsfeld, expressing "incredulity" at "the notion that you have to send people to war simply because you put them there." He concludes, "I think history is going to be very, very tough on not just the way the war has been managed, but on the way in which the decision to go to war was carried out."

Former Ambassador Dennis Ross Proposes "Plan For Iraq." In a commentary for the Washington Post (10/15, 748K), former Middle East negotiator Dennis Ross proposes three steps: "First, it's time for the Bush administration to insist that a national reconciliation conference be held and not be disbanded until agreement is reached on amendments to the constitution. ... Second, a long-discussed regional conference with all of Iraq's neighbors should be held. ... While Iraq's neighbors may agree on little else, the common interest of wanting to avoid an all-out civil war in Iraq could create a basis for a general set of understandings on what they will and will not do to help foster stability there. ... Third, President Bush should inform Maliki that we will not impose a deadline for withdrawal but we are going to negotiate with his government a timetable for our departure."

Lawyer Suggests More Advisors, Less Force In Iraq. In a commentary for the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M), lawyer and former "embedded advisor" Philip Carter writes, "When I finally left Baquba, the violent capital of Iraq's Diyala Province, I found myself questioning many aspects of our mission and our accomplishments, both in a personal search for meaning and a quest to gather lessons that might help those soldiers who will follow me." Carter worked "to build the provincial police so they could provide security and the rule of law." After his experiences, he warns, "This is the central paradox of the Iraq war in fall 2006: we are making progress in developing the Iraqi Army and police, yet the violence gripping the country continues to worsen. ... Given Iraq's historic antipathy to invaders and the strength of today's insurgency, I believe only a wholly unconventional approach will work. This means many more embedded advisers like myself, working in tandem with teams from the State Department and other agencies, supported by combat forces only when force is necessary."

Book Reviews Focus On Conduct Of Iraq War. In the Washington Post Book World (10/15), British journalist Martin Kettle writes of Hubris, "This [book], however, pulls together with unusually shocking clarity the multiple failures of process and statecraft that led so many people to persuade themselves that the evidence pointed to an active Iraqi program to develop weapons of mass destruction and that it was in the interests of the United States to overthrow Saddam Hussein."

New Biography Of Powell Portrays Him As "Loyal To A Fault." In a review for the Washington Post Book World (10/15), journalist George Packer discusses the new Colin Powell biography Soldier. Packer calls Powell "an uncommonly decent man, a stellar product of great American institutions. But when those institutions failed -- when the Bush administration took the country to war in Iraq, rashly and under false pretexts -- Powell did not have the imagination to challenge or, finally, defy the system that had made him." Secretary Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney are called "more intellectually aggressive" and "far more ruthless" than Powell in the run-up to war.

NYPost Review Praises New Book About Fallujah Retaking. In the New York Post (10/15, 608K), former Special Forces Lt. Col. Gordon Cucullu says of We Were One by Patrick O'Donnell, "With unprecedented initiative Patrick K. O'Donnell volunteered to live and fight alongside American soldiers and Marines in Iraq in order to construct a real-time, eyewitness history of the fighting." O'Donnell focuses on the Second Battle of Fallujah and puts a "human face on the troops who are fighting against some of the fiercest enemies America has ever encountered."

NYPost Review Praises New Max Boot Book. In the New York Post (10/15, 608K), columnist Ralph Peters says of War Made New: Technology, Warfare and the Course of History, 1500 To Today that it is "worth every penny. It's not only a terrific read; it's a cheap education on how, for half a millennium, machines made war and war made machines." However, Peters faults Boot for being "reluctant to burn bridges to establishment figures. Despite his fateful errors in Iraq, Donald Rumsfeld slips from the author's hands like a cobra covered in K-Y Jelly, eluding criticism."

Advocate Calls For VA To Better Plan To Handle Iraq, Afghanistan Veterans' Claims. CNN's This Week At War (10/14, 7:44 p.m., Roberts) recaps an earlier report by Sanjay Gupta about the demands that returning veterans put on the VA healthcare system. CNN then interviews Paul Sullivan of Veterans for America, who says VA faces a "crisis." Sullivan: "They have Vietnam veterans coming, still filing claims from the Vietnam war, veterans coming in an defiling claims from the Gulf War, and now we have returning Afghanistan and Iraq veterans to the tune of hundreds of thousands." Sullivan estimates this could result in 400,000 to 700,000 veterans seeking VA healthcare and benefits. Invited by the CNN interviewer, Sullivan drew a comparison to Vietnam veterans, saying veterans may file claims that aren't immediately obvious and develop over years. Sullivan says, "Right now, VA has a window of opportunity. They have no plan to address this huge tidal wave of veterans coming back and congress and the Department of Veterans affairs need to act now: Develop a plan, collect some data," and "find out how much this is going to cost taxpayers."

Morford Takes Over As Interim US Attorney In Nashville. The Nashville City Paper (10/15, Allen) reports, "Just before he left office, Jim Vines, who recently stepped down as Nashville's U.S. Attorney, said one of his greatest accomplishments was building up the Nashville office to a point where it could handle another Tennessee Waltz-type investigation. … 'Even though it centered around the legislature, it had to be handled out of the Memphis office,' Vines said last month in an interview with The City Paper, explaining that when the investigation into corruption at the Capitol began, the Nashville office was simply not up to the task of leading it. … 'But if we were to have another ethics scandal, we could do it here now,' Vines said. … So it seems fitting that after Vines' exit, the man selected to replace him – at least in the interim – is credited with cleaning up what was formerly the single most corrupt city is the United States: Youngstown, Ohio." The City Paper continues, "Youngstown is the hometown of former U.S. Rep James Traficant, who was indicted on federal corruption charges in 2002 and sentenced to eight years in prison. … For decades, most of Youngstown's local leaders were controlled by mafia bosses, who routinely blew up one another with car bombs. … That was until a U.S. attorney named Craig S. Morford arrived in Cleveland." The City Paper adds, "Over a period of five years, Morford investigated, prosecuted and convicted 70 individuals, including mob bosses, the county sheriff, county prosecutor, a nearby police chief, four judges and 10 attorneys. … Two weeks ago, the U.S. Department of Justice named Morford to head up the Nashville U.S. Attorney's Office. … The appointment is temporary for now – Morford's family is staying in Cleveland for the time being – but the career prosecutor, armed with decades of experience in high-profile cases, is already diving into his job in Nashville. … And he is prepared to lead the office in whatever direction it needs to go."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Options Probe Tarnishes Finance Jobs. The San Francisco Chronicle (10/15, D - 1, Said) reports, "Headhunter Larry Ormsby was seeking a new chief financial officer for a

DOJ_NMG_0081414

Silicon Valley company recently. Then news cropped up that one of his candidates had big black mark on his resume: The company where he had previously been CFO was implicated in the stock options backdating scandal now grabbing headlines. … 'That was enough for us to say, "Let's not pursue this person,"' said Ormsby, senior client partner at Korn/Ferry International in San Francisco specializing in CFO and other senior finance positions. 'Clients aren't comfortable making a hire when there is some gray area of uncertainty about what happened' at a candidate's previous jobs." The Chronicle continues, "People caught up in probes over improper backdating of stock options may have bigger worries than their next job. But recruitment experts and others say the scandal may tarnish the careers of those in decision-making positions at the companies being investigated, regardless of whether they are ever charged with a crime. … About 125 companies, nearly a quarter of them in Silicon Valley, are facing probes over whether they improperly granted stock options that were retroactively linked to dates when their stock price was low, thus giving recipients a leg up on potential profits. Such backdating is illegal unless it is disclosed and accounted for properly -- something that many companies evidently failed to do." The Chronicle adds, "Investigators from the Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and the companies themselves are sifting through documents to try to figure out who did what when. … About 30 executives and board members have gotten the ax over their involvement in backdating, but experts expect the toll to rise as companies finalize investigations of themselves. Only two cases so far have resulted in criminal charges being filed."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Mehlman Allegedly Ordered State Dept. Official's Ouster At Abramoff's Behest. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Wallsten, 918K) in an article titled, "Displease A Lobbyist, Get Fired," reports, "For five years, Allen Stayman wondered who ordered his removal from a State Department job negotiating agreements with tiny Pacific island nations -- even when his own bosses wanted him to stay. Now he knows. Newly disclosed e-mails suggest that the ax fell after intervention by one of the highest officials at the White House: Ken Mehlman, on behalf of one of the most influential lobbyists in town, Jack Abramoff. The e-mails show that Abramoff, whose client list included the Northern Mariana Islands, had long opposed Stayman's work advocating labor changes in that U.S. commonwealth, and considered what his lobbying team called the 'Stayman project' a high priority." According to the Times, "The latest revelations provide more detail than the Bush administration has acknowledged about how Abramoff and his team reached into high levels of the White House, not just Capitol Hill, which has been the main focus of the influence-peddling investigation. The e-mails, disclosed as part of a report by the House Government Reform Committee, show how Abramoff manipulated the system through officials such as Mehlman." The Times notes Mehlman "said he did not recall the details of his contacts with the Abramoff team, including discussions about Stayman."

Weldon Was Unaware Of FBI Corruption Investigation. The AP (10/15, Hefling, Jordan) reports on the active FBI investigation of Rep. Curt Weldon regarding whether he "used his influence to secure lobbying and consulting contracts for his daughter," Karen Weldon. The AP notes that Weldon's chief of staff, Russ Caso, "said Saturday no one had notified him of an investigation. … Caso said Weldon and his staff were '100 percent caught off guard' when they learned of the investigation, first reported late Friday by McClatchy Newspapers." The AP adds, "Two people familiar with the investigation told the AP on Saturday that the inquiry was being handled by agents from the FBI's field offices in Washington and Philadelphia and was being coordinated by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section."

Police Chiefs Blame Rise In Violent Crime On Federal Focus On Homeland Security. NBC Nightly News (10/14, story 5, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Iowa tonight authorities are investigating the death of a family of five, in an unrelated case a family of four was found murdered Friday along the Florida turnpike. Examples of a growing trend in this country, violent crime on the rise." NBC (Williams): "Many police chiefs claim the Federal government has put so much emphasis on homeland security it is neglecting crime on the street."

Web Gambling Sites Continue Advertising Despite Crackdown. The AP (10/15, Caruso) reports, "Despite repeated warnings from law enforcement officials, offshore Internet gambling companies have continued to advertise heavily in the United States." The AP continues, "Giant billboards in Manhattan, some several stories high, brazenly advertise Internet gambling sites like Sportsbook.com, now based in Antigua. … Promotions for BetUS, a Canadian and Costa Rican company that takes wagers on American sports, run regularly on the Howard Stern Show on Sirius Satellite Radio. Fantasy football magazines on sale at newsstands are packed with ads for online bookies and casinos." The AP adds, "The advertisements -- which the companies insist are legal -- have helped attract millions of customers to online gambling, and may have left the impression that both the ads and online wagering are legal. … They are not, said Paul Larrabee, a spokesman for New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. … 'Gaming and bookmaking are not legal in New York, so anyone who markets to a New Yorker may be in violation of New York state law,' Larrabee said. 'We have done case after case after case involving instances where an act that is illegal in New York is marketed to New Yorkers.' … Actual prosecutions of advertisers for promoting gambling are rare, however, and media companies accepting the ads insist they are breaking no law. … That position sometimes hangs on a looser interpretation of gambling laws. … ESPN, for example, runs ads for online poker sites during its broadcasts of the Word Series of Poker, but says it does so only for Web pages that don't actually process bets. … 'We only accept advertising for educational, learn-to-play, for-free sites,' said ESPN spokeswoman Keri Potts. … Many of these so-called 'educational' sites, however, are simply companion pages to full-fledged gambling operations, easily reachable with a few mouse clicks or by changing the last few characters of a Web address from '.net' to '.com.' … Potts said it wasn't up to ESPN to investigate those affiliations. … The Justice Department has taken a different view. In 2003 it warned that publishers and broadcasters who advertise gambling sites could be prosecuted for aiding and abetting a crime. … A year later, federal authorities pressured the parent company of the Discovery Channel into forfeiting $6 million in advertising money that had come from online poker sites."

Web Data Controls Seen As Lacking. The AP (10/15) reports, "If you don't like what your favorite Internet search engine or e-commerce site does with information it collects about you, your options are limited to living with it or logging off." The AP continues, "Major search engines, for instance, all keep records of your searches for weeks, months or even years, often tied to your computer's Internet address or more. Retailers, meanwhile, generally presume the right to send marketing e-mails. … Although online companies have become better at disclosing data practices, privacy advocates say the services' stated policies generally don't give consumers real choice. … 'None of them have gotten to the point of giving a lot of controls in users' hands,' said Ari Schwartz, deputy director of the technology watchdog group Center for Democracy and Technology. Privacy policies 'are about notice ... not about control.'" The AP adds, "Recent developments - from companies losing laptops containing sensitive data to Time Warner Inc.'s AOL releasing customers' search terms - have again turned the spotlight on Internet privacy. … But the push for stronger federal protections is countered by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' desire to require Internet providers preserve customer records to help prosecutors fight child pornography. Officials have released few details, though they say any proposal would keep the data in company hands until the government seeks a subpoena or other lawful process." The AP notes, "Federal law already limits how personal financial and health care data may be used, but U.S. privacy laws are generally considered weak compared with Europe and Canada. … Industry groups have stepped in with guidelines that go beyond legal requirements."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

San Francisco Behind Schedule For Police-Conduct Plan. The San Francisco Chronicle (10/15, A-1, Sward) reports, "Eight months after Mayor Gavin Newsom vowed to ride 'roughshod' over the Police Department to ensure adoption of a computerized system to track officers' use of force and other conduct, the plan has yet to be submitted to the Police Commission for a vote." The Chronicle continues, "In a February interview, after The Chronicle reported on use of force by San Francisco officers, Newsom said he wanted such a system adopted by the end of the year and added the move was 'in the best interest of the department in terms of public confidence and a kind of respect we are hoping to build again ...' … Since then, negotiations over the system's details have not led to a formal agreement by the participants, which include the department, the American Civil Liberties Union and the Police Officers Association." The Chronicle adds, "The proposal, which involves complex technology, has yet to be put out to bid, and the department -- rather than talking about having the system in place by year's end as the mayor pledged -- is now saying it plans to have a pilot program operating before the year is over. … Deputy Police Chief Charles Keohane said the proposed tracking system will soon be presented to the department's command staff and then will be forwarded to the Police Officers Association, which has "meet and confer" rights on any such change. … A series of articles in The Chronicle in February reported that about 100 San Francisco officers were responsible for a quarter of the incidents of force logged by the 2,100-officer department from 1996-2004, and that in recent years San Francisco officers had more force allegations filed against them than those in San Jose, Oakland, San Diego and Seattle combined. … The series also found that the department did not have an effective, computerized system for tracking the performance of officers and often failed to intervene with officers who reported using force much more than their peers."

Louisiana Community Continues Dialogue After Racial Bus Incident. The Shreveport (LA) Times (10/15, Welborn) reports, "A second community forum held Saturday (in Coushatta, LA) in response to an August incident in which nine black children allege they were seated at the back of a school bus because of their race drew a much smaller but no less interested crowd." The Times continues, "About 50 people gathered in Springville Baptist Church, compared to the 200 or so that crowded inside Will of God Ministries in early September for the first public forum. Only a sprinkling of adults indicated Saturday they did not attend last month's session. … Not in attendance were the parents or the children at the center of issue that has gained worldwide attention. But they were represented by Patricia Wilson-Sessoms and her mother, Coushatta councilwoman Rosetta Wilson, both of whom are related to three of the children." The Times adds, "Sessoms said she wished more had attended Saturday, but she realizes there were many events going on in Coushatta and other communities that likely drew people away. Still, she's pleased that the community dialogue is continuing and she looks forward to the next step in the process that is being led by Carmelita Pope Freeman, southwest regional director of the Justice Department's Community Relations Service. … Within the next few weeks, Sessoms and others will build teams that will act as negotiators in a meeting with the school system's negotiators." The Times notes, "More than bus seating is drawing comments from the public. Hiring practices, teacher certification, discipline, pupil-teacher ratios, testing and much more have been listed as concerns when it comes to the Red River Parish school system. … But it was the bus situation that has gained the most attention. The nine children complained at the beginning of school in mid August that their white bus driver, Deloris Davis, made them give up their seats to the white children. After the children's mothers filed racial discrimination complaints with the school system, Davis made new seating assignments but still put the children at the rear of the bus on two seats."

ENVIRONMENT:

Farmers Collect Multiple Forms Of Federal Aid For Single Disaster. As part of a series titled, "Harvesting Cash: Double-Dipping When Disaster Strikes," the Washington Post (10/15, A1, Gaul, Morgan, Cohen, 748K), in a front-page article titled, "Aid Is A Bumper Crop For Farmers," reports that "shortly after passing the Agricultural Risk Protection Act" in 2008, Congress "lost its fiscal will. One week before the presidential election, it passed a new $1.8 billion disaster bill to assist farmers hurt by bad weather. Two others followed in subsequent years, totaling more than $6 billion. Today, after a searing drought in the Plains, farm-state legislators are pushing for billions more in aid. The result is that farmers often get paid twice by the government for the same disaster, once in subsidized insurance and then again in disaster assistance, a legal but controversial form of double-dipping, a Washington Post investigation found."

In a related article the Washington Post (10/15, Gaul, 748K) profiles a farmer in North Carolina who received $4.7 million in federal disaster payments between 2001 and 2005. In another related piece, the Washington Post (10/15, Gaul, Cohen, 748K) reports, "There is an alternative to giving struggling farmers emergency disaster aid after every drought, hurricane and storm. … They can take out federally subsidized low-interest loans up to $500,000 for each disaster they experience. But the farmers tend to pass up the emergency loans in favor of the emergency cash."

Federal Aid Rules Said To Influence Crop Decisions. The Washington Post (10/15, A13, Gaul, 748K) reports, "Crop insurance helps to protect farmers against the vagaries of weather. But it can also alter the landscape of farming in a region, resulting in higher losses for taxpayers. Consider the lowly sweet potato. For years, it was excluded from federal crop insurance. But in the late 1990s, growers and legislators in North Carolina successfully lobbied federal officials for coverage. Soon, the number of acres planted with sweet potatoes was doubling and tripling, as were the claims filed by farmers."

Government Programs Bring Fresh Produce To Urban Areas. The Washington Post (10/15, A3, Goldstein, 748K) reports on "a new strategy for social change: a government campaign to bring supermarkets stocked with healthful food into neglected inner-city neighborhoods to improve public health. The Pennsylvania Fresh Food Financing Initiative, leveraging $30 million in state money with $90 million in private funds, is the most ambitious of a spate of state and local projects around the country. They represent a different model for public nutrition programs, which have relied since the 1960s on federal subsidies, such as food stamps and WIC."

CMS Genetic Testing Rules Considered Inadequate. The Washington Times (10/15, Price, 88K) reports, "Some scientists and consumer health groups are angry that the U.S. Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) has decided not to write new rules designed to improve the quality of laboratories that perform genetic testing, keeping in place current guidelines. … Late last month, the Genetics and Public Policy Center -- along with the Genetic Alliance and the Public Citizen Health Research Group -- filed a petition with CMS demanding the agency create a 'genetic testing specialty' under the provisions of the Clinical Laboratories Improvement Amendments (CLIA) of 1988, which CMS administers. The groups argued that additional regulation was necessary to ensure high-quality genetic test results, which they say are now used to diagnose more than 900 diseases."

Faith Community Taking More Activist Stance Against Global Warming. The New York Times (10/15, Banerjee, 1.21M) reports, "Over the last year, religious activism on global warming has won much attention. Last February, 86 evangelical Christian leaders backed an initiative to combat global warming, a move that broke the evangelical movement's broad silence on the issue but exposed stark divisions." This month, 4,000 congregations of various faiths will show films on global warming, including 'An Inconvenient Truth.' [On Oct. 8, Christian, Muslim, Jewish and Buddhist leaders met in Philadelphia to discuss global warming.]" And "Greg Wickersham, a high school teacher and a member of the environmental ministry at Intown Community Church in Atlanta, which is affiliated with the theologically conservative Presbyterian Church in America, says, 'If you do worship the Creator, you take care of his creation.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Cartel Informant Lashes Out At US. The Dallas Morning News (10/15, Corchado) reports, "A former informant whose participation in drug-related murders in Mexico caused turmoil in the U.S. agency that paid him says that there were more killings than reported and that drug corruption extends into the U.S. and Mexican governments." The News continues, "In sworn testimony and in response to questions submitted through his attorney, Guillérmo Eduardo Ramírez Peyro, the man known as 'Lalo,' provided new details about his work as a drug cartel operative and as a U.S. government informant, and he claimed to have personal knowledge of extensive government corruption." The News adds, "Mr. Ramírez also lashed out at his former U.S. employers, saying they are turning their backs on him after he helped them apprehend dozens of drug traffickers. … 'With the names I provided they were able to arrest more than 50 people, and they took millions of dollars from drug proceeds from U.S. streets,' he said. 'In spite of that, I'm jailed here without any protection and without any guarantee that I will stay in the United States.'" The News notes, "Mr. Ramírez, 35, is being held by the U.S. government at an undisclosed location in the Midwest, fighting deportation to Mexico, where he insists he faces 'certain death.' … U.S. authorities characterize him as a renegade informant whose independent actions led, in part, to the August 2004 killing of an El Paso man, Abraham Guzmán, outside a hamburger restaurant in that border city. … Mr. Ramírez made his remarks in a written response to questions submitted through his attorney, Jodi Goodwin. He had agreed to speak with reporters from The Dallas Morning News, which first reported about his role in the cartel killings in March 2004; the Mexico city weekly magazine Proceso; the London Observer; and Narco News, an Internet blog, but prison officials transferred him hours before the scheduled interview."

IMMIGRATION:

Newspapers Seek Data On Immigrant Convicts. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/15, Carr) reports, "A federal court of appeals hears oral arguments Tuesday in a case that has broad implications in the debate over illegal immigration and the public's right to know about illegal immigrant convicts who have not been deported as required by law." The AJC continues, "Cox Newspapers is asserting in its appeal that the Justice Department should release the names, birthdates and identity numbers of illegal immigrants who have served prison time for serious crimes, including child molestation, manslaughter, drug dealing and drunken driving. … Cox, which includes The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, revealed in a published report four years ago that hundreds of felons were never picked up in Georgia by immigration officials after serving their sentences." The AJC adds, "The Justice Department says that it has turned over some of the information requested by Cox under the Freedom of Information Act, which requires federal agencies to disclose government records to the public. The department gave Cox information about the illegal immigrants, including convicts' native country, date taken into custody and date of release, according to legal briefs filed in federal court. … But divulging personally identifiable information such as their full name, date of birth, alien registration number and FBI number would invade the privacy of convicted illegal immigrants and serve no public interest, Justice Department lawyers wrote in legal briefs." The AJC notes, "The case raises the question of whether illegal immigrants should be granted the same privacy protections that citizens and legal residents have in the Freedom of Information Act. … The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that privacy protections extend to personally identifying information and they encompass criminal convictions that are a matter of public record, Justice Department lawyers wrote in a legal brief."

GOP's Split Over Immigration Said To Be Most Evident In Arizona. In a extensive 8,279-word piece for the New York Times Magazine (10/15) Joseph Lelyveld writes, "In Arizona, it becomes evident, the battle over illegal immigration is, in one of its dimensions, a battle over the future of the Republican Party in the state and, because of [Sen. John] McCain's ambitions, nationally as well. It also becomes evident that what anti-immigrant zealots call an 'invasion' is taking place not in spite of federal policies but, at least in Arizona, partly because of them." Lelyvel asks, "how come, if the issue of illegal immigration is the House majority's ticket to remaining in power, its own creature, the National Republican Campaign Committee, was spending money in the Republican primary held last month to defeat…a down-the-line, seal-the-border, anti-immigrant crusader named Randy Graf, in the one House race in Arizona in which a seat was clearly up for grabs? A self-proclaimed Minuteman, running in the Eighth Congressional District…Graf was leading in polls of likely primary voters. Yet the smart money in both parties seemed to be betting that a Graf victory would guarantee that the seat, Republican for the last 22 years, would swing Democratic. So while national parties normally steer clear of local primaries…out-of-state Republican money was flowing in the Eighth to a moderate with a 'common sense' approach to immigration issues not unlike John McCain's, while national Democratic money, in a peculiar twist, was paying for ads portraying that same moderate as a wimp on illegals, in hopes of putting the supposedly beatable Randy Graf over the top in the other party's primary."

Hispanic Immigrants Drive US Population To 300 Million. The Washington Times (10/15, Price, 88K) reports the U.S. Census Bureau "says it expects the nation's population to reach 300 million on Tuesday, 39 years after the 200 million mark was reached and 91 years after the county's population hit 100 million." The Times goes on to report that the primary engine of population growth in the US has been the influx of Hispanic immigrants. According to the Times, "The first effort to count them came in the 1970 census, which found a total U.S. population of 203 million and 9.6 million Hispanics. There are about 43 million Hispanics in the country today, according to the Census Bureau." By 2050 Hispanics "will account for about a quarter of the U.S. population."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Dedicates Air Force Memorial. NBC Nightly News (10/14, story 8, 2:00, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Unlike the Army, Navy and the Marines, the Air Force has not had a memorial to its veterans near our nation's capital. That changed today on a hilltop in Arlington, Virginia, when President Bush dedicated a striking monument to the men and women of the youngest branch of the military." He "honored the 54,000 men and women of the Air Force who died in combat." Bush: "To all that climbed and chased the shouting wind America stops to say your service and sacrifice will be remembered forever." Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld: "We commemorate the aviators who captured our country's imagination and proved critical to the defense of our nation time and again." Siegenthaler: "With the nation again at war, veterans say they hope it inspires future generations to serve." Unidentified: "Most people out here come and immediately get it. They understand what the memorial is all about."

Noting Bush's reference to the war against terrorism both the AP and the Washington Times (10/15, Emerling, 88K) quote Bush saying, "And looking from this promontory to a place once filled with smoke and flames, we remember why we need them."

The AP (10/15, Loven) reports, "President Bush helped the Air Force make a dream come true on Saturday, dedicating a hilltop monument for the service to the memory of airmen lost defending America and to those that fight for it still." Bush said, "To all who have climbed sunward and chased the shouting wind, America stops to say your service and sacrifice will be remembered forever and honored in this place by the citizens of a free and grateful nation."

In its metro section the Washington Post (10/15, C11, Shapira, 748K) focuses on the experience of veterans at the ceremony and only mentions that Bush and Rumsfled made speeches as "hundreds of VIPs joined current and retired Air Force brass underneath the dizzying monument."

Despite Public Support For Son, Aides To Bush's Father Say Discord A Reality. The New York Daily News (10/15, DeFrank, 729K) reports, "At this month's christening of the nuclear aircraft carrier bearing his name, former President George H.W. Bush delivered a rousing endorsement of his son. 'I am very proud of our President,' the elder Bush said in rain-swept ceremonies in Newport News, Va. 'I support him in every single way with every fiber in my body.'" However, "Many of his closest former aides beg to differ. Indeed, one of the worst-kept secrets in Bush World is the dismay, in some cases disdain, harbored by many senior aides of the former President toward the administration of his son -- 41 and 43." The Daily News continues, "As the war in Iraq has worsened and public support for the current administration has tanked, loyalists of the elder Bush have found it impossible to suppress their disillusionment -- particularly their belief that many of 43's policies are a stick in the eye of his father." One "key member of 41's team said, 'Forty-three has now repudiated everything 41 stands for, and still he won't say a word. Personally, I think he's dying inside.'"

Increase In Uninsured Children Coincides With Bush's Years In Office. The Los Angeles Times' Ronald Brownstein (10/15) writes, "Until recently, children had been a bright spot in a dismal healthcare picture. Since President Bush took office, the total number of people in America without insurance has jumped from 39.8 million in 2000 to more than 46.5 million in 2005. The percentage of people receiving healthcare through their employer has dropped every year since 2000. Children haven't been immune to that trend. The share of children receiving healthcare through their parents' employer has also been falling. But until last year, government had stepped in to offset those losses." In 2005, "with state budgets squeezed, the number of children receiving insurance from public programs also fell. These twin retrenchments produced a jump of nearly 400,000 in the number of uninsured children -- the largest annual increase since 1995."

Bush Seen As Taking More Aggressive Stance On Issues As Elections Approach. Julie Mason in her "White House Watch" column in the Houston Chronicle (10/15, 535K) reports, "With the Republican political message galloping out of his control in the final weeks of the congressional campaign, President Bush tried corralling it last week with a news conference in the Rose Garden" which was noteworthy because "Bush has been using a different speaking style lately, with more angry-sounding, often highly partisan rhetoric and stronger body language." Bush "grips the podium, jabs a finger and raises his voice. He squares his shoulders, mocking Democrats and scoffing at critics of his policies." He is "in full-throttle campaign mode" because if he "can't lead his party to another majority in the House and Senate, his domestic agenda may wind up as scraps of forgotten rhetoric. He could also face stronger and more effective resistance to his Iraq policy."

Man Arrested After Jumping White House Fence. The AP (10/15) reports, "The Secret Service on Saturday apprehended a man who climbed over the fence along the North Lawn of the White House. Around 6:30 p.m. EDT, Alexis Janicki, 24, jumped the fence, said Secret Service spokeswoman Kim Bruce. He was immediately apprehended by the Secret Service uniformed division and taken into custody." He "was charged with trespassing and possession of a controlled substance, which was cannabis … President Bush was at the presidential retreat at Camp David in Maryland when the incident occurred."

Low Gas Prices Boost Economy But Expert Warns Prices Could Increase Sharply. NBC Nightly News (10/14, story 10, 2:20, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The continuing fall of gasoline prices is fueling record highs in the stock market, and raising consumer confidence. The monthly consumer survey is at its highest point in more than a year as the prices at the pump slid for the eighth straight week. The national average stands at $2.24 a gallon." Energy analyst John Kilduff: "The collapse in prices we are experiencing is unprecedented. We have never seen it go from being so valuable to be so unvaluable in relation to crude oil. Still looking for prices on a national average to break $2.00. Really none of our worst fears materialized." But Kilduff noted the US has "a huge vulnerability because a lot of the crude oil we rely on is in countries and places that are unfriendly towards the US" and that the US is "merely a headline or two away from $70 or $80 oil again."

OPEC To Consider Voluntary Supply Cuts. The New York Times/Bloomberg (10/15) reports that OPEC "will hold an emergency meeting in Doha, Qatar, on Oct. 19 to discuss a 1 million barrel-a-day output cut, an OPEC delegate said." They will "discuss a voluntary supply cut aimed at reviving oil prices that have fallen by a quarter in the last three months. Members will debate whether to cut actual production or to lower the cartel's 28 million barrel-a-day output quota."

Competition Fails To Lead To Decrease In Electricity Utility Rates. The New York Times (10/15, Johnston, 1.21M) reports, "A decade after competition was introduced in their industries, long-distance phone rates had fallen by half, air fares by more than a fourth and trucking rates by a fourth. But a decade after the federal government opened the business of generating electricity to competition, the market has produced no such decline." The Times notes, "Instead, more rate increase requests are pending now than ever before, said Jim Owen, a spokesman for the Edison Electric Institute, the association for the investor-owned utilities that provide about 60 percent of the nation's power. … The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and other federal agencies warn in a draft report to Congress that 'customers may experience rate shock' as utilities seek to make up for revenue they did not collect during the period of artificially reduced prices and to cover higher costs of fuel. They warned that 'this rate shock can create public pressure' to turn back from electricity prices set by the market to prices set by government regulators."

Recent Decline In Workers' Wages And Benefits Compared To Rise In 1990s. Eduardo Porter in an "Economic View" article in the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) states, "Five years into a relatively robust economic expansion, it's understandable that many American workers feel that they are not getting their fair share of the pie." It's because "the share of the economy devoted to workers' wages and benefits has eroded in the United States over the last five years. But if it's any consolation, the trend for workers in other rich industrial nations isn't much better." According to the Bureau of Economic Analysis workers' wages and benefits "declined 2.5 percentage points from 2000 to 2005, to 56.5 percent of" GDP. That's in contrast to the late 1990s "when robust growth bolstered employment and increased labor's bargaining power. Workers' share of the economy grew 2.3 percentage points from 1995 to 2000."

Federal Reserve May Postpone Interest Rate Cut Over Concern About Inflation. Conrad De Aenlle in a "Market Week" article in the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) writes, "Just when it looked as though a Federal Reserve interest-rate cut might be on the way, the Fed sent a message to Wall Street: not so fast. That, at least, was the way many traders interpreted the record, released last week, of the last meeting of the central bank's policy makers. It revealed that the policy makers continue to be concerned about inflation. That concern had been largely lifted in the minds of traders, but the Fed's statement is likely to revive it, especially this week, when reports are due on September wholesale and retail prices."

Bush And Rove's Optimism About Midterms Described As A "Self-Delusion." The Washington Post (10/15, A4, Abramowitz, 748K), in an article titled "White House Upbeat About GOP Prospects: Self-Assurance of Bush, Rove and Others Is Not Shared by Many in the Party," reports, "Amid widespread panic in the Republican establishment about the coming midterm elections, there are two people whose confidence about GOP prospects strikes even their closest allies as almost inexplicably upbeat: President Bush and his top political adviser, Karl Rove." Although "some" Republicans "are bracing for losses of 25 House seats or more," Rove "is predicting that, at worst, Republicans will lose only 8 to 10 seats." As for the Senate, Rove is said to believe, "a Democratic victory would require the opposition to 'run the table,' as one official put it, to pick up the necessary six seats -- a prospect the White House seems to regard as nearly inconceivable." The Post adds, "The official White House line of supreme self-assurance comes from the top down. Bush has publicly and privately banished any talk of losing the GOP majorities, in part to squelch any loss of nerve among his legions. … The question is whether this is a case of justified confidence -- based on Bush's and Rove's electoral record and knowledge of the money, technology and other assets at their command -- or of self-delusion. Even many Republicans suspect the latter. Three GOP strategists with close ties to the White House flatly predicted the loss of the House, though they would not do so on the record for fear of offending senior Bush aides."

GOP Hopes To Counter Democrats' Enthusiasm With Proven GOTV Effort. The New York Times (10/15, Toner, 1.21M) reports, "Pollsters say enthusiasm among Democrats is particularly high this year — significantly higher, by several important measures, than the intensity of Republicans. Republican strategists counter that they can compensate for any gap in enthusiasm with their legendary get-out-the-vote operation. The party has built its electoral success in the last two elections on identifying and producing nearly every obtainable Republican vote at the polls; this time may be more challenging, they say, but no different. 'I do think our base is coming together and will be coming together later, but four weeks is an eternity in this business,' said Representative Tom Cole, an Oklahoma Republican and longtime party strategist. Republicans will ultimately be motivated to vote, Mr. Cole said, and they will turn out on Election Day even if 'this is a race where professionalism has to make up for enthusiasm.'" The Times goes on to report, "The Republican machine was on full display last weekend in Ohio, where volunteers worked phone banks in all 88 counties on what the party called Super Saturday. They contacted 100,000 carefully selected potential Republican voters and knocked on the doors of 50,000."

The AP (10/15, Sidoti) reports, "In the battle for control of Congress, Democrats hope enthusiasm trumps Republican efficiency. Otherwise, they concede, they will have problems on Nov. 7 as a party still struggling to catch up with the GOP's ability to turn voters out of seeming thin air. 'Makes me green with envy,' says Ellen Malcolm, the president of EMILY's List, which backs female candidates who support abortion rights. She was speaking of the Republican Party program that relies on reams of polling data, publicly available information and consumer choice records to identify likely GOP voters in even the most Democratic precincts."

Most Congressional Incumbents Safe Despite Series Of Scandals. The Washington Times (10/15, Lambro, 88K) reports, "The overwhelming majority of House incumbents have little if any serious opposition in November's midterm elections, whose outcome likely will be decided by 30 to 40 tossup races out of a total of 435 contests. That is the inherent contradiction in an election portrayed as a titanic battle of fed-up voters unhappy with members of Congress when, in fact, a majority approve of their representatives' performance in office and are expected to return most incumbents to Washington, many by large majorities. … While voter approval of Congress has plunged to 32 percent in the wake of the lobbying and congressional-page scandals, a Washington Post-ABC News poll of voters last week found that at least 60 percent liked and supported their representatives."

Washington Scandals Dog House Members Seeking Statewide Office. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Barabak, 918K) reports Rep. Jim Gibbons "has represented a big chunk of Nevada in Congress, enjoying the advantages of incumbency as he coasted to one easy reelection after another. But as he tries to move up to statewide office this fall, Gibbons isn't promoting all those years spent in Washington. … Gibbons, a square-jawed former airline pilot, is one of 16 House members -- nine of them Republican -- who have tried to move on to either a governorship or the Senate in this year's midterm election. Most have struggled in a political climate that nonpartisan pollster Andrew Kohut described as'anti-incumbent, anti-Washington, anti-Republican.' In Minnesota," GOP Rep. Mark Kennedy trails badly in his Senate bid. … In Colorado, where Republican Rep. Bob Beauprez is trying to become governor, 'the Washington burden' has all but killed his chances, said Floyd Ciruli, an independent polltaker in Denver. Even here in Nevada, where Gibbons is ahead in polls, Republicans fret that the Mark Foley sex scandal and other frustrations with the GOP-run Congress could depress party turnout and cost them an open governor's seat in Carson City."

Many Negative Ads Tie Candidates To Lobbyists And Special Interests. The Washington Post (10/15, A10, Birnbaum, 748K) reports, "The dirtiest word on the campaign trail this year is 'lobbyist.' In close contests from Connecticut to California, Republicans and Democrats are attacking each other for getting too close to 'special interests' and lobbyists. The accusation, a longtime election staple, is carrying greater heft than usual, election experts agree, thanks to the guilty plea of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff in January. … Candidates and independent organizations have run more than 300 political ads suggesting that the incumbents, the challengers or both have been co-opted by narrow interests or, worse, have actually lobbied."

Ickes' Group Targets Bush In Ad To Air In Competitive House Districts. The New York Times (10/15, Broder, 1.21M) describes an ad created by the September Fund, "a new independent group founded by the Democratic operative Harold M. Ickes," which "was first broadcast Thursday on CNN and will be shown in as many as a dozen competitive Congressional districts starting next week." In the ad, a "succession of Americans are standing in a park posing the questions to a shrub. The handheld camera moves in and out to show the people and the plant. The bush, of course, does not respond to their questions, and they walk away in disgust." The "shrub" is supposed to represent President Bush. The Times notes this is the first ad from the September Fund, which "hopes to raise as much as $20 million to counteract the Republicans' significant financial edge in this election. Mr. Ickes has not said how much he has raised nor has he named his major donors. He has also not revealed what races he plans to single out."

Women Key Constituency In Midterm Elections. David Broder in his column in the Washington Post (10/15, B7, 748K) writes, "Men have been making policy in Washington for as long as most of us can remember. But much of the political future rests in the hands of women." According to Broder, "In the narrowest terms, with Democrats needing 15 seats to capture a majority of the seats in the House of Representatives, there are 17 highly competitive districts with female candidates. More broadly, much of the voter mobilization effort in both parties -- and their allied groups -- is aimed at women, especially those who normally vote in presidential years but skip the midterm elections." Broder writes, "That this election could result in placing a woman, Nancy Pelosi, in line to be speaker of the House for the first time in history only emphasizes the growing role of women in setting the political course."

Democrats See Opportunity To Regain Voters Lost To Reagan In 1980. In a "Week in Review" piece for the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) David Kirkpatrick writes, "Some political analysts…say they see a chance for a potential Democratic comeback, an opportunity for another historic realignment of the political parties. … In recent Harris Interactive polls, the number of respondents who refuse to acknowledge a preference for either party has risen to about 25 percent of the electorate from about 12 percent for most of the last decade." Kirkpatrick adds, "polls showing Democrats poised for big gains this fall in both chambers of Congress are reigniting the debate: Can Democrats crack apart the Reagan coalition of white blue-collar workers, evangelical Protestants, Southerners and chambers of commerce?"

New Poll Shows Allen Barely Ahead Of Webb 49-47. The Washington Post (10/15, A1, Barnes, Shear, 748K) reports Sen. George Allen and James Webb "are virtually tied." According to the Post, Allen gets 49 percent, compared with 47 percent for Webb, within the 3 percentage point margin of error for the poll conducted over three days last week. With few respondents saying they are undecided and most seemingly locked in for their candidate, the poll indicates that the candidates' strategies for turning out supporters will be vital and that changes in the national political climate could tilt the outcome. … Independent Gail Parker receives 2 percent of the support in the poll. For Webb, the 60-year-old Democratic Party newcomer who launched his campaign eight months ago, the poll provides new evidence that his underfunded, long-shot bid has created one of the country's most competitive races." However, "the poll contains plenty of concern for the former Navy secretary and author from Falls Church. Webb owns a solid lead only in Northern Virginia, and his supporters, as a group, are far less enthusiastic about his candidacy than are Allen's voters."

Klobuchar Leading Kennedy 55-34 According To Minnesota Poll. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (10/15, Lopez, Diaz, Hotakainen, 398K) reports DFL Senate candidate Amy Klobuchar "continues to hold a substantial lead over her GOP rival Mark Kennedy, according to the latest Minnesota Poll, and there are signs that national Republican leaders are now turning their focus to other Senate campaigns. The poll shows Klobuchar with 55 percent to Kennedy's 34 percent, a margin that is nearly the same as it was in September. Kennedy's campaign challenged the poll results, as it has with every Minnesota Poll on the Senate race." The Star Tribune notes, "The two candidates will debate today on NBC's 'Meet the Press.' The poll, conducted from Oct. 6 to Wednesday with 818 likely voters, has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3.4 percentage points. A Rasmussen poll conducted earlier this month also showed a double-digit lead for Klobuchar."

Both Talent And McCaskill Avoiding Stem Cell Debate. The New York Times (10/15, Saulny, 1.21M) reports, "Over cocktails one recent Monday night at a Democratic fund-raiser in New York, Claire McCaskill, the Democratic Senate candidate in Missouri, played up her support for stem cell research. But at a campaign appearance here in rural and largely conservative Kirksville, Ms. McCaskill never mentioned the subject. Similarly, her Republican opponent, Senator Jim Talent, came out against a statewide ballot measure on stem cell research at the strong urging of conservative Christians. But when Mr. Talent recently addressed an electricians' trade group at a resort on the Lake of the Ozarks, he did not speak of his opposition." According to the Times, "Just a few months ago, the Missouri stem cell research initiative on the November ballot was a defining issue of the campaign. … But now, as Mr. Talent and Ms. McCaskill reach beyond their traditional bases, the emotionally charged ballot measure — which would allow the research and possibly provide state financing for it — is almost too hot to touch."

Casey Portrayed As Humble Social Conservative "Well Suited" To Defeat Santorum. The Washington Post (10/15, A4, Finkel, 748K) reports on the race between Sen. Rick Santorum and Bob Casey. According to the Post, "In going after a high-ranking Senate Republican, Democrats picked someone well suited for the role: the state treasurer and a member of one of Pennsylvania's best-known political families, who has strong conservative views on social issues, a liberal economic philosophy and opposition to the war in Iraq. Casey is against abortion and gun control, and he agrees with the current federal policy that limits embryonic stem cell research -- all positions that have inoculated him against attacks from the right. … Since formally announcing his candidacy in March 2005, Casey has held a steady lead over Santorum in the polls. Yet even as he appears on the verge of a victory with national implications, many in his state and throughout the country know little about his background. Casey, 46, gives new meaning to political humility, and he discourages attention to his personal life or comparisons to his father, the late Robert P. Casey, a former governor."

NYTimes Endorses Clinton. The New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) endorses Sen. Hillary Clinton in her reelection campaign against John Spencer, who the Times dismisses as "an unknown, unqualified opponent."

Feinstein's GOP Challenger Garnering Very Little Support. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Martelle, 918K) reports, "During a national election cycle marked by a bitter fight for control of the Senate and the House of Representatives, the campaign for California's senior Senate seat has the feel of a foregone conclusion as [Sen. Dianne] Feinstein, one of the state's most popular vote-getters, holds a commanding lead among likely voters in the race" against Republican Dick Moutjoy.

National GOP Said To Have Written-Off Several High-Profile Ohio Races. The AP (10/15, Smyth) reports, "As the GOP scrambles nationwide to retain its majority, scandal-ridden Ohio appears to be falling off the financial radar screen. Television time is being forsaken for House candidates. And national promotions of the state's gubernatorial candidate by the Republican Governors Association popped up, then disappeared." The AP adds that the National Republican Congressional Committee "pulled advertising it had planned in the race between Republican Craig Foltin and Democrat Betty Sutton for [Rep. Sherrod] Brown's open House seat, which the GOP initially thought it could wrest from Democrats. The committee also viewed the seat being vacated by Democratic U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland, who is running for governor, as a potential gain, but has backed away from that hope." The AP continues, "Meanwhile, after an aggressive early advertising push, Republican gubernatorial nominee Ken Blackwell, Ohio's secretary of state, has disappeared from the airwaves — a surprising turn of events for the leading candidate on the party's ticket. A one-time strategy called for the RGA to air its own ads in support of Blackwell, but the governor's group appears to have written off the state."

Murtha And Portman Assist Opposing House Candidates In Ohio. The AP (10/15) reports Rep. John Murtha "campaigned in Ohio for fellow Democrat Victoria Wulsin, who is challenging first-term Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt in the state's 2nd District. Schmidt criticized

Murtha's call to pull troops out of Iraq on the floor of the House last year." Schmidt "received campaign help Saturday from Rob Portman, the White House budget chief and the district's representative for 12 years before Schmidt."

Murtha Defends Opposition To Iraq War. In an op-ed in The Washington Post (10/15, B1, 748K), Rep. John Murtha writes, "The Republicans are running scared. In the White House, on Capitol Hill and on the campaign trail, they're worried about losing control of Congress," Murtha writes, adding, "And so the administration and the GOP have launched a desperate assault on Democrats and our position on the war in Iraq. Defeatists, they call us, and appeasers and -- oh so cleverly -- 'Defeatocrats.'" According to Murtha, "It's all baseless name-calling, and it's all wrong. Unless, of course, being a Defeatocrat means taking a good hard look at the administration's Iraq policy and determining that it's a failure. In that case, count me in."

The AP (10/15) reports the details of Murtha's essay for Sunday's Washington Post "blasting Republicans for referring to him and other Iraq war opponents as 'Defeatocrats.'"

Despite Criticisms Of Murtha's Views On Iraq, Polls Show He Has A Substantial Lead Over GOP Challenger Irey. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/15, Toland, 241K) reports, "Rarely in the annals of American politics has the much-used David-Goliath analogy been so apropos," as Murtha "is literally and figuratively daunting — literally because he's 6 feet, 3 inches tall and broad-shouldered with a booming voice; figuratively because he's a giant in Congress, a 32-year veteran of the House of Representatives." According to the report, PA12 challenger Diana Irey (R) "is the opposite — soft-spoken, slight, barely clearing 5 feet, a neophyte on the national stage. We know how the Bible story ended. But can Mrs. Irey slay this towering Johnstown warrior?" According to the report, despite Irey's "hopes of using Mr. Murtha's well-publicized Iraq comments to nationalize the race and her fund-raising base…a recently published poll showed her trailing 57 percent to 30."

Unexpectedly Close PA7 Race Highlights Change In Politics Of National Security. The New York Times (10/15, Zernike, 1.21M) reports that when PA7 challenger Joe Sestak (D) "announced he was running for Congress, national Democrats and media consultants told him not to talk about pulling troops out of Iraq, arguing it would only encourage the image of Democrats as weak on national security. Nine months later, having ignored their advice, Mr. Sestak has put a 20-year Republican incumbent on the run for the first time, turning a bid by a political novice into a real race." Surveys "show that Mr. Sestak is running even or better with" Rep. Curt Weldon and "the war more than any other issue is propelling voters toward him." His "persistence on the issue, and Mr. Weldon's efforts to recalibrate his position, highlight some of the ways Iraq may be altering the politics of national security after decades in which the advantage has gone to the Republicans."

Dogged By Bribery Probe, Rep. Jefferson Fails To Get Party's Endorsement. The AP (10/15) reports, "The Louisiana Democratic Party on Saturday turned down" Eight-term LA2 Rep. William Jefferson, and endorsed state Rep. Karen Carter (D) "one of a dozen challengers who emerged after Mr. Jefferson became a target of a federal bribery investigation." According to the report, "This is the first time in recent memory that an incumbent has failed to win the state party's endorsement."

Prominent Colorado Republicans Refuse To Back GOP Candidate Lamborn. The Washington Times (10/15, Richardson, 88K) reports that Colorado state Sen. Doug Lamborn's (R) "fiercest opponent in the 5th District race isn't his Democratic foe. It's the Republican he's trying to succeed," 10-term CO5 Rep. Joel Hefley (R). According to the report, Lamborn is running "neck and neck" Jay Fawcett (D), "a veteran and small-business owner, in the ultraconservative district, according to a Denver Post poll released last week. One of the reasons: Mr. Hefley." Soon "after Mr. Lamborn won a six-candidate primary on Aug. 8, Mr. Hefley, who is retiring, said he would refuse to endorse the Republican candidate, pointing to what he described as his 'sleazy, dishonest campaign.' That stinging rebuke, coming from the highly regarded Mr. Hefley, delivered a devastating blow to Mr. Lamborn's candidacy. Several other prominent Republicans soon joined Mr. Hefley in refusing to endorse Mr. Lamborn, pointing to ads and mailings they say unfairly demonized his Republican foes."

Democrats Have Advantage At Ballot In Race For Tom Delay's Former Seat. The AP (10/14, Stinebaker) reports that when former TX 22 Rep. Tom Delay's name was on the ballot, "Voting Republican in this conservative district was never difficult. … With DeLay out of the race and the GOP unable by law to substitute a name on the ballot, voters must write in the Republican candidate," Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs (R)." The AP notes, "That could prove to be such a chore that Democrats might walk away with a seat that has long been in the GOP's hands."

Denver Post Endorses Salazar For Re-Election. The Denver Post (10/14, 256K) endorses CO3 Rep. John Salazar (D) for re-election, writing, "In his first term representing the sprawling 3rd Congressional District, Salazar gained a seat on the House Veterans Affairs Committee and used the position to push for expanded veterans health care, fairer treatment of military widows and for cracking down on fraudulent claims for military medals. … Salazar's freshman performance and keen interest in 3rd District issues has earned him re-election."

California Democrats Seek Rare Victories In Longtime Republican House Districts. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Perry, 918K) reports, "The congressional election isn't until Nov. 7, but the real decisions may have been made in 2001, the last time district lines were redrawn in California. Of 53 districts in the state, only three have drawn much interest, two of those because of the ethical problems of the Republican incumbents." According to the report, "Still, Democrats are hoping for electoral lighting to strike in the districts that are represented by" incumbents CA4 Rep. John T. Doolittle, CA11 Rep. Richard W. Pombo and CA50 Rep. Brian Bilbray (R)." Yet "if lightning is to strike, it will have to defy some daunting numbers from the past. In four decades" UC San Diego congressional scholar Gary Jacobson says "no Democrat has beaten a Republican in a congressional district in which Republicans held a registration edge of four percentage points or greater. In Doolittle's district, the pro-GOP margin is 18 percentage points, in Pombo's 6 and in Bilbray's 14."

GOP Expected To Fare Well In California Races. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Finnegan, 918K) reports, "Reliably Democratic California looks more GOP-friendly this year than much of the U.S.," as Schwarzenegger "is heavily favored for reelection Nov. 7 over" challenger state Treasurer Phil Angelides (D). According to the report, "Several other Republicans seeking statewide office are mounting surprisingly competitive races against Democratic rivals, though the outcomes are far from sure. And billions of dollars in bonds and taxes on the ballot face tough prospects, thanks largely to Republican voters' aversion to government growth."

California Redistricting May Hurt Democrat's Chances Of Retaking House. In an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (10/15, 918K), former GOP consultant Tony Quinn writes, "With the Mark Foley sex scandal dropping on congressional Republicans like a brick on a teacup, bipartisan decisions made five years ago to gerrymander congressional district lines in California and other states may be all that's left to save the GOP from losing control of Congress." Quinn adds, "So, if [House Minority Leader Nancy] Pelosi comes up short of the 15 seats needed to make her the next House speaker, she'll know where to place the blame. She can just look in the mirror."

Schwarzenegger's Celebrity Seen As Asset At Polls. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Salladay, 918K) reports, "If the historic recall election three years ago upended California politics, the race between" Angelides Schwarzenegger "has returned the political system to its regularly scheduled programming. Between state Treasurer Angelides and the incumbent Gov. Schwarzenegger, there is little talk about sweeping away special interests or transforming the political system as we know it. Instead, potential voters have been given a choice between established politicians from the two major parties, each with traditional corporate or union backers, each with slightly different but relatively mainstream views on public policy." According to the report, "Still, an unusual and important factor hangs over the campaign, and brings a benefit to the incumbent: Schwarzenegger's status as a worldwide celebrity."

Los Angeles Times Endorses Schwarzenegger. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, 918K) endorses Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger writing, "After his historic election in the 2003 recall, followed by some early promise and a disappointing sophomore year, Arnold Schwarzenegger has been a solid, pragmatic governor who has steered a moderate course for California. He deserves a sequel." According to the Times, "Angelides may be more specific about many of California's problems. But Schwarzenegger is more likely to solve them."

Politics Of California Governor, New York Mayor Similar. In a Week In Review piece in the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M), Jennifer Steinhauer compares the styles of California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg saying, "Both men are moderate centrists, estranged from their party's mainstream, who first ran for office on what seemed like a lark. Both watched their popularity sink mid-term to embarrassing levels." According to Steinhauer, "Mr. Bloomberg came back to beat handily -- and greatly outspend -- a Democratic machine politician whose attempts to claw away at the mayor and paint him as the president's buddy flopped. Mr. Schwarzenegger's re-election bid does not end until next month, but his campaign has uncannily mirrored Mr. Bloomberg's 2005 race."

Maryland Gubernatorial Rivals Square Off In Two Debates. The Washington Post (10/15, A1, Wagner, Mosk, 748K) in a front page story reports that Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley "traded scathing assessments of each other's records yesterday during a pair of debates in which they did little to hide their mutual disdain. Ehrlich accused his Democratic rival of neglecting Baltimore's low-performing schools, of wrongfully arresting thousands of its citizens and of practicing a 'leadership style of whining and blaming others for your failures.'" According to the Post, "For months now, the governor has succeeded in keeping the campaign focused largely on Baltimore crime and education, two topics he had identified as weaknesses for an opponent who has overseen one of the nation's largest cities for seven years. But it is unclear whether his message is working with statewide voters -- O'Malley has consistently led in independent polls."

The Washington Times (10/15, Miller, 88K) reports that Ehrlich and O'Malley "clashed yesterday in two debates that frequently dwelled on [Baltimore's] crime problems and poorly performing schools, despite the mayor's attempts to shift the focus to the governor." Afterward, "both candidates claimed victory. The Ehrlich campaign said the governor 'convincingly demonstrated that Maryland is better off today than it was four years ago" while O'Malley's campaign "said the mayor won by 'showcasing new ideas for progress for Maryland's hardworking families.'"

WPost Faults Maryland Candidates For Raising Questions About Election Process. The Washington Post (10/15, 748K) in an editorial asks, "How come, when Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) expresses no confidence in state election officials and urges voters to use absentee ballots, Democrats squawk about a conspiracy to suppress the vote, but when Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) says the same thing, there is silence? Given the importance of voting, playing politics in this way isn't forgivable." Maryland political leaders should "not add to the confusion with suggestions that paper is the only safe way to vote. Instead of sowing unease that could well give pause to prospective voters, Mr. Ehrlich and Mr. Duncan should be focusing on the constructive steps that they are taking to try to ensure a smooth election."

Kerry's Attacks On Bush Said To Be Part Of His 2008 Campaign Strategy. The Washington Post (10/15, A7, Balz, 748K) reports that Sen. John Kerry, while speaking to Democrats in New Hampshire recently, "left little doubt that if he runs again in 2008, he intends to be the chief prosecutor of the record of the Bush presidency. 'A lie, a lie, a lie and a lie,' he said after recounting Republican claims that Iraq is not in a civil war, that North Korea's nuclear advancement is former president Bill Clinton's fault and that Democrats were behind the release of salacious e-mails that Mark Foley sent to former House pages. It was as if the Kerry of 2006 was channeling the Howard Dean of 2003. 'What we have in Washington is a house of lies, and in November, we need to clean house,' he said." However, "even Democrats have been reluctant to follow Kerry's recommendations for changing policy by setting a timetable for withdrawing U.S. forces" from Iraq.

Former President Clinton Helps Raise Funds For Iowa Democrats. The AP (10/15) reports former President Bill Clinton "said Saturday that voters 'know something is wrong' in Washington and urged Democrats to create change in the November elections. 'I have never seen the American people so serious,' said Clinton. 'I think I know why. People know things are out of whack. The rhythm of our public life and our common life in America has been disturbed.' The former president was the keynote speaker at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner, the Iowa Democratic Party's biggest annual fundraising event. He drew more than 3,500 activists."

Edwards Blasts Bush's Iraq Strategy While Campaigning In Iowa. The AP (10/15) reports former Sen. John Edwards "on Saturday bashed the Bush administration for 'proactive stupidity' by sticking with a failed policy in Iraq and being unable to admit its mistakes. He predicted the Iraq war and a wave of scandals in the Republican-run Congress will prompt voters to demand change in November. … Edwards was spending the weekend in eastern Iowa raising money for Democratic legislative candidates." He "diverted from his campaign schedule to speak at a University of Iowa conference on poverty issues."

Thompson Mulling 2008 Presidential Campaign. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (10/15, Skiba, 259K) reports, "Political analysts say Tommy G. Thompson faces long odds if he tries for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. Aides to Thompson, 64, announced last week that he was launching a political action committee, Forward America, and mulling a run for the White House. That comes after discussions with key advisers and a pair of visits to Iowa, whose caucuses kick off the presidential nominating season. Ahead, aides said, Thompson plans a trip to New Hampshire, which hosts the first primary of 2008."

Obama Said To Lack "Big Ideas" Necessary For Presidential Bid. Time's Joe Klein (10/15) writes that Sen. Barack Obama "has become an American political phenomenon in what seems about a nanosecond, and the folks are giddy with anticipation. … The question of when Obama -- who has not yet served two years in the U.S. Senate -- will run for President is omnipresent. That he will eventually run, and win, is assumed by almost everyone who comes to watch him speak." According to Klein, "He encourages those expectations by promising great things -- at least, in the abstract. 'This country is ready for a transformative politics of the sort that John F. Kennedy, Ronald Reagan and Franklin Roosevelt represented,' he told me. But those were politicians who had big ideas or were willing to take big risks, and so far, Barack Obama hasn't done much of either. … His record has been predictably liberal."

New York Bid To Land 2008 Democratic National Convention In Jeopardy. The New York Times (10/15, Cardwell, 1.21M) reports, "New York City's bid to land the 2008 Democratic National Convention is in jeopardy" because Mayor Michael Bloomberg "is spread so thin with fund-raising commitments that he may not be able to raise the money from private donors needed to pay for it, an official said on Thursday. The fund-raising worries come as Democrats have been seriously considering bringing the convention to New York rather than to the other competing city, Denver, which offers a politically attractive location, but has logistical problems because of a scarcity of hotel rooms."

Conservatives Seek To Rein In "Activist" Judges With Ballot Initiatives. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Simon, 918K) reports, "Judges across several Western states could soon face new limits on their authority and threats to their independence, as conservatives campaign for ballot measures that aim to rein in what they describe as 'runaway courts.' Frustration among the right has been building for years, especially since the high court in Massachusetts legalized same-sex marriage in 2003." For example, "South Dakota's ballot contains the most radical provision: It would empower citizens to sue judges over their rulings. Other proposals would make Colorado the first state to impose term limits on top judges and give Montana residents the right to recall judges over any 'dissatisfaction.' In Oregon, an amendment would require Supreme and Appeals court judges to be elected by geographic district, so they reflect the values of conservative rural communities as well as the liberal legal establishment in Portland."

Rep. Gerry Studds Dies After Collapse. NBC Nightly News (10/14, story 7, :10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "From Massachusetts comes word of the death of former Democratic congressman Gerry Studds. He won re-election until his retirement in 1997. He collapsed last week and was recovering in Boston at a hospital when doctors say he succumbed to a blood clot. He was 69."

The New York Times (10/15, Cave, 1.21M) reports that after he was censured for having an affair with a 17-year-old Congressional page, Studds "seemed emboldened by his re-election." Author Charles Kaiser said, "In a sense, he became a role model. … His experience convinced other people that it would now be possible to run as an openly gay person." The recent scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley "revived interest in Mr. Studds's own dalliance with a teenage page in 1983" as "several Republican candidates sought to deflect criticism aimed at their own party by reminding voters about Mr. Studds." The NRCC "chastised Democrats in this year's race for taking contributions from party leaders who had served with Mr. Studds."

The Washington Post (10/15, C7, Lamb, 748K)quotes Sen. Edward Kennedy saying, "His work on behalf of our fishing industry and the protection of our waters has guided the fishing industry into the future and ensured that generations to come will have the opportunity to love and learn from the sea. … He was a steward of the oceans." The AP (10/15, Lindsay) reports similar details.

Columnist Suggests Republicans Should Follow Example Of Social Traditionalists. David Brooks in his column in the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) contrasts the differences between religious conservatives and social libertarians with the philosophies of social traditionalists, who believe "that when policies fail, it's usually because they are based on inaccurate assumptions about human nature" rather than abstract theories and are "are interested in how to strengthen institutions that breed responsible people." Brooks argues that the "culture war has become self-parodic, so people are hungry for a morality that is neither absolutist nor nihilistic. As the economy has opened up opportunities, it's become clear many people lack the cultural capital to take advantage of them." Brooks concludes, "A Republican Party in danger of dividing between religious conservatives on the one side and libertarians on the other might return to these traditionalist values after the coming deluge."

Households With Married Couples Now A Minority. The New York Times (10/15, Roberts, 1.21M) reports, "Married couples, whose numbers have been declining for decades as a proportion of American households, have finally slipped into a minority, according to an analysis of new census figures by The New York Times. The American Community Survey, released this month by the Census Bureau, found that 49.7 percent, or 55.2 million, of the nation's 111.1 million households in 2005 were made up of married couples -- with and without children -- just shy of a majority and down from more than 52 percent five years earlier." The Times adds, "The total number of married couples is higher than ever, and most Americans eventually marry," but "a growing number of adults are spending more of their lives single or living unmarried with partners, and the potential social and economic implications are profound."

Bush Applauds UN Vote To Impose "Strict Sanctions" North Korea. The Administration's response to the UN vote to sanction North Korea received significant media coverage, leading the single network newscast on Saturday evening and appearing on the front pages of major newspapers. President Bush's remarks that the "swift and tough" sanctions sent "a clear message" to

North Korea were repeated in virtually all stories of the UN vote.

NBC Nightly News (10/14, lead story, 2:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "World leaders sent a strong message to North Korea today. The UN Security Council voted unanimously to punish them for its nuclear program. North Korea rejected the move and warned further pressure would be considered a declaration of war and then its ambassador walked out of the session. It is all part of a growing international crisis." US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton: "We will give them time to respond. I hope they choose the correct path – give up the pursuit of weapons of mass destruction." NBC (Jordan): "President Bush welcomed the vote." President Bush: "This action by the United Nations which was swift and tough says that we are united in our determination to see to it the Korean peninsula is nuclear weapons free." Jordan: "But nonproliferation expert Joseph Cirincione said the U.S. is no longer in control of the negotiations." Nonproliferation expert Joseph Cirincione: "We may be seeing the beginning of a more assertive diplomatic role for China."

In a front page story, the New York Times (10/15, A1, Hoge, 1.21M) reports it will be "the toughest international action against North Korea since the end of the Korean War" and "hit most of the tough points that the United States and Japan, in particular, had been seeking." Also, "a ban on the shipment of luxury goods in the resolution was particularly championed by" US Ambassador John Bolton :and J. D. Crouch, the deputy national security adviser, as a way to harm the North's leader, Kim Jong-il." The Times notes, "Current and former Bush administration officials, and experts on the North, said that while the sanctions did not go as far as Washington wished, they probably gave it and Japan the legal means to squeeze the country. They provide the basis to inspect ships in ports around the world -- though not necessarily on the high seas -- and gives Washington a way to expand a program to force banks to halt dealings with the country." President Bush "praised the resolution, saying it sent 'a clear message to the leader of North Korea regarding his weapons programs.'"

And in it's front page story the Washington Post (10/15, A1, Lynch, Kessler, 748K) notes Bush and Bolton's responses and adds, "U.S. officials believe the resolution will give them the international tools to put the squeeze on North Korea. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Japan, South Korea and China later this week to discuss the implementation of the resolution as well as possible actions that could be taken by countries to punish Pyongyang, U.S. officials said." For now, "U.S. officials are focused on implementing this resolution and are not contemplating more resolutions, officials said. When President Bush travels to Hanoi next month for an Asian economic summit, there is the possibility that Bush and the leaders from China, South Korea, Japan, Russia and possibly other countries will meet on North Korea and 'take stock' of the resolution's effectiveness."

The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Farley, 918K) says the UN vote "was a hard-fought act of unity." China's resistance to inspecting North Korean cargo "throws into doubt how effective the sanctions will be" but "U.S. officials portrayed the unanimous vote as a political victory for the United States in bringing together countries that had been reluctant to take a hard line on North Korea — in particular, China and Russia." And Bush "described the Security Council resolution as a 'clear message' to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il that 'the world is united in our opposition to his nuclear weapons plans.'"

The AP (10/15, Loven) notes, "Despite the softer provisions and no threat of military action to enforce them, Bush pronounced the measure 'a clear message' to North Korea." In addition Rice and Bolton will appear "on the Sunday morning television talk shows to bolster the U.S. case." Meanwhile, "Democrats responded by saying that the apparent test is evidence Bush's approach to North Korea has failed." Pennsylvania House candidate Patrick Murphy said, "We have seen the number of terrorist attacks increase around the world. We have seen North Korea and Iran -- two members of the president's axis of evil -- enhance their nuclear weapons capabilities."

After his radio message Bloomberg (10/15, Murray, Varner) reports Bush "told reporters…that if North Korea verifiably ends its weapons program, the U.S. and other nations will provide economic help." In his radio address Bush "said the U.S. will keep consulting with allies in the region." The Financial Times (10/15) and the Washington Times/AP (10/15, A1, Lederer) publish similar details.

Washington's Approach To Nuclear Proliferation Said To Reveal US Weakness. The Washington Post (10/15, Pincus, 748K) reports that "it is hard to remember a moment when the world's sole superpower seemed less positioned to manage a fractured world." Even "as America barrels toward this nuclear showdown on opposite sides of Asia, perhaps the best measure of America's power in these matters is its need for Russia and China to cooperate." After all, "diplomacy works best from a position of strength. And even though the United States still boasts the world's largest military, most dynamic economy and a culture that the world snaps up, there is rising evidence that many countries -- Russia and China among them -- sniff a distinct change in the strategic atmosphere," and behind North Korea's and Iran's "threats lies an understanding of American vulnerabilities."

Rice's Challenge On Asia Trip Said To Be Convincing Chinese. The Washington Post (10/15, Pincus, 748K) reports, "The challenge facing Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice this week on her trip to Beijing, Seoul and Tokyo is to change" China's mindset. While "the Chinese are now plenty mad with the nation they once said was 'as close as lips and teeth' to China," what "Beijing fears more than a nuclear North Korea is an imploded North Korea. They fear hungry refugees rushing over the border. They don't want a power grab for North Korea's territory that could put them in conflict with other big powers."

Nuclear North Korea Developed Over Fifty Year & Both Parties' Administrations. The Washington Post (10/15, A16, Pincus, 748K) follows the history of nuclear proliferation in Korea saying, "Democrats and Republicans have been quick to use North Korea's apparent nuclear test to benefit their own party…but a review of history shows that both sides have contributed to the current situation." The North Korean nuclear project was "triggered in part by threats from Presidents Harry S. Truman and Dwight D. Eisenhower to end the Korean War," when they indicated the possibility of using nuclear weapons to end it. The US also kept nuclear weapons in South Korea from 1957 until 1991. More recently, when "intelligence analysts at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory completed a highly classified report that concluded North Korea had begun construction of a plant to enrich uranium," the Administration "waited until October 2002 before confronting the North Koreans," and it soon "ended its participation in the 1994 agreement," after which North Korea began reprocessing its fuel rods.

South Koreans Disappointed Approach To North Korea Rejected. NBC Nightly News (10/14, story 2, 2:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "While Japan has been urging tough sanctions, China and South Korea have taken a more restrained approach." NBC (Colt): "In South Korea, days after the apparent nuclear test there is still disbelief and anger. The south built a highway, laid down a new railroad line and they have yet to carry anyone across the DMZ. The 150 mile barbed border remains impenetrable. It's called the 'sunshine policy' and its aim is to remove the barriers that exist between North and South. Many South Koreans say it is clear from Monday's test it is not working." Experts "say the North has nothing to lose." Han Sung-Joo, former South Korean Foreign Minister: "They are saying to the world we are not going to be intimidated by the outside world." Colt: "Maybe not intimidated but tonight the North is more isolated from the outside world than any time in recent memory."

In a front page article the Washington Times (10/15, A1, Salmon, 88K) reports, "public opinion in the South has turned sharply against a South Korean policy of engaging the enemy in the belief it will eventually bring peace on the divided peninsula," and "South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun has conceded the 'sunshine' policy of engagement with North Korea is under threat because of the nuclear test." However, "the architect of South Korea's engagement with the North, former President Kim Dae-jung, remained unmoved by the test." Instead, he "blamed American hard-liners for the crisis and said engagement must continue.

Next UN Secretary General Praises Resolution, Calls For More Talks. The AP (10/15, Lederer) reports that new UN Secretary General, Ban Ki-moon said he "welcomed the U.N. Security Council's 'very clear, strong and unified message to North Korea,'" but "stressed…that 'we need a two-pronged approach at this time,' relying not only on sanctions but on dialogue and talks."

Bloomberg (10/15, Bliss, Varner) reports that analysts support Ban's position. They say that the resolution "will only be effective if the Bush administration backs it with negotiations to end the weapons program." Stephen Bosworth, a former U.S. ambassador to South Korea under President Bill Clinton, said that "the administration should be congratulated for quickly unifying world opinion," but it is "Very unlikely" to change North Korea's behavior. Still, John Tkacik, a former U.S. diplomat in China, said that "the UN resolution may force the North Koreans back into those talks." However, it if doesn't "the crisis might 'persist indefinitely.'"

Newsweek Experts Urge Administration To Open Dialogue With North Korea. Newsweek (10/15, 3.12M) on its web site publishes the advice of five experts on how to handle North Korea. Former South Korean President Kim Dae Jung recalls that former Presidents Nixon, Reagan and Eisenhower all engaged in dialogues with their enemies and states, "From a country that is very much responsible for world peace, the United States' refusal to talk is quite unacceptable."

Former U.S. Ambassador to South Korea during the Clinton Administration Stephen Bosworth writes, "We've got to listen to the North Koreans as they tell us what they think they want -- that is, direct contact with the United States, not simply through the six-party process, but they want direct contact of the sort that we had under Bush One and under Clinton. To say we've tried that and it failed, as the president did [Thursday] -- I simply don't agree with that. What is the disadvantage? Rewarding their bad behavior? That's patent nonsense. We talk all the time to people who behave badly."

Former UN weapons inspector Hans Blix writes, "With the elections coming up in America, Bush wants to be seen as firm, to look macho. In [an earlier crisis] in 1994, when I was at the IAEA, [former President] Jimmy Carter went to Pyongyang and met Kim Il Sung. Maybe another such trick is needed today."

Hazel Smith, a professor in international relations at Warwick University in Britain, writes, "The U.S. has to cut the rhetoric and get on with [diplomacy]. That means it has to have something to offer the North Koreans rather than just beating them about the head. All the other parties in the six-party talks now want America to start direct talks [with Pyongyang] and it could be done without loss of face in the context of multilateral negotiations. If America stops tightening the screws, the North Koreans will give. That's diplomacy."

DOJ_NMG_0081429

In contrast, Gordon Chang, author of "Nuclear Showdown: North Korea Takes on the World," states, "The Bush administration put sanctions in place about a year ago [to stop] North Korea's currency counterfeiting program. They've been surprisingly effective in constricting the flow of funds in and out of North Korea. They are really starting to hurt the regime. I don't think it's the time to loosen them; on the contrary, I believe the sanctions should be tightened."

Columnist Calls Talks With North Korea Inevitable. In her column for the Philadelphia Inquirer (10/15, 399K), Trudy Rubin argues, "Republicans contend that the Clinton-era negotiations with North Korea were a failure and demonstrate why talks are pointless. But that assessment stands history on its head. ... True, the Clinton administration's negotiations didn't end North Korea's nuclear program -- but they did delay the production of weapons for eight years. Some on the Bush team now advocate bombing Iran's nuclear energy facilities -- at terrible risk -- just to delay the Iranian program perhaps three to five years." Yet, "at some point, the White House will have to decide whether it wants to pursue the small chance of freezing Pyongyang's program, or at least limiting the number of weapons." James Baker III "has already spoken with an Iranian representative. Pyongyang next?"

Scholar Says China's Soft Power Might Stop North Korea, Open China To Acting More Responsibly. Joshua Kurlantzick, a visiting scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (10/15, B3, 748K), "China has quietly reoriented its foreign policy to emerge as a new advocate of 'soft power." Which "could raise a host of problems internationally." However, this soft power "could also -- if properly exploited by other nations -- transform the Asian giant into a more responsible member of the world community." The more "Beijing's profile rises," the more" its foreign policy will also come under greater scrutiny. Its leaders will have to do more to maintain the country's appeal -- and this could be the opportunity the West needs to bend China toward becoming a more responsible international power and moving away from some of its more roguish friends." It can use that power to "do more than fume and condemn" North Korea.

Additional Countries May Pursue Nuclear Weapons. North Korea's nuclear test has prompted speculation in prominent US newspapers about the development of nuclear weapons by other countries. In a font page article, the New York Times (10/15, A1, Broad, Sanger, 1.21M) reports that "atomic officials estimate that as many as 40 more countries have the technical skill, and in some cases the required material, to build a bomb," and officials and arms control specialists say that opportunity, "coupled with new nuclear threats in Asia and the Middle East, risks a second nuclear age…in which nations are more likely to abandon the old restraints against atomic weapons." Director general of the IAEA Mohamed ElBaradei "estimated that up to 49 nations now know how to make nuclear arms, and he has warned that global tensions could push some over the line." Furthermore, "the spread of nuclear technology is expected to accelerate as nations redouble their reliance on atomic power." Although "it is not clear if the expansion of the world's civilian atomic infrastructure will ultimately lead to a rise in the number of countries building nuclear arms, it could give more countries the means to do so."

The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Rubin, 918K) adds that North Korea's test "was just the latest sign that the effort to contain the spread of atomic weapons was breaking down." Policymakers and experts say that a few "countries are on the verge of beginning uranium enrichment programs, and others have already started such efforts." Those "that have pursued nuclear capability outside the treaty or by hiding their programs have, after an initial distancing by the international community, gone unpunished over the long term," and India, Pakistan and Israel, which "refused to sign the" nonproliferation treaty, "enjoy the favor and respect of world leaders, setting an example of what countries can get when they acquire nuclear weapons." Additionally, the IAEA "has failed to detect cheating by countries" and "has no enforcement power."

Other Nations May Engage In "Near-Nuclear" Proliferation. Andrew Grotto, a senior national security analyst at the Center for American Progress, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (10/15, B3, 748K), "Pyongyang's test could encourage 'near-nuclear' proliferation -- a world in which states master key technologies that are ostensibly for harmless energy-related purposes but can be quickly adapted for deadly, offensive ends," and "A world in which countries have the capability to go nuclear on short notice is fraught with peril." There are "five nations in particular that may pursue that path." Iran may be "may be emboldened" by North Korea's test. Japan, South Korea, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia all have the technology or access to a nuclear power needed to make or buy a nuclear weapon. They are also concerned about North Korea or Iran's possession of nuclear weapons, and may feel they need parity.

Reporter Argues Nuclear Proliferation Is "Inevitable." William Langewiesche, international correspondent for Vanity Fair and the author of "Atomic Bazaar: The Rise of the Nuclear-Armed Poor," writes in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (10/15, 918K) that "the acquisition of atomic weapons by North Korea is the worst development yet in the ongoing story of nuclear proliferation by upstart states," but "what's done is done, and though we may protest and bluster, there is very little the U.S. can do to stop it from proceeding." Instead, "we would do well to calm down," as "the spread of nuclear weapons is, and always has been, inevitable." Today "the desire for nuclear weapons is spreading in inverse relation to the lowered risk of an all-out global nuclear war," and this trend "is accelerating in a world where countries must turn to themselves for protection and where the U.S., especially after the invasion of Iraq, is seen as an aggressor and a threat."

Expert Blames Bush Foreign Policy For Failure To Prevent Proliferation Of Nuclear Weapons. Nonproliferation expert Joseph Cirincione in an op-ed titled "Bush Unleashes The Nuclear Beast" in the Los Angeles Times (10/15, 918K) describes how the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty prevented most countries from developing nuclear weapons for years and asks, "suddenly, the threat is back. In the last six years, we seem awash in nuclear threats: First it was Saddam Hussein, then North Korea and Iran. How did it happen? Is nuclear restraint dead?" Cirincione blames "the problem is the strategy George W. Bush chose, which rejects international treaties as the solution to proliferation. He and his advisors saw these agreements as limiting U.S. flexibility and viewed the United Nations and other global gatherings as arenas where the world's Lilliputians could tie down the American Gulliver." Cirincione concludes, "Bush administration officials have proved expert at smashing the agreements their predecessors so painstakingly built, but in doing so they broke the bars that had caged the nuclear beast. Those who will have to repair the damage would do well to look back at the handiwork of the past. They might learn a thing or two."

Japan And South Korea Now Have Incentive To Go Nuclear. In a commentary for the Newark Star Ledger (10/15) CFR.org editor Michael Moran warns, "Japan and South Korea have predicated most of their defense and foreign policy decisions on the assumption they would be protected, in the final analysis, by America's nuclear umbrella. ... With the decision of North Korea to test a nuclear weapon, those days may now be numbered…the temptation of going nuclear, and of having a permanent seat at the world's big table as a result, may prove too much to resist."

WPost Is Pessimistic About Future Nonproliferation Efforts. The Washington Post (10/15, B6, 748K) editorializes, "The most critical question following North Korea's reported nuclear test is whether anything can be done to stop other states or terrorist groups from acquiring such weapons in coming years. … Based on the response to North Korea last week, the outlook isn't good." Countries "such as North Korea and Iran can be stopped only if a powerful coalition of countries emerges against them, combining the United States and Europe with Russia, China and regional powers," and "nuclear counterproliferation has to become those governments' highest priority. They have to be willing to make sacrifices and take risks. As the diplomacy at the United Nations last week once again demonstrated, neither China nor Russia regard stopping the spread of nuclear weapons as essential." Russian President Vladimir Putin is "willing to make a gesture toward preventing a world that bristles with nuclear weapons…only if he can get some help in his attempt to crush" Georgia, "a government that resists Russia's neo-imperialism. If such politics continue to underlie counterproliferation, we can expect a much more dangerous world."

Iran Suggests Old Nuclear Proposal. The Washington Times/AFP (10/15) reports that Iran's foreign ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini "said yesterday a year-old offer from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for foreign countries to handle its uranium enrichment activities still stands as a way to break the deadlock over its nuclear program," adding that "a suggestion made by Iran earlier this month for a French-led consortium to enrich uranium for Iran on Iranian soil remained 'appropriate.'" However, previously that "idea was met with a cool reception from Western powers, who object to enrichment done in Iran."

Germany Dismisses Possibly Of Successful Iran Talks. The AP (10/15, Moulson) reports that German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier "said there is currently no prospect of successful nuclear talks with Iran but that pressure on the country would be applied gradually, leaving the door open to future negotiations." He "gave no details of sanctions that might be taken against Tehran. However, he noted that a package of incentives aimed at persuading Iran to halt uranium enrichment is still being offered." Iran on called the "threats of sanctions 'psychological warfare' and said it would not be intimidated."

Israel Increases Effort To Stop Palestinian Rocket Fire. The New York Times (10/15, Myre, 1.21M) reports that in "another in a series of periodic escalations since an Israeli soldier was seized on June 25," Israeli soldiers "killed seven Palestinian militants in fighting Saturday as tanks and other armored vehicles rolled into areas east of Gaza City" as part of "a stepped-up effort to halt Palestinian rocket fire." During the last three days, "Israeli troops have staged ground operations in eastern Gaza…killing 20 Palestinians and wounding about 30. Most of the dead were Hamas militants who were targets of airstrikes, but several civilians also died." Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Palestinian Authority government, accused Israel "of 'going ahead with evil plans for a bloody military escalation and seeking the highest possible Palestinian losses.'"

Sudan Signs Peace Agreement With Eastern Rebels. The New York Times (10/15, Gettleman, 1.21M) reports, "The Sudanese government signed a peace deal on Saturday with a small rebel movement in the eastern part of the country" called the Eastern Front. It will "end fighting that has lasted 10 years though with nowhere near the intensity of the conflict in Darfur." The agreement gives the Eastern Front "more representation in the national and regional administrations, including high-ranking posts in Khartoum, the capital." Sudanese president Omar Hassan al-Bashir "called it an example of 'Africans solving an African problem without foreign help,' a clear reference to his government's continuing refusal to allow United Nations peacekeepers into Darfur."

The AP (10/15, Osman) adds, "Al-Bashir promised…that all the money that was being spent on war will be paid for development." This "agreement is considered a relief to Khartoum, which has been struggling to put down rebellions on both sides of the country, as well as to keep a shaky peace after a civil war with the south."

Somali Courts Embrace Varying Interpretations Of Islam. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Sanders, 918K) reports, "Four months after they seized control of Somalia's capital, Islamists have won widespread praise for reestablishing order and stability in Mogadishu and surrounding areas after 15 years of anarchy. But the Islamists are by no means uniform in their application of justice," and "a clash of ideologies has emerged between leaders of the Islamist union and nearly three dozen smaller, semiautonomous courts that function as local governments throughout southern Somalia. These clan-based courts, some of which have their own militias, sometimes pursue distinct and competing interpretations of Islamic law." While "On big issues…the Islamists show few signs of discord," as Somalis debating how to create an Islamic-based government, "cracks are beginning to show."

Kristof Extols Positive Aspects Of Islam. Nicholas Kristof writes in his column in the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M), "Islam sometimes comes across the airwaves in the West as the faith of medieval fanatics wielding swords and wearing explosive vests." However, those are "some stones in a complex mosaic. And those images can't explain why Islam appears to be in percentage terms the fastest-growing major religion in the world today." Islam provides "a firm moral code, spiritual reassurance and orderliness to people vexed by chaos and immorality around them, and they offer dignity to the poor," hence its growth. There is also "a broad ferment for more gender equality in the Muslim world," as part of "the thread of reform" that exists within it. Not only is Islam "much more complex than the headlines might suggest," but "we would be close-minded ourselves if we ignored the more hopeful rumblings that are also taking place within the vast Islamic world."

Venezuela Uses Petrodollars To Boost Security Council Seat. The New York Times/AP (10/15) reports, "As Venezuela lobbies for a U.N. Security Council seat, President Hugo Chavez has bolstered its chances by spreading petrodollars across the Americas and beyond," and, "Ironically, this aid is bankrolled in large part by oil sales to the United States." That "international support will be put to the test on Monday as Venezuela goes up against U.S.-backed Guatemala in a General Assembly vote." At least one country, Dominica, "has acknowledged that Venezuela's aid 'cannot go unnoticed' as a factor in the decision" to support Venezuela. At the same time, "Chavez's aid pledges…have come under attack ahead of Venezuela's Dec. 3 presidential vote by opposition candidate Manuel Rosales, who says poor Venezuelans need the money."

Ecuador Frontrunner's Intentions Unknown, But Of Concern To Washington. The Washington Post (10/15, A15, Forero, 748K) reports, "In his unlikely race to power, Rafael Correa is as anti-establishment as any politician on a continent where populists have surged by spewing invective against market reforms and the Bush administration," but "it remains unclear if Correa, the front-runner among a dozen candidates, would be a strident nationalist in the mold of Chávez or a center-left pragmatist." While "associates and some influential business executives who oppose him say he is a brilliant thinker who, though deeply concerned about the poor, is unlikely to follow the same path as Chávez," he "has cast himself as such a radical that Wall Street has winced with every point he has risen in the polls." Certainly "a win by a leftist with ties to Chávez -- particularly in a country where American oil companies have significant investments -- would be a setback for Washington."

Obrador Using Gubernatorial Election To Reinvigorate His Political Fortunes. The Los Angeles Times (10/15, Enriquez, 918K) reports that Lopez Obrador's "political future, and that of his fledgling leftist movement, may rest on today's gubernatorial election in Tabasco." Obrador "spent the last several weeks campaigning for Cesar Raul Ojeda" and if he won it "would also be a triumph for Lopez Obrador." However, "Support for Lopez Obrador has dwindled since protesters closed down their Mexico City encampments a month ago after judges rejected demands for a national recount," and his "so-called campaign of civil resistance has scared people off."

"New Left" Said To Be Becoming More Influential In Chinese Policy. The New York Times (10/15, Mishra, 1.21M) reports that China's New Left "advocate a 'Chinese alternative' to the neoliberal market economy." They also disagree that a market economy inevitably encourages democracy. The New Left "view the Communist leadership as a likely force for change." While "New Leftists have never directed government policy, their concerns are increasingly amplified by the central leadership," and "this spring it began to become clear that the New Left's advocacy of a welfare state is being echoed within the Communist leadership, which is fearful of social instability and is keen to consolidate its power and legitimacy."

Kissinger Delves Into Role Of Secretary Of State. Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger writes in a review of Robert Beisner's "Dean Acheson: A Life in the Cold War," in the New York Times (10/15, 1.21M) that "accolades for" Acheson "have become bipartisan," and "Secretaries of state appointed by the party of his erstwhile tormentors have described him as a role model; Condoleezza Rice is the most recent example." Acheson said, "'Americans must reconcile themselves to "limited objectives" and work in congress with others, for an essential part of American power was the "ability to evoke support from others -- an ability quite as important as the capacity to compel. The importance of that perception has not changed with the passage of time."

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. May Charge Alleged 9/11 Leader With The Death Of Daniel Pearl (MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg

McClatchy Newspapers, October 15, 2006

U.S. military officials intend to charge Guantanamo Bay captive Khalid Sheikh Mohammed with the murder of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, according to a Time magazine report.

U.S. officials have identified Mohammed as the al Qaida mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and President Bush has said he's a likely candidate for a war-crimes trial.

But the Pentagon's chief war-crimes prosecutor told The Miami Herald on Friday that the Time report may be premature; prosecutors are still studying the case files of Mohammed and 13 other so-called high-value detainees who were turned over to the military by the CIA.

Captured in Pakistan in March 2003, Mohammed had been held in secret CIA detention until his Labor Day transfer to the Guantanamo detention center at the U.S. Navy base in southeast Cuba.

On Thursday, Time posted an item on its Web site reporting that administration officials want to charge Mohammed with Pearl's January 2002 murder, in which Pearl's throat was slit. The killing was captured on a grisly videotape.

"One former U.S. national security official tells Time there is no doubt that KSM personally wielded the knife that killed the Wall Street Journal reporter," the report said.

Military intelligence circles refer to Mohammed, a U.S.-educated, Kuwait-born Pakistani, as KSM, a nom de guerre of sorts that Bush himself adopted in revealing Mohammed's transfer to Guantanamo on Sept. 6.

If charged and tried before the administration's new, redesigned military commissions, Mohammed would be the most senior al Qaida figure to face trial.

Unclear is whether future prosecutions would include charges of conspiracy, which had been challenged as unconstitutional in the first effort to try 10 alleged al Qaida co-conspirators already at Guantanamo.

A Pearl murder charge would allege a specific act and identify a high-profile victim, a scenario the chief Pentagon prosecutor said hadn't yet been considered.

"I at this point in time certainly can't say that," said Air Force Col. Moe Davis, whose earlier prosecutions were upended in June by a Supreme Court decision that struck down the previous military commission format.

Pentagon attorneys are presently drawing up new rules by which new commissions would be staged, though probably not until next year.

Moreover, the latest arrivals at Guantanamo, including Ramzi Binalshibh and Abu Zubaydah, other alleged al Qaida plotters, have yet to go through basic military review panels to confirm that they're "enemy combatants."

Davis said he was surprised by the Time report on plans to try Mohammed for the Pearl murder and said was definitely not the source of it.

"Ultimately if he was to be prosecuted in a military commission, it would be up to this office to draft the charges," he said in a telephone interview. "But it is way too early to be making any decision on not just him, but any of the 14.

"We haven't scratched the surface deep enough to make any decisions on that."

Time doesn't name its source but attributed to "national security officials" the detail that Mohammed admitted under interrogation to having killed Pearl, "admitting without remorse that he personally severed Pearl's head and telling interrogators he had to switch knives after the first one `got dull.'"

The magazine also reported that it compared the hands seen on the videotape executing Pearl to Mohammed's hands and confirmed it was him. It did not elaborate.

DOJ_NMG_0081439

Mohammed has been identified as a 1986 graduate of North Carolina Agricultural and Technical State University and is reportedly fluent in Arabic, English and Urdu.

Mohammed, who's about 40, has no lawyer and hasn't been seen publicly since his capture, although he and the other 13 detainees recently met with Red Cross delegates and have been registered as U.S.-held prisoners for the first time in up to four years of captivity at an undisclosed location.

Pearl, a Stanford University graduate who was 38 when he was killed, disappeared while on assignment in Pakistan in January 2002, pursuing an article about Islamic extremism.

1 Man Still Locked Up From 9/11 Sweeps (AP)

By Martha Mendoza

AP, October 15, 2006

In a jail cell at an immigration detention center in Arizona sits a man who is not charged with a crime, not suspected of a crime, not considered a danger to society.

But he has been in custody for five years.

His name is Ali Partovi. And according to the Department of Homeland Security, he is the last to be held of about 1,200 Arab and Muslim men swept up by authorities in the United States after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

There has been no full accounting of all of these individuals. Nor has a promised federal policy to protect against unrestricted sweeps been produced.

Human rights groups tried to track the detainees; members of Congress denounced the arrests. They all believed that all of those who had been arrested had been deported, released or processed through the criminal justice system.

Just this summer, it was reported that an Algerian man, Benemar "Ben" Benatta, was the last detainee, and that his transfer to Canada had closed the book on the post-9/11 sweeps.

But now The Associated Press has learned that at least one person — Partovi — is still being held. The Department of Homeland Security insists he really is the last one in custody.

"Certainly it's not our goal as an agency to keep anyone detained indefinitely," said DHS spokesman Dean Boyd. Boyd said the department would like to remove Partovi from the United States but that he refuses to return to his homeland of Iran.

And so he remains, a curious remnant of a desperate time.

Within hours of the Sept. 11 attacks — before it was even clear if they were over — the FBI was ordered to identify the terrorists who had managed to slip so smoothly into American society and to catch anyone who might have been working with them. The FBI operation was called PENTTBOM; it was swift and fierce, and the stakes couldn't have been higher.

When in doubt, the orders came, arrest now and ask questions later. To make this easier, law enforcement officials were authorized to use immigration charges as needed. The risk of allowing terrorists to slip away just because there wasn't ample evidence to hold them on terror charges could not be tolerated. And thus hundreds of individuals who were not terrorists, nor associated with terrorists, were temporarily taken into city, county and federal custody.

They were caught in their bedrooms while they slept, pulled from the restaurant kitchens where they worked, stopped at the border, even federal offices where they had gone to seek help. In the end, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft's call for "aggressive detentions" in the unprecedented sweeps netted more than 1,200 individuals in less than two months.

The initial reaction to the sweeps was confusion. Members of Congress, leading civil rights organizations, Arab and Muslim activists, even the Justice Department's internal watchdogs, didn't know how to react.

"After 9/11, everyone was caught off guard. There was so much secrecy surrounding the government's policies that it took a number of months before the public and civil-liberties groups began unraveling what the government was doing," said Lee Gelernt, an American Civil Liberties Union attorney.

Then came demands, from Congress, from the Justice Department's Inspector General, from the ACLU and Human Rights Watch and from Arab and Muslim activists, that these individuals must be accounted for.

To date that hasn't occurred.

DOJ_NMG_0081440

"The fact is the United States has not come forward with information on what happened to these people, or released their names," said Rachel Meeropol, a staff attorney at the Center for Constitutional Rights, an advocacy organization that represents several detainees being held in Guantanamo. "Our understanding is that the majority of these people who were swept up on immigration violations were then held in detention until they were cleared of any connection to terrorism. We believe that accounts for the vast majority of people who were swept up."

Here's what is known: 762 of the 1,200 PENTTBOM arrestees were charged with immigration violations at the behest of the FBI because agents thought they might be associated with terrorism. Partovi was one of these 762. Much as Partovi used a false passport, nearly all of these detainees had violated immigration laws, either by overstaying their visas, entering the country illegally, or violating some other immigration law.

Unlike Partovi, almost everyone was either deported or released within a few months.

There were still at least 438 other individuals who were not accounted for. Most of those individuals, said Justice Department officials, were released within days. But at least 93 were charged with federal crimes and processed through the courts, and an unknown number were deemed material witnesses.

As the years passed, said the ACLU's Gelernt, public concern faded.

"Initially there was a lot of attention on the 1,200 people, but we're still not sure exactly what happened to all of them," said the ACLU's Gelernt.

The repercussions are still being felt, say advocates.

"Those 1,200 were taken in on pseudo-immigration charges," said Jennifer Daskal of Human Rights Watch. "It really is a black mark on the U.S. and it undermines our intelligence gathering because it creates distrust between law enforcement officials and communities where those officials should be building rapport and trust."

"People lost years of their lives and families were ripped apart in the frenzy of fear," said Kerri Sherlock, director of policy and planning at the Rights Working Group, an advocacy organization in Washington D.C. "Do we really want to be a country that locks people up without guaranteeing their basic constitutional rights?"

In June 2003, the Justice Department's inspector general, an in-house auditor, found widespread abuses in the way immigration laws were used to hold people suspected of terrorism in the months following 9/11. The inspector general made 21 recommendations aimed at protecting individuals' civil rights. Twenty of those recommendations have been adopted.

The last recommendation calls for the Justice Department and the Department of Homeland Security to formalize policies, responsibilities, and procedures for managing a national emergency that involves alien detainees. After the inspector general's report, the Justice and Homeland Security departments agreed with the recommendation and began negotiating over language. Officials at both departments say those negotiations are still going on.

"The Department of Homeland Security and the Department of Justice continue to work toward the development of formal joint policies and approaches for the handling of such national security cases during periods of national impact," said Homeland Security Department spokesman Dean Boyd.

However, Boyd stressed that guidelines were set up in 2004 to make sure detainees' rights are being protected on a case-by-case basis.

"We learned from the past," he said. "We evaluate each situation to make sure it's being handled fairly."

Tim Lynch, a lawyer with the libertarian think tank Cato Institute, said guidelines are not enough.

"I don't think the guidelines will mean very much in an emergency if they don't have the binding force of law," he said. "We shouldn't be surprised if those guidelines aren't followed if there's another massive attack."

When the AP wrote Ali Partovi to ask for an interview, he called collect from the Florence Correctional Center, a privately run detention center in Arizona where he is held. Adamantly, he said he did not want to be interviewed and that he wanted to remain private, even though he said understood his case files, including litigation he files himself, are part of the public record.

He later reportedly told a public affairs officer at the facility that he is too busy for an interview — perhaps preparing his many legal appeals.

DOJ_NMG_0081441

In his lawsuits — there have been seven so far — Partovi claims he is a victim of civil rights abuses and demands between $5 million and $10 million in restitution. The most recent was filed in July.

The staff at the jail where he was first held "poured hot coffee on my body, they also poured cold ice water on my body," he wrote in one, claiming that staffers also cuffed his hands and feet, which caused "my ankle and lower extremities to swell abnormally."

"It is my firm belief that I am constantly subjected to physical abuse (because) of my ethnicity, I am Iranian of Persian birth," he wrote in another, filed this summer. In that lawsuit he claimed that immigration officers forced him to kneel while handcuffed, and then kicked and punched his stomach and kidneys.

"As you can imagine, this is very, very painful when you are cuffed from behind," he wrote.

A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney said that office was aware of the lawsuits but could not comment on them. A detention center spokesman said he was not aware of any lawsuits and could not respond.

Partovi doesn't have a lawyer, and he told the AP he doesn't want one, choosing instead to represent himself, gleaning expertise from the prison library.

He did have a lawyer once, when he was arrested in Guam in the fall of 2001, trying to enter the country on a fraudulent Italian passport.

"Mr. Partovi came into Guam International Airport using a false passport. He explained about having been married to a Japanese women and the arrangement wasn't working out. He applied for political asylum, and I believe the federal government thought he might be a terror suspect," said Curtis Charles Van de Veld, who was hired by the federal government to represent him.

Partovi was sentenced to 175 days in custody, which he had already served by the time he pleaded guilty in 2002. Then he was turned over to the Department of Homeland Security.

Until the AP contacted him, Van de Veld didn't realize his former client was still in custody.

"I'm surprised he hasn't contacted me," he said.

2 Ordered Not To Discuss Gitmo Claims (AP)

By Miranda Leitsinger

AP, October 15, 2006

A paralegal and a military lawyer who brought forward allegations about prisoner abuse at the Guantanamo Bay detention center have been ordered not to speak with the press, lawyers and a military spokeswoman said Saturday.

Marine Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, who represents a detainee at the U.S. naval base in eastern Cuba, filed a complaint with the Pentagon last week alleging that abuse was ongoing at the prison. He attached a sworn statement from his paralegal, Sgt. Heather Cerveny, in which she said several Guantanamo guards bragged in a bar about beating detainees, describing it as common practice.

Muneer Ahmad, a civilian defense lawyer for Omar Khadr, a Canadian detainee whose military counsel is Vokey, said that Vokey and Cerveny were ordered Friday by the U.S. Marines not to speak with the press.

A spokeswoman for the Marines confirmed the order, saying Vokey's supervisor — Col. Carol Joyce, the Marines' chief defense counsel — had directed him not to communicate with the media "pending her review of the facts."

"This is necessary to ensure all actions of counsel are in compliance with regulations establishing professional standards for military attorneys," the spokeswoman, 1st Lt. Blanca E. Binstock, said in a statement.

Reached by telephone, Vokey declined to comment, saying, "I can't even talk about it." When asked if he was going to abide by the order for the time being, he said, "Yes."

Telephone calls placed to Cerveny and a Pentagon spokesman were not immediately returned.

Ahmad said Vokey was also barred from talking to the media about anything related to the military commissions — tribunals set up to try detainees. He said he didn't know how the order was issued and that Vokey previously had the military's authorization to speak with the media.

DOJ_NMG_0081442

"I think he is very concerned about his ability to perform his job as a lawyer," Ahmad said. "It's really quite troubling ... at this point I'm not sure what our next steps will be."

Cerveny, 23, visited Guantanamo last month and has said she spent an hour with the guards at the military club. She said the guards stopped discussing beating detainees after finding out that she works for a detainee's legal team.

"It was a general consensus that I (detected) that as a group this is something they did. That this was OK at Guantanamo, that this is how the detainees get treated," Cerveny said in a telephone interview Thursday.

Gen. John Craddock, commander of the U.S. Southern Command, said Friday that he had ordered an investigation headed by an Army colonel.

The military Joint Task Force that runs the detention camps in Guantanamo Bay pledged to work with investigators from the Southern Command, which oversees U.S. military operations in the Caribbean and Latin America.

There are now 454 detainees at Guantanamo Bay, according to Vincent Lusser, a spokesman for the Geneva-based International Committee of the Red Cross.

Guantanamo Bay began receiving prisoners, most of them captured in Afghanistan and Pakistan, in January 2002. Only 10 of the detainees have been charged with crimes.

Marine Corps Issues Gag Order In Detainee Abuse Case (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

The action has lawyers worrying they could be punished for defending Guantanamo clients.

MIAMI — The U.S. Marine Corps has threatened to punish two members of the military legal team representing a terrorism suspect being held at Guantanamo Bay if they continue to speak publicly about reported prisoner abuse, a civilian lawyer from the defense team said Saturday.

The action directed at Lt. Col. Colby Vokey and Sgt. Heather Cerveny follows their report last week that Guantanamo guards bragged about beating detainees, said Muneer Ahmad, an American University law professor who assists in the defense of Canadian suspect Omar Khadr.

The order has heightened fears among the military defense lawyers for Guantanamo prisoners that their careers will suffer for exposing flaws and injustices in the system, Ahmad said.

"In one fell swoop, the government is gagging a defense lawyer and threatening retaliation against a whistle-blower," Ahmad said. "It really points out what is wrong with the detainee legislation that Bush is scheduled to sign on Tuesday: It permits the abuse of detainees to continue, immunizes the wrongdoers and precludes the detainees from ever challenging it in court."

The Marine Corps said the gag order had been issued to ensure the legal team's actions were in compliance with professional standards. "The Chief Defense Counsel of the Marine Corps, as Lt. Col. Vokey's direct supervisor, has directed him not to communicate with the media on this case pending her review of the facts," said 1st Lt. Blanca E. Binstock of the Marine public affairs office.

Defense lawyers for Guantanamo prisoners say the personal stakes are high and point to the Navy's failure to promote Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift after he successfully challenged the legitimacy of the Pentagon's war-crimes commissions. Two weeks after the Supreme Court ruled the commissions unconstitutional and lacking in due process, Swift was passed over for advancement and will be forced by the Navy's up-or-out policy to retire by summer.

At least three other military defense lawyers for the 10 charged terrorism suspects have also been passed over for promotion in what some consider a subtle reprimand of their vigorous defense of their clients.

"We've all known that representing folks in these kind of circumstances would have consequences, but to actually see Charlie passed over after he takes his case to the Supreme Court and wins — that certainly put it in the forefront for me," said Army Maj. Tom Fleener, who represents Ali Hamza Bahlul of Yemen.

As an Army reservist with a civilian law career in Wyoming to return to in a year or so, Fleener notes he is less susceptible to pressures being exerted on the military defense lawyers.

"If I was active duty, where my livelihood depended on what my military superiors said of me, I would feel tremendous pressure," he said.

Fleener says the mood in Guantanamo defense circles has deteriorated since the government's response to the high court ruling June 29 that President Bush overstepped his powers when he created the military war-crimes commissions. Those commissions would have allowed Pentagon prosecutors to use hearsay evidence and testimony obtained through torture, and barred defendants from seeing evidence against them that prosecutors deemed classified.

Congress last month passed legislation creating a new military commissions process almost identical to the one rejected by the Supreme Court, with the added restriction that Guantanamo detainees have no right to submit writs of habeas corpus to U.S. civil courts to challenge their detention.

It was such a writ filed on behalf of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, an alleged driver and bodyguard for Osama bin Laden, that brought the tribunal case to the Supreme Court.

Swift declined to comment on not having received a promotion.

"As a defense attorney, I don't like allegations without evidence," he says of the widespread view among his colleagues that he was punished for challenging the administration's tribunal process.

"What you sought in any career was an opportunity to make a difference. I got that opportunity, and for that I will be forever grateful," Swift said.

He said the new commissions legislation appears to preclude defendants' getting a fair trial.

"A zealous defense is essential to any process that works," Swift said. "What has given the commissions any integrity so far is the ability of defense council to raise the case and concerns in all federal forums and the commissions themselves, and when necessary, in the media."

Expecting U.S. Help, Sent To Guantánamo (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Abdul Rahim Al Ginco thought he was saved when the United States invaded Afghanistan in 2001 and overthrew the Taliban regime.

Mr. Ginco, a college student living in the United Arab Emirates, had gone to Afghanistan in 2000 after running away from his strict Muslim father. He was soon imprisoned by the Taliban, and tortured by operatives of Al Qaeda until, he said, he falsely confessed to being a spy for Israel and the United States.

But rather than help Mr. Ginco return home, American soldiers detained him again. Nearly five years later, he remains in the United States military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba — in part, it appears, on the strength of a propaganda videotape made by his torturers.

“This was a 22-year-old kid who was brutally tortured,” one of Mr. Ginco’s American lawyers, Stephen R. Sady, said. “And instead of being liberated, he has endured four and a half years of additional confinement.”

A bill signed into law by President Bush last December requires the Pentagon to determine if information being used to hold a detainee has been obtained by coercion and “the probative value (if any)” of such information. Another law passed by Congress last month would ban the use of statements made under torture from the military tribunals that are to be used to prosecute some Guantánamo detainees.

But that second law, which awaits the president’s signature, would also sweep away most federal court challenges to the detention of Guantánamo prisoners, including perhaps the one filed by American lawyers for Mr. Ginco, who is now 28.

A spokesman for the Department of Defense, Cmdr. Jeffrey D. Gordon of the Navy, said he could not discuss the specifics of the evidence against any particular detainee. And because part of the military’s case against Mr. Ginco remains classified, it is not possible to evaluate fully the grounds for his detention.

But partial transcripts from two review hearings for Mr. Ginco at Guantánamo and information filed by his lawyers last week in district court in Washington show that the military has repeatedly accused him of having volunteered his life as a Qaeda martyr — a claim that appears to be based on a videotape found in Afghanistan.

That tape was pulled from the rubble of a home used by Muhammad Atef, the reputed military chief of Al Qaeda, who was killed by an American air strike on his home near Kabul on Nov. 16, 2001. Mr. Ginco named Mr. Atef as one of the Qaeda and Taliban operatives who tortured him in early 2000, applying electric shocks to his ears and toes, nearly drowning him in a filthy water tank, depriving him of sleep and beating him on the soles of his feet.

In December 2001 and January 2002, several Western news reporters, including one for The New York Times, interviewed Mr. Ginco and four other foreign prisoners as the Northern Alliance took over the prison where they had been held in Kandahar. A reporter for The Times of London described Mr. Ginco and some of the others as "desperate to be interviewed by the F.B.I."

On Jan. 17, however, John Ashcroft, then the attorney general, held a news conference to announce that five videotapes had been recovered from the ruins of Mr. Atef's home showing several men who "may be trained and prepared to commit future suicide terrorist acts." The first man shown in an excerpt from one of those tapes was Mr. Ginco, whom Mr. Ashcroft identified as Abd Al-Rahim.

Lawyers for Mr. Ginco, who was born to a Kurdish family in Syria, still have not viewed the complete tape from which Mr. Ashcroft showed a brief excerpt or heard its audio. But they said they believed it showed part of one of the propaganda videos made by the torturers who extracted Mr. Ginco's confession. In a hearing at Guantánamo in November 2005, Mr. Ginco admitted to a military review panel that he appeared in the video but said, "It wasn't my choice."

The Taliban announced in May 2000 that Mr. Ginco had been arrested as a spy. Another videotape was then broadcast on an Arab television network, in which he looks pale, uneasy and underweight and confesses at length to having been a spy for the United States and Israel.

This interview with Mr. Ginco about his purported espionage was also published in a Taliban government magazine in July 2000. It quotes him as saying he was corrupted at college by an "evil acquaintance" who introduced him to a "computer game called PlayStation." Later, he added, he was shown a pornographic computer disc and introduced to an American embassy official, whom he identified as "Shamoyel Anty," an agent of "the Israeli intelligence agency."

After the collapse of the Taliban, Mr. Ginco and the four other foreigners were taken for questioning to the makeshift American detention center in Kandahar. Initially, one of the men said, they were treated more as guests than as prisoners, and were given chocolates and extra blankets by the American soldiers.

His treatment suddenly became much harsher, his lawyers said, after he was recognized as one of the men depicted in a brief Time magazine article based on Mr. Ashcroft's announcement about the videotapes.

Mr. Ginco and the four others were transferred to Guantánamo in May 2002. Two of the five, a Briton and a Russian, were released in 2004, and both have made sworn statements on Mr. Ginco's behalf, his lawyer, Mr. Sady, said.

In other statements filed in federal court, members of Mr. Ginco's family said he had run away from home after borrowing money for a camping trip from some of his college classmates. Mr. Ginco's elder brother, with whom he was living, said the family considered such borrowing shameful, and that he threatened to tell their strict father about the episode.

Mr. Ginco said he had tried to arrange to travel to Europe or Canada but could not because his father had kept his passport. He said a former friend from college who worked at the Afghan Embassy in Dubai told him that he could be deported to Afghanistan if he went to the police and told them he was an undocumented Afghan, which he then did.

In Afghanistan, he quickly drew the suspicion of the Taliban. He was told to go fight against Northern Alliance forces, he said, and sent briefly to a Qaeda training camp. When he tried to leave, he said, he was imprisoned and tortured. At Guantánamo, he has told military officials that the mistreatment badly damaged his right arm and that he had spent much of his time there in a psychiatric ward.

Mr. Ginco's lawyers, who are federal public defenders in Oregon, are contesting his detention on the grounds that he could not have fought against the United States after it declared a war on terrorism because he was being held by the Taliban as an American spy.

The Right Charge For The Crime (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Adam Yahiye Gadahn's actions are treasonous, and the charge ensures he'll have the right to trial guaranteed him by the Constitution.

NEWS THAT A GRAND JURY had charged a Southern California native with treason last week begged the question: Can they still do that? The United States, after all, has not charged anyone with treason, a crime defined under English law as early as 1350, since World War II.

But if the facts are as the government alleges, Adam Yahiye Gadahn did indeed commit treason when, in his own words, he "joined a movement waging war on America and killing large numbers of Americans." Gadahn, a convert to Islam who remains a fugitive overseas, has appeared in five propaganda videos for Al Qaeda. Most recently, on the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 terror attacks, Gadahn appeared in a video featuring scenes of the attack, describing the United States as "enemy soil" and extolling the heroism of the terrorists. In a previous video released that same month, Ayman Zawahiri, Osama bin Laden's second in command, introduced Gadahn as "our brother, Azzam the American."

Treason is the only crime defined in the Constitution itself, which establishes a higher evidentiary burden — two eyewitnesses or a courtroom confession — for its prosecution. This higher burden, and the ability to rely on other criminal statutes in most such cases, is the reason the government so seldom resorts to the charge of treason. But in Gadahn's case, his own video messages may help the government prove its case, and prosecutors were within their rights to charge him with the most serious offense against the nation, a crime that can be punishable by death.

There may be no evidence that Gadahn picked up a gun or assembled bombs. But the U.S. criminal code, which tracks the constitutional language, states that "whoever, owing allegiance to the United States, levies war against them or adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, is guilty of treason." If the government can prove the facts it alleges, that is clearly what Gadahn did — he joined the enemy (there can be little doubt that a state of war exists between Al Qaeda and the U.S.) to further its cause.

The government's attempts to circumvent the Constitution in its war on terror — by establishing military tribunals lacking in due process and wiretapping Americans without a warrant — have been roundly and rightly criticized. But in this case, the Justice Department is relying on the U.S. court system and the most venerable of U.S. laws to bring a high-profile U.S. operative of Al Qaeda to justice.

Guilty Until Confirmed Guilty (NYT)

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

When President Bush rammed the bill on military commissions through Congress, the Republicans crowed about creating a process that would be tough on terrorists but preserve essential principles of justice. “America can be proud,” said Senator Lindsey Graham, one of the bill’s architects.

Unfortunately, Mr. Graham was wrong. One of the many problems with the new law is that it will only make it harder than it already is to separate the real terrorists from the far larger group of inmates at Guantánamo Bay who were bit players in the Taliban or innocent bystanders. Mr. Graham and other supporters of this dreadful legislation seem to have forgotten that American justice does not merely deliver swift punishment to the guilty. It also protects the innocent.

Mr. Bush ignored that fact after 9/11, when he tried to put the prisoners of the war on terror beyond the reach of American law and the Geneva Conventions. For starters, he dispensed with one of the vital provisions of the conventions: that prisoners must be screened by a “competent tribunal” if there is any doubt about who they are and what role they played in hostilities. As a result, hundreds of men captured in Afghanistan and other countries were sent to Guantánamo Bay and other prisons, including the network of illegal C.I.A. detention camps, without any attempt to determine whether they were any sort of combatant, legal or illegal.

The Bush administration showed not the slightest interest in fixing this problem until the Supreme Court said in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld that the president cannot simply lock up anyone — even a foreign citizen — without giving him a real chance to challenge his detention before a “neutral decision maker.”

In response, Mr. Bush created Combatant Status Review Tribunals, which gave the most cursory possible reviews of the Gitmo detainees. These reviews took place years after the prisoners were captured. They permitted the use of hearsay evidence, evidence obtained through coercion and even torture, and evidence that was kept secret from the prisoner. The normal burden of proof was reversed: the tribunals presumed prisoners were justifiably detained and the prisoners had the burden of disproving government evidence — presuming they knew what it was in the first place.

The new law leaves this mockery of justice stronger. The Military Commissions Act of 2006 makes it virtually impossible to contest a status tribunal's decision. It prohibits claims of habeas corpus — the ancient right of prisoners in just societies to have their detentions reviewed — or any case based directly or indirectly on the Geneva Conventions. Even if an appeal got to the single appeals court now authorized to hear it, the administration would very likely argue that it cannot be heard without jeopardizing secrets, as it has done repeatedly.

The new law dangerously expands the definition of illegal enemy combatant and allows Mr. Bush — and the secretary of defense — to give to anyone they choose the authority to designate a prisoner as an illegal combatant. It also allows Mr. Bush to go on squirreling prisoners away at secret C.I.A. camps where none of the rules apply.

Mr. Bush wants Americans to trust him to apply these powers only to truly dangerous men. Even if our system were based on that sort of personal power and not the rule of law, it would be hard to trust the judgment of a president and an administration whose records are so bad. The United States has yet to acknowledge that it kidnapped an innocent Canadian citizen and sent him to be abused in a Syrian prison. In another case, a German citizen has accused the United States of grabbing him off the streets of Macedonia, drugging him and sending him to Afghanistan, where he was brutally treated. Then there is the Ethiopian living in London who said he was grabbed by American agents and brutalized by Moroccan torturers until he confessed to plotting with Jose Padilla to set off a "dirty bomb." Mr. Padilla was never charged with the crime. The Ethiopian remains at Guantánamo Bay.

Republicans who support the new law like to point out that it only covers foreigners. But Americans have never believed that human rights are just for Americans. Our nation is outraged when an authoritarian government jails an American, or one of its own citizens, on trumped-up charges and brings him or her before a phony court. Surely that is not the model we want to follow in our nation's prisons.

U.S. Policy Could Help 9/11 Suspect (MCT)

By Matthew Schofield

McClatchy Newspapers, October 15, 2006

HAMBURG, Germany | There is no dispute that Mounir el-Motassadeq was close to the men who carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

He spent three months at an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan. He lived near lead hijacker Mohammed Atta in Hamburg and signed as the witness to Atta's will. He held power of attorney over the bank account of another hijacker, Marwan al-Shehhi. He transferred $2,500 to plotter Ramzi Binalshib. He even sent money to the United States that was used to help finance the hijackers' pilot training.

German authorities charged him with 3,066 counts of accessory to murder, and in February 2003 he was convicted — the first person to stand trial in the attacks.

But that conviction was overturned by a German appeals court in 2004. This year, he was ordered released pending resolution of appeals.

Now el-Motassadeq, who is free on bond, is about to learn whether U.S. security policy will help him walk away from criminal charges in the worst terrorist attack in American history.

A German court Thursday began a hearing into whether the accessory-to-murder charges should be restored. The German government is seeking a third trial in the matter.

Among the issues is whether the United States will allow German lawyers to question two key figures in the Sept. 11 plot: alleged ringleader Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and co-conspirator Binalshib.

DOJ_NMG_0081447

At the time of el-Motassadeq's trials and appeals, Mohammed and Binalshib were being held in secret at an undisclosed location by the CIA. Despite two visits to America by the German prosecutor, U.S. officials declined to make the two men available for questioning.

In September, Mohammed and Binalshib were transferred to U.S. military custody and are now being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

U.S. military lawyers will soon be appointed to represent them under a law authorizing the Bush administration to try them and other terror suspects before military tribunals.

It is unclear, however, whether the military will make Mohammed and Binalshib available to assist in el-Motassadeq's case. The German prosecutor's office won't comment on whether it would renew efforts to question them — German law forbids prosecutors from commenting outside of court — and spokesmen for the U.S. Justice Department and the Pentagon said they had no information on the subject.

German prosecutors, however, say they will ask the court to reinstate the accessory-to-murder charges.

They will argue that even though el-Motassedeq may not have known precisely when and what Atta and his companions were planning, he knew enough to be found guilty of helping them.

Whether testimony from Mohammed and Binalshib would help prosecutors convict el-Motassadeq is unclear. One of the issues in this case is that he says it would clear him.

Mohammed is thought to have first suggested the hijacking plan to Osama bin Laden. Binalshib, who roomed with Atta in Hamburg, is suspected of becoming the plot's principal logistician after America refused him a visa.

El-Motassadeq insists their testimony would show that he knew little of the plot. His first trial statements that the CIA delivered to the prosecutors appeared to confirm this.

Even so, the court refused to accept the statements after el-Motassadeq's attorney suggested they might have been the result of torture.

U.S. officials declined then to discuss the conditions under which the two men were questioned. Any future German questioning of Mohammed and Binalshib would be likely to focus on how they were treated during the years they were held by the CIA.

Arbitrator: Supermax Prison Understaffed (AP-Y)

By Catherine Tsai, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

Staffing at the Supermax prison has gotten so low that job hazards have increased for correctional officers watching over the nation's worst terrorists, an arbitrator has ruled.

The arbitrator stopped short of ordering the Bureau of Prisons to hire more staff, but union officials representing Supermax officers said the ruling would bolster their argument to Congress for more prison funding.

"If the most maximum security federal penitentiary is indeed understaffed, what is happening across the entire Bureau of Prisons as far as staffing levels?" asked state Rep. Buffie McFadyen, who testified for the union at an arbitration hearing in May. Her district includes Supermax and 11 other state and federal prisons.

The American Federation of Government Employees had said assaults and threats increased after staffing at the Supermax was reduced last year. Two inmates were killed in two separate incidents.

The slayings were the first since the prison 90 miles southwest of Denver opened in 1994. It houses the nation's most dangerous inmates, including al-Qaida member Zacarias Moussaoui, Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski and Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols.

Housing units at Supermax require three officers per shift, but entire units were sometimes left unstaffed, and cells were not being searched regularly, the arbitrator found.

Arbitrator Joseph Lazar ordered the bureau to reduce inherent hazards at Supermax to the lowest possible levels, as called for by a collective bargaining agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0081448

"The agency in fact did not keep its bargain to lower hazards to the lowest possible level," Lazar wrote in a ruling made available Friday by union officials.

Supermax officials were not immediately available for comment.

Islamic Schools Test Ideal Of Integration In Britain (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

LEICESTER, England — The sports hall doubles as a prayer room and dining hall for male teenagers, at other times for young women, but never the two together. In the kindergarten, female teachers, warned of an impending visit by a man, draw full facial veils before receiving their guest. When the guest arrives, the children offer a chorus in Arabic: "As salaam aleikum" — peace be upon you.

"Here we can keep ourselves on the path of religion," said Nasir Nathalia, a 15-year-old student at the Leicester Islamic Academy. His friend Mohammed Seedat agrees. "There is less chance here of going off the track," he said.

This is the piety that Britain's expanding Islamic schools seek to project, casting themselves as typical of the thousands of faith schools, mainly Christian, that make up roughly one-third of all publicly financed British schools.

But the visible differences — the way female teenagers wear the full-length dress and head-covering and the boys wear black robes and skullcaps — play into a ferocious debate about the sense of separateness or readiness to integrate Britain's estimated 1.8 million Muslims, about 3 percent of the population.

And the discussion touches on a much wider theme of ethnic segregation across the British state-financed educational system. "Segregation is now so extreme in some schools that there is not much further it can go," Trevor Phillips, the chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality, told a parliamentary panel. "It doesn't help to prepare children in these schools for the real world."

Neither, some believe, does it bridge the gap between a largely secular society and a profound commitment to a single faith.

"If you are going to have Islamic schools, the question is whether they are going to embrace Western values," said Patrick Sookhdeo, a Pakistan-born Anglican priest who converted from Islam and who runs a not-for-profit institute committed to maintaining Christian values. "I would argue that Islamic values are not compatible with Western values."

Others disagree just as boldly. "If you think faith schools are divisive, it would help a great deal to know why: Is there empirical evidence?" said Mohamed Mukadam, the principal of the Leicester Islamic Academy.

Students from Islamic schools, Mr. Mukadam said in an interview, were not associated with either the religious and racial riots in northern England in the early 2000's or in any of the recent terrorism conspiracies. "If you want to examine the northern riots, or the terrorism," he said, "I have not come across a single person from faith schools or who went to faith schools."

It is a debate shot through with fear and resentment after terrorist attacks by Muslims and alleged plots in London, leaving the British government to ponder how it can properly deny state financing to Islamic schools that teach the core subjects of the national curriculum when it provides money for much more numerous schools of Christian, Jewish or other faiths. Only 7 Islamic schools receive public financing, compared with 36 Jewish schools, and about 7,000 Christian schools.

The parents of just 3 percent of Muslim students enroll them in Islamic schools, where the education is generally rigorous and there is a code to nurture their Islamic identity, shield them from discrimination and provide moral guidance. The bulk of the 140 Islamic schools charge tuition. At Leicester, for instance, tuition is $2,700 a year.

"Muslim children in this country tend to live separate lives anyhow," said Mark Halstead, a professor of education at the University of Huddersfield in northern England. "Whether they go to Muslim school does not make much difference to their segregation. They are concentrated in the inner cities. They could be attending a state school that is 90 percent Muslim anyway."

A report by Simon Burgess, a professor of economics, discovered that, for instance, in the blue-collar Tower Hamlets district of East London, where ethnic minorities form 48 percent of the population, nearly half the schools were "exclusively nonwhite."

DOJ_NMG_0081449

The issue of Islamic separateness is magnified by a recent debate about a full-face veil that shows only the eyes and is known as the niqab. Some non-Muslims, most notably Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, have said the veil illustrates that Muslims are rejecting British norms; others say simply that Britons are discriminating against Muslims.

The debate cuts to the heart of Britain's stated philosophy on multiculturalism, defined 40 years ago by the Labor politician Roy Jenkins when he was home secretary. In laying out a new immigration policy, he said immigration should not lead to a "flattening process of assimilation" but instead should provide "equal opportunity accompanied by cultural diversity."

But now, as the country is struggling so publicly with Muslim assimilation, some analysts like Mr. Phillips of the Commission for Racial Equality fear that a premium on cultural separateness has Britain "sleepwalking into segregation."

On another level, the debate over Islamic schools here also involves equity in the use of tax money.

According to the Department of Education in London, private schools must meet laborious and detailed criteria to gain access to state financing, and many Islamic schools have failed to do so.

Since 1997, according to government figures, only 25 "minority faith" schools have qualified for government financing — 15 of them Jewish and the rest Muslim, Sikh, Greek Orthodox and Seventh-day Adventist schools.

Islamic schools typically teach the same basic subjects as in other faith or state-run schools. All — private and public — are subject to inspections.

But there are differences.

While Christian schools say 25 percent of their seats are open to non-Christians, Mr. Mukadam said there were so few Islamic schools that it would be impractical to offer admission to non-Muslims.

In Leicester, many students attend Koranic recitation and memorization lessons at separate madrasas — schools run by mosques without regulation — outside normal school hours.

Still, a survey by the Islamic Human Rights Commission last year said that Muslims in several categories — people who are older, wealthier and more secular, and students in their late teens — placed academic success ahead of religious affiliation in choosing a school.

According to the most recent government inspection of the Leicester Islamic Academy educational standards in 2002, most of its teenage students achieved twice the national average grades in the examinations that high school students take around the age of 16. But that does not necessarily immunize students from the broader pressures of life as British Muslims, even in Leicester.

This city in the English midlands, once known as a center for manufacturing shoes and textiles, prides itself on diversity. More than one-third of the 300,000 residents are members of Britain's ethnic minorities, and Leicester is expected to become Britain's first city with a nonwhite majority in less than a decade. But it has not been protected from the threat of terrorism: in early 2002, the police rounded up what they called an Al Qaeda cell here.

The sight of Muslims under attack in Palestinian areas or Iraq, said Nasir, the student at the academy here, "makes us want to help, through giving or charity." Yusuf Parekh, a 15-year-old classmate, said some people felt the pain and anger particularly because "their people are being killed back home."

But is violence justified? "Only as a last resort," he said.

But Mr. Mukadam, who is also chairman of the Association of Muslim Schools, insisted that his school taught loyalty to Britain as a land that offered religious and other freedoms. If an Islamic school were found to be "fomenting radicalism," he said, "it is my first duty to say this school should not exist."

He acknowledged that some students might feel passionately about the plight of fellow Muslims elsewhere. "My job," he said, "is to understand their deep hurt but get them away from the radicals that promote violence."

Having Their Say, For A Moment Or All Day (WP)

By An Afternoon At Speakers' Corner

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

LONDON

DOJ_NMG_0081450

Just after noon last Sunday, seven people stood on stools and stepladders that they had lugged to this famous spot in central London. Soon, small crowds -- many among them regular listeners and hecklers -- filled the corner of Hyde Park that for more than a century has been known as the place to go to speak your mind.

"Those idiotic remarks!" said Heiko Khoo, emphatically disagreeing with the position of Jack Straw, leader of the House of Commons, that the veil worn by some Muslim women is a "visible statement of separation."

Khoo, 41, a tour guide who has been speaking here most Sundays for 20 years, contended that Straw knew Muslims would never vote for his Labor Party because of its support of the Iraq war, so he decided to court what Khoo called the "numbskull brigade: those who think, 'Those bleed'n Muslims, they don't belong here. Why don't they behave like us?' "

Several yards away, another regular on a ladder, a woman in a "Gone With the Wind" puffy red dress, asked people gathering around her to address her as "Madame Speaker." Farther away, a man attracted a group of German tourists with a huge placard around his neck that read, "IT'S GOING TO GET WORSE."

"What will get worse?" he was asked.

"Obesity!" he replied in a deeply serious tone. He gave the impression he had more answers at the ready.

There is a bit of everything at Speakers' Corner. Once a place where the condemned were hanged -- and perhaps, some say, because they were given one last chance to say a few words -- the northeast corner of Hyde Park has since the late 19th century been sacred ground for free speech.

There are other noteworthy patches in the 350-acre park -- the Nanny's Lawn, the Lovers' Walk -- but it is only here near Marble Arch where the unsung, along with legends from Winston Churchill to Karl Marx, have come to have their say.

The hot topics on this day were immigration in general and Muslim immigrants in particular.

"Anyone can say what they like," said Anne Martin, 46, a nurse from Kent, who was listening to Khoo defend Muslim women's right to dress as they wish.

Others may spend their Sundays having the family over for a roast or enjoying a museum or a ramble, as the British call a walk in the countryside. But Martin drives here, two hours each way, to revel in the chance to listen to people whose paths she would otherwise never cross.

"I have gone up to Muslim women here," she said, "and asked, 'Why do you wear the hijab ?' " She said she couldn't do that on just any old street corner, but here, it is encouraged. She said she heard answers ranging from "I am happy to wear it" to "It's the way of my husband."

"You can ask questions, and nobody is offended," she said, adding that she has only once seen a fistfight break out. She said the police who stand out of sight at a nearby corner moved quickly to end it.

At 1:15 p.m., 18-year-old Chris Brennan was risking a fight as he disparaged foreigners. But while angry words like "racist" were hurled at him, he persisted in saying he thought his country was better when it was, as he said, "white."

"I have a democratic right to come out and speak like the communists do over there," Brennan said pointing to another gaggle of people across the pavement.

Emily Stapleton, 28, a marketing executive, shouted to Brennan that she is going out with an Asian man: "I don't see anything wrong with it, why should you?"

Gary Castle, a street sweeper, piped up that most of those cleaning up London's trash alongside him were from Eastern Europe. He said they were helping, not hurting, the country because "they are willing to do the jobs we aren't."

Brennan tried to stand his ground but was losing his audience. "He's completely mad," said Ali Mohamed, 21, a Somali-born Londoner, as he turned to find another speaker. "But it tells you something."

Khoo, who speaks four or five hours each Sunday, showed no sign of tiring at 2:30 p.m. and seemed to draw energy from the crowd.

As he was addressing the perception that immigrants receive cheap public housing while hardworking low-income British people must fend for themselves, a man shouted to him: "So if there are only 10 houses, who gets them?"

"We build more," he thundered back. "We don't blame the people who get houses for the shortage."

Behind him, tourists hopped on and off open-air red buses and thousands of runners dressed in bright green and orange T-shirts ran by, participating in a downtown road race.

DOJ_NMG_0081451

Yards away, an elderly man in big glasses and a blue knit cap recited poetry: "She forgot the stars, the moon and sun . . . She forgot the dells where the water runs . . . ."

Lloyd James, 64, said he couldn't quite remember who wrote those lovely lines, but he comes here to share them out loud. "I used to speak on politics, but people like to shout and argue," he said.

Then he continued his delivery, a quiet beauty amid the boisterous clash of words and worldviews:

" . . . She had no knowledge when the day was done."

PATRIOT ACT:

For God And Country (NYT)

By Interview By Deborah Solomon

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Q: Your new book about the aftermath of 9/11 is titled <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="141747;242031;138166;152893">"Never Again," but isn't that an inappropriate use of a phrase that has traditionally referred to the Holocaust? </object.title>

<object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="141747;242031;138166;152893">I used it because President Bush turned and looked in my direction and said, "Don't ever let this happen again."</object.title>

Now that you have left your post as U.S. attorney general and are working as a lobbyist, would you still defend the president's willingness to disregard the Geneva Conventions in the treatment and torture of suspected terrorists?

I think there is a very sound argument for saying that those who violate the Geneva Conventions should not benefit from its provisions.

You're talking about the terrorists. But we can't stoop to their level. This is the United States of America. We have to guarantee the rights of everyone, including prisoners.

Well, we have guaranteed many rights to the prisoners.

What about the Patriot Act, which licensed the disregard of certain privacy laws designed to protect our own citizens?

After years of misrepresentation and pillorying by a variety of groups like the A.C.L.U. that ended up making a lot of money by opposing it and developed a lot of membership by opposing it, its renewal passed by 89 votes in the Senate.

They didn't oppose the Patriot Act in order to make money, or as some kind of marketing scheme.

If you think they don't care about membership, I think that's a naïve understanding of the way politics works in America.

As one of the best-known evangelical Christians in this country, what do you make of the current pope, Benedict XVI?

When the pope speaks, I take it very seriously. But I don't take it as ultimately authoritative, unless I find it to be consistent with what I believe is ultimately authoritative, and that's the Scripture.

What did you think when the pope gave that controversial speech last month, appearing to debunk Islam by referring to a medieval text that characterizes Muhammad as a prophet of violence?

If the pope thought the Muslim faith were better than the Catholic faith, he'd be a Muslim. To say that you have beliefs and that they are equal to everyone else's beliefs all the time is to devalue the concept of belief.

In that case, do you think your own religious tradition of evangelicalism is superior to Catholicism?

For me it is.

What about Islam?

I don't think it's the faith for me. I find that I respond to the reconciliation, the healing and the forgiveness of Jesus.

Don't all the major monotheistic religions — Judaism, Christianity and Islam — teach compassion?

In some cases, they do. I can't really speak for them. I'm a Christian for a variety of reasons. Maybe because it's easy. What I have to do to please God is to confess that I am a sinner instead of trying to prove that I am good.

So you see yourself as a sinner?

Yes. I fail and do things that I wish I didn't do.

Such as?

I'm unkind on occasion, and I am selfish. For me, embracing the Christian faith is something that I do not because I am good but because I am not good, because I need help.

Why? Do you drink?

I drink probably a quart or two a day, but not of alcohol! I don't consume alcohol at all. I've never had a mixed drink.

Have you ever smoked a cigarette?

No. I puffed on a cigar one time, and it just made my mouth feel like someone had shot a cobweb all inside my mouth.

If you felt temptation for another woman, what would you do?

Call my wife.

In addition to songwriting, you dabble in the visual arts. What sort of work do you do?

I make barbed-wire sculpture.

Why barbed wire?

Because there was a surplus of it on my farm.

Well, thank you for making time for this interview.

I just hope that in meeting people, they'll understand that I am not as bad as they thought I was.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

The Unsolved Case Of Anthrax (WP)

By Tom Daschle

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Oct. 15, 2001, is a day I'll never forget. On that day one of my staff members opened an anthrax-laced letter addressed to me, and my office became a part of the deadliest bioterrorism attack in U.S. history. Anthrax was also sent through the mail to a number of other people and organizations -- the National Enquirer, the New York Post, broadcaster Tom Brokaw and Sen. Pat Leahy of Vermont. These attacks killed five people, injured 17 others, disrupted operations all over Capitol Hill and alarmed an entire nation.

Twenty-eight people, including 20 on my staff, tested positive for anthrax exposure. Though relieved that they were spared the horror of the disease, I am reminded every day that the families and friends of five others were not so lucky. Robert Stevens in Florida, Kathy Nguyen in New York, Ottilie Lundgren in Connecticut, and Thomas Morris Jr. and Joseph Curseen in Washington were all victims of the attack.

Five years later, the alarm I and many others experienced on that dark day has been replaced by a deep discouragement and dismay.

The investigation's trail has gone cold. Physical evidence that might have been gathered in the first days and weeks after the attacks is long gone. Meanwhile, if a recent article in The Post is any guide, questions remain in the scientific community about the composition of the anthrax and the level of technological expertise required to manufacture it -- even though there is no question about its extreme lethality.

While the FBI has made gains in its scientific capabilities and understanding of anthrax, its slowness to move and its lack of direction in the early stages of the investigation led to missed opportunities. In this age when we face a new kind of enemy, we need to be able to adapt our counterterrorism and law enforcement strategies to meet the threat.

We ought to use this fifth anniversary of the attack to rededicate ourselves to solving the crime and ensuring that we are better prepared to confront similar attacks.

First, the FBI and the Justice Department must treat this investigation with urgency. Solving the crime would send an important message to the perpetrator(s), to those who are contemplating similar attacks and to the American people.

Second, the Sept. 11 commission called for the creation of an FBI national security workforce and for a recalibration of the FBI mission -- from sole concentration on its criminal justice mission and toward increased focus on national security. Late last year the commission gave the FBI a C on its progress. A recent examination of the bureau found that new agents get insufficient counterterrorism training and that the role of analysts is underappreciated. These reforms, like the investigation of the attack itself, need to be implemented with urgency.

Third, progress on the investigation and needed reforms are hindered by a lack of congressional oversight. Part of that is the FBI's fault: Even the targets of this attack have been denied updates on the investigation since mid-2004, the last time I was briefed on it. But Congress cannot and should not be given a free pass on the issue. There has been dramatically little oversight of FBI reorganization in the two years since the Sept. 11 commission's initial report was released and the year since the commission released its review of progress toward implementing its sensible recommendations.

Finally, there has been precious little reform of our public health infrastructure to ensure that we are prepared for future terrorist attacks and health emergencies. Every American deserves to know that he or she will receive the best care this country has to offer if and when the next disaster strikes.

Regrettably, we learned after Hurricane Katrina that emergency health services are both scarce and fragile in this country. Moreover, our funding for public health infrastructure has lagged, exacerbating the crisis in emergency capacity. And efforts to stockpile necessary drugs have been usurped by inefficient subsidies to drug companies and by bureaucratic indecision.

It's been five years since the anthrax attacks shook our country and took the lives of five Americans. We cannot permit another five to pass before we close this chapter and prepare for the next one.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Keeps Revising War Justification (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, October 15, 2006

President Bush keeps revising his explanation for why the U.S. is in Iraq, moving from narrow military objectives at first to history-of-civilization stakes now.

Initially, the rationale was specific: to stop Saddam Hussein from using what Bush claimed were the Iraqi leader's weapons of mass destruction or from selling them to al-Qaida or other terrorist groups.

But 3 1/2 years later, with no weapons found, still no end in sight and the war a liability for nearly all Republicans on the ballot Nov. 7, the justification has become far broader and now includes the expansive "struggle between good and evil."

Republicans seized on North Korea's reported nuclear test last week as further evidence that the need for strong U.S. leadership extends beyond Iraq.

Bush's changing rhetoric reflects increasing administration efforts to tie the war, increasingly unpopular at home, with the global fight against terrorism, still the president's strongest suit politically.

"We can't tolerate a new terrorist state in the heart of the Middle East, with large oil reserves that could be used to fund its radical ambitions, or used to inflict economic damage on the West," Bush said in a news conference last week in the Rose Garden.

When no weapons of mass destruction were found in Iraq, Bush shifted his war justification to one of liberating Iraqis from a brutal ruler.

After Saddam's capture in December 2003, the rationale became helping to spread democracy through the Middle East. Then it was confronting terrorists in Iraq "so we do not have to face them here at home," and "making America safer," themes Bush pounds today.

"We're in the ideological struggle of the 21st century," he told a California audience this month. "It's a struggle between good and evil."

Vice President Dick Cheney takes it even further: "The hopes of the civilized world ride with us," Cheney tells audiences.

Except for the weapons of mass destruction argument, there is some validity in each of Bush's shifting rationales, said Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign policy scholar at the Brookings Institution who initially supported the war effort.

DOJ_NMG_0081454

"And I don't have any big problems with any of them, analytically. The problem is they can't change the realities on the ground in Iraq, which is that we're in the process of beginning to lose," O'Hanlon said. "It is taking us a long time to realize that, but the war is not headed the way it should be."

Andrew Card, Bush's first chief of staff, said Bush's evolving rhetoric, including his insistence that Iraq is a crucial part of the fight against terrorism, is part of an attempt to put the war in better perspective for Americans.

The administration recently has been "doing a much better job" in explaining the stakes, Card said in an interview. "We never said it was going to be easy. The president always told us it would be long and tough."

"I'm trying to do everything I can to remind people that the war on terror has the war in Iraq as a subset. It's critical we succeed in Iraq as part of the war on terror," said Card, who left the White House in March.

Bush at first sought to explain increasing insurgent and sectarian violence as a lead-up to Iraqi elections. But elections came and went, and a democratically elected government took over, and the sectarian violence increased.

Bush has insisted U.S. soldiers will stand down as Iraqis stand up. He has likened the war to the 20th century struggles against fascism, Nazism and communism. He has called Iraq the "central front" in a global fight against radical jihadists.

Having jettisoned most of the earlier, upbeat claims of progress, Bush these days emphasizes consequences of setting even a limited withdrawal timetable: abandonment of the Iraqi people, destabilizing the Middle East and emboldening terrorists around the world.

The more ominous and determined his words, the more skeptical the American public appears, polls show, both on the war itself and over whether it is part of the larger fight against terrorism, as the administration insists.

Bush's approval rating, reflected by AP-Ipsos polls, has slid from the mid 60s at the outset of the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003 to the high 30s now. There were light jumps upward after the December 2003 capture of Saddam, Bush's re-election in November 2004 and each of three series of aggressive speeches over the past year. Those gains tended to vanish quickly.

With the war intruding on the fall elections, both parties have stepped up their rhetoric.

Republicans, who are also reeling from the congressional page scandal, are casting Democrats as seeking to "cut and run" and appease terrorists.

Democrats accuse Bush of failed leadership with his "stay the course" strategy. They cite a government intelligence assessment suggesting the Iraq war has helped recruit more terrorists, and a book by journalist Bob Woodward that portrays Bush as intransigent in his defense of the Iraq war and his advisers as bitterly divided.

Democrats say Iraq has become a distraction from the war against terrorism — not a central front. But they are divided among themselves on what strategy to pursue.

Republicans, too, increasingly are growing divided as U.S. casualties rise.

"I struggle with the fact that President Bush said, `As the Iraqis stand up, we will stand down.' But the fact is, this has not happened," said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., a war supporter turned war skeptic.

The Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Sen. John Warner of Virginia, said after a recent visit to Iraq that Iraq was "drifting sideways." He urged consideration of a "change of course" if the Iraq government fails to restore order over the next two or three months.

More than 2,750 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the war, most of them since Bush's May 2003 "mission accomplished" aircraft carrier speech. Tens of thousands of Iraqis have died.

Recent events have been dispiriting.

The United States now has about 141,000 troops in Iraq, up from about 127,000 in July. Some military experts have suggested at least one additional U.S. division, or around 20,000 troops, is needed in western Iraq alone.

Dan Benjamin, a former Middle East specialist with the National Security Council in the Clinton administration, said the administration is overemphasizing the nature of the threat in an effort to bolster support.

"I think the administration has oversold the case that Iraq could become a jihadist state," said Benjamin, now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "If the U.S. were to leave Iraq tomorrow, the result would be a bloodbath in which Sunnis and Shiites fight it out. But the jihadists would not be able to seek power."

Not all of Bush's rhetorical flourishes have had the intended consequences.

DOJ_NMG_0081455

When the history of Iraq is finally written, the recent surge in sectarian violence is "going to be a comma," Bush said in several recent appearances.

Critics immediately complained that the remark appeared unsympathetic and dismissive of U.S. and Iraqi casualties, an assertion the White House disputed.

For a while last summer, Bush depicted the war as one against "Islamic fascism," borrowing a phrase from conservative commentators. The strategy backfired, further fanning anti-American sentiment across the Muslim world.

The "fascism" phrase abruptly disappeared from Bush's speeches, reportedly after he was talked out of it by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Karen Hughes, a longtime Bush confidant now with the State Department.

Hughes said she would not disclose private conversations with the president. But, she told the AP, she did not use the "fascism" phrase herself. "I use `violent extremist,'" she said.

26 Killed In Revenge Attacks Outside Baghdad (NYT)

By Michael Luo And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 14 — A rural Shiite town northwest of here exploded in sectarian reprisals on Saturday as angry residents, many roving the streets in armed packs on the backs of pickup trucks, killed at least 26 people from a nearby Sunni village, provincial authorities said.

The killings in the town of Balad , about 50 miles from Baghdad, were in response to the slaughter of 14 Shiite construction workers whose beheaded bodies were found Friday in an orchard in Dhuluiya, a Sunni town, said Hamad al-Qaisi, governor of Salahuddin Province, which includes both towns.

The workers had gone to Dhuluiya on Thursday to help rebuild houses and were on their way back when they were kidnapped by Sunni militiamen, said another government official from Salahedin who spoke on condition of anonymity.

When their corpses were eventually brought back to Balad, angry mobs gathered in the streets clamoring for revenge, Mr. al-Qaisi said.

Armed residents set up a checkpoint inside Balad's central market area, where many people from Dhuluiya come to shop, he said, as well as one on the road between the two towns.

At least 26 bullet-riddled bodies, all believed to be Sunni residents of Dhuluiya, were found around Balad on Saturday, he said.

Mr. Qaisi went to Balad to meet with tribal sheiks to urge restraint. He said he exacted their promises to do what they could. Meanwhile, he imposed a curfew as of Saturday evening on Balad and Dujail, a neighboring Shiite town, where sectarian tensions are also high, he said.

"The situation is very bad in both Balad and Dujail," he said.

Gunmen in pickup trucks were still roaming Balad on Saturday afternoon, he said, adding that he has asked the American military to help him impose order.

The American military reported that an Iraqi detainee at Camp Bucca died Saturday morning from what appeared to be a heart attack. The detainee was checked into the camp's hospital on Oct. 5, the military said. At 1:40 a.m. Saturday he called for assistance, and doctors tried to help him. Shortly afterward, a cardiac monitor showed no pulse. Efforts to revive him failed, the statement said.

In central Baghdad, a pair of car bombs exploded about 1 p.m., wounding one person, an Interior Ministry official said.

At least 22 bullet-riddled bodies, many of them handcuffed and bearing signs of torture, were found by the police across the capital on Saturday, the official said.

Another car bomb blast just 15 minutes earlier aimed at an American convoy in Dora resulted in no casualties, he said.

In other violence in Iraq, a Shiite family of four was killed at dawn in Mahmudiya by gunmen dressed in military-style uniforms, The Associated Press said. At least seven people were reported killed in a mortar attack near Baquba.

Two more American servicemen were killed on Saturday, one from a roadside bomb in Baghdad and the other from "enemy action" in Anbar Province, the American military said.

Sunni Arabs Targeted In Revenge Killings (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Muhanned Saif Aldin

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Violence Flares After Beheading Of Shiite Workers

BAGHDAD, Oct. 14 -- Seeking revenge for the killing of 17 Shiite farmworkers, Shiite militiamen surged into a town north of Baghdad on Saturday to launch attacks that by nightfall killed at least 27 Sunni Arabs, many of them brought to a hospital bearing the marks of electric drills and other signs of torture, according to medical workers, residents, police and militia leaders.

Sounds of shooting suggested the killing in the city of Balad continued into the night Saturday, as reinforcements from the Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry arrived and residents cowered in their homes. "You hear nothing but gunshots," Hasanein Ali, assistant director of Balad's hospital, said by telephone.

In addition to the dead counted at the hospital, one Balad resident who fled the city said he had seen more bodies burned in the streets.

The fierce outbreak of violence in the mostly Shiite city, surrounded by Sunni towns, was sparked in the mostly Sunni town of Duluiyah. The two communities are separated only by the Tigris River about 50 miles north of Baghdad.

On Friday, 17 Shiite laborers who had been hired to prune date palm trees in Duluiyah were kidnapped, police said. The workers' headless bodies were found outside the town later that day.

Shiite leaders in Balad said they responded to the farmworkers' killings by asking a Baghdad office of Moqtada al-Sadr, an influential Shiite cleric, to send militiamen and weapons.

"It is necessary to take a strong stand, so that such killings will not be repeated, and so we can take our revenge," said Taysser Musawi, a Shiite cleric in Balad.

Scores of militia fighters went to Balad in answer to the call, and residents said they targeted the city's Sunni minority.

"The armed men, using loudspeakers, ordered Sunnis to leave the city of Balad within 24 hours or they will face death," said Ali, the hospital official. "The city now is in the hands of the armed men and the militias."

Ali added that some police officers appeared to be fighting alongside the militiamen.

Ali said 27 dead Sunnis had been brought to the hospital, and said he believed more bodies had yet to be collected because of darkness and the fighting. A local Sunni resident, Muhannad Khalaf, interviewed outside Balad, said he had seen three burned bodies on the road as he fled north to safety in the Sunni city of Tikrit.

The attacks allegedly sparked fighting between townspeople of Duluiyah and Balad. In Balad, police Capt. Abdul Aziz Khazrajy said the Interior Ministry in Baghdad sent security forces to the scene.

Khalaf asserted that the Interior Ministry commandos had set up checkpoints and were screening travelers, seeking out Sunnis. Both Shiite and Sunni fighters in Iraq's growing sectarian violence often are accused of using traffic checks to find and kill members of the opposite sect.

A police major in Duluiyah, Hussein Alwan, said by telephone that residents "are in a state of alert and top readiness. They are carrying arms, while mosques are calling on the people through loudspeakers to take up arms in defense of the town. They expect an imminent attack" by Interior Ministry commandos.

Tensions in the area have been high for weeks, "but yesterday's killing of the 17 farmworkers was the spark that will set off total war" there, Alwan said.

The fighting in the Tigris River towns served as a microcosm of the Shiite-Sunni killing that has increased dramatically this year and is claiming scores of lives in the capital and around Iraq every day, according to monthly counts from Iraqi authorities.

Baghdad police said they had found 23 bodies between midnight Friday and noon Saturday. All of the victims were shot and most of them bore signs of torture.

Three separate attacks involving bombs or mortars killed three civilians and a policeman in Baghdad, police said.

In the northern oil city of Kirkuk, gunmen attacked an Iraqi army checkpoint, triggering a clash that killed two gunmen, Lt. Col. Sadrudeen Aziz said.

DOJ_NMG_0081457

The U.S. military reported that a bomb killed an American soldier southwest of Baghdad on Friday and, on Saturday, a U.S. airman was killed in action in Baghdad and a Marine died "due to enemy action" in the western province of Anbar. October is on track to be one of the deadliest months of the war for U.S. forces, with more than 40 killed so far.

Aldin reported from outside Balad. Other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

26 Sunnis Killed In Sectarian Violence (AP)

By Christopher Bodeen

AP, October 15, 2006

Suspected Shiite militiamen killed 26 Sunni Arabs in a city north of Baghdad that has been seized by a rash of sectarian bloodletting, an Interior Ministry official said Sunday.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, reported the deaths of a Marine and four soldiers.

The killings in Balad on Saturday were in apparent retaliation for the slayings of 17 Shiites whose decapitated bodies were found in an orchard on the town's outskirts Friday. An outbreak of sectarian violence has killed 43 people so far in Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad.

Extra police flooded into the city and a curfew was imposed, Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf said. Additional security measures were taken in other villages in the predominantly Sunni area, a hotbed of the insurgency battling U.S. and Iraqi forces.

The Marine was killed in combat Saturday in Anbar province, the Sunni heartland west of Baghdad, the military said.

Three soldiers died in a roadside bombing Saturday south of Baghdad, and another was killed in a roadside bombing Friday night southwest of the capital.

In eastern Baghdad Sunday, Interior Ministry Undersecretary Hala Shakir Salim survived a roadside bomb attack that killed three bystanders and two bodyguards, police Capt. Mohammed Abdul-Ghani said.

A married couple and two of their sons were killed Sunday morning when gunmen burst into their home in Mosul, Iraq's third-largest city 225 miles northwest of Baghdad. Two of their daughters-in-law were critically wounded. Police Col. Eid al-Jibouri said the identities of the attackers and their motive were unknown.

South of Baghdad, three women and four men were killed in drive-by shootings in the predominantly Shiite village of Wahda on Saturday afternoon, said provincial police spokesman Lt. Hadi Hassan.

Iraqi Police Force Facing Shake-up (AP)

By David Rising

AP, October 15, 2006

Iraq's Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry, whose police forces have been accused of complicity in sectarian attacks, has fired 3,000 employees accused of corruption or rights abuses and will change top commanders, a spokesman said Saturday.

Thousands have died this year in the cycle of killings between Shiite and Sunni death squads. At least 22 were killed Saturday, mainly in sectarian attacks.

Authorities also said they discovered the headless bodies of 17 Shiite construction workers in an orchard outside Baghdad, kidnapped and decapitated in apparent retaliation for an attack on Sunni Arabs last week.

The decapitated corpses were found Friday outside the city of Duluiyah, 45 miles north of Baghdad, along with four other unknown victims, also beheaded.

The killings of the workers came after the kidnapping Wednesday of three Sunni Arabs in Duluiyah by a Shiite militia based in Balad, police said. The three were killed and their bodies burned. After the discovery of the bodies late Friday and early Saturday, Sunni families living near Balad were starting to flee their homes, fearing Shiite retaliation.

Amid the growing tensions between Sunni Arabs and Shiites, Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah met Saturday with prominent Iraqi clerics from both sects in the Islamic holy city of Mecca and urged them to seek an end to the violence to allow the two sides to reconcile.

"My brothers, we need now patience, calmness and quiet to get to know each other," the king told them.

Spokesman Abdul-Karim Khalaf said the Interior Ministry shake-up would ensure stronger action to stop the violence.

DOJ_NMG_0081458

"We are working on reshuffling the ministry's vital posts like (the leaders of the) police commandos and public order forces, as well as some undersecretaries," he told The Associated Press, without elaborating.

He said most of the 3,000 employees who had been removed since May were suspected of corruption or human rights violations, but did not specify whether they were involved in militia activities. Up to 600 of them will face prosecution, he said.

The Shiite-led national police force, controlled by the Interior Ministry, is widely accused of being infiltrated by Shiite militias blamed in slayings of Sunni Arabs. Critics say Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has been reluctant to move against the militias since many are linked to parties in his coalition.

The U.S. embarked on an intensive neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep of the capital in August in a crackdown on the killings.

But Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite slum of about 2 million where radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia draws much of its support, has been left alone, and U.S. commanders say they are waiting on the command from al-Maliki's government.

When al-Maliki's government was formed in May, Interior Minister Jawad Bolani was given the post as top security official in large part because he had no militia links. But his lack of militia connections also has given him less leverage to make change.

Earlier this month, an entire brigade of some 700 policemen was suspended from service and taken to barracks because of suspected militia sympathies. The commander of one of the brigade's battalions faces criminal prosecution and others are being investigated.

The troops were suspected of allowing Shiite militias to operate freely in their area, where there had been a mass kidnapping of some two dozen people from a frozen food factory, at least seven of whom have since been found dead.

Problems with the brigade emerged during a broad brigade-by-brigade assessment of police in Baghdad carried out by the U.S. military over the summer. At the time it was taken off line, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, suggested many of the policemen were involved in allowing death squads to operate and would not be brought back.

Still, Khalaf played down the role of the ministry's police forces in militia violence, blaming instead the Facilities Protection Service, rather than the police. The FPS, created to guard government buildings and infrastructure, has some 150,000 members but an unclear command structure.

He said the FPS is not working under the supervision of either the Interior or Defense ministries. U.S. commanders also have said FPS members may be carrying out a large portion of the killings.

The Interior Ministry also has said that many attacks are carried out by people impersonating either Iraqi soldiers or police, and this month introduced new uniforms for certain units and new markings for police vehicles.

Also Saturday, a U.S. airman operating with an Iraqi police unit was killed in combat in Baghdad, the military said, bringing to 46 the number of U.S. servicemembers who have died in Iraq this month.

Seven people were killed in an early morning mortar attack on a small Sunni village near Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. Residents blamed Shiite militias for the attack, in which four mortar rounds were fired into the village.

In the evening, gunmen in a vehicle opened fire in the Shiite village of Wahda, killing three women and four men. Police pursued them and caught one of the attackers, a Sunni gunman, police said.

A Shiite family of four was killed around dawn in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad, army Capt. Oday Abdul-Ridha said. Abdul-Ridha said assailants dressed in military-style uniforms had stormed into the family's house.

In Baghdad, an employee of government-run TV was killed in a drive-by shooting Friday night, police said.

Raed Qais al-Shammari, a technician with the al-Iraqiya station, was standing near his home talking with a friend when he was shot by a gunman from a car in the violence-wracked Dora neighborhood, police said.

The attack follows Thursday's killings of 11 people at Baghdad's private Shaabiya television station. Shiite militiamen are suspected to have carried out that attack, possibly due to perceptions the newly formed station was backing their Sunni Arab rivals.

3,000 Ministry Staffers Fired Over Corruption (WT/AP)

By David Rising

The Washington Times/AP, October 15, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraq's Shi'ite-dominated Interior Ministry, whose police forces have been accused of complicity in sectarian attacks, has fired 3,000 employees accused of corruption or rights abuses and will change top commanders, a spokesman said yesterday.

Thousands have died this year in the cycle of killings between Shi'ite and Sunni death squads. At least 22 were killed yesterday, mainly in sectarian attacks.

Authorities also said they discovered the headless bodies of 17 Shi'ite construction workers in an orchard outside Baghdad, kidnapped and decapitated in apparent retaliation for an attack on Sunni Arabs last week. The decapitated corpses were found Friday outside the city of Duluiyah, 45 miles north of Baghdad, along with four other unknown victims, also beheaded.

The workers were killed after the kidnapping Wednesday of three Sunni Arabs in Duluiyah by a Shi'ite militia based in Balad, police said. The three were killed and their bodies burned. After the discovery of their bodies late Friday and early yesterday, Sunni families living near Balad started to flee their homes, fearing Shi'ite retaliation.

With tension growing between Sunni Arabs and Shi'ites, Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah met yesterday with prominent Iraqi clerics from both sects in the Islamic holy city of Mecca and urged them to seek an end to the violence to allow the two sides to reconcile.

"My brothers, we need now patience, calmness and quiet to get to know each other," the king told them.

Spokesman Abdul-Karim Khalaf said the Interior Ministry shake-up would ensure stronger action to stop the violence.

"We are working on reshuffling the ministry's vital posts like [the leaders of] police commandos and public order forces, as well as some undersecretaries," he told the Associated Press, without elaborating.

He said most of the 3,000 employees who had been removed since May were suspected of corruption or human rights violations, but he did not specify whether they were involved in militia activities. Up to 600 of them will face prosecution, he said.

The Shi'ite-led national police force, controlled by the Interior Ministry, is widely accused of infiltration by Shi'ite militias blamed in slayings of Sunni Arabs. Critics said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has been reluctant to move against the militias because many are linked to parties in his coalition.

The U.S. embarked on an intensive neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep of the capital in August in a crackdown on the killings, but Sadr City, the sprawling Shi'ite slum of about 2 million where radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia draws much of its support, has been left alone. U.S. commanders said they are waiting on the command from Mr. al-Maliki's government.

When Mr. al-Maliki's government was formed in May, Interior Minister Jawad Bolani was given the post as top security official largely because he had no militia links, but his lack of militia connections also has given him less leverage to make change.

Earlier this month, an entire brigade of about 700 policemen was suspended from service and taken to barracks because of suspected militia sympathies. The commander of one of the brigade's battalions faces criminal prosecution, and others are being investigated.

Al-Qaida In Iraq: 'Insurgent Tape' Fake (AP)

AP, October 15, 2006

Al-Qaida in Iraq said Saturday that a recent video tape made by a man claiming to be an insurgent who called for the replacement of the head of the terrorist group was fabricated.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council — an umbrella organization of insurgent groups, including al-Qaida in Iraq — said in a statement posted on its Web site that the video was "a lie and a media trick."

The statement could not be independently confirmed.

On Friday, a man who said he was an Iraqi Islamic insurgent released a video tape urging Osama bin Laden to replace al-Qaida in Iraq's leader with an Iraqi national. The man, who claimed to be Abu Osama al-Iraqi, said in the 17-minute video tape posted on a Web site commonly used by insurgents that there were "deviations" by al-Qaida in Iraq under its new leader Abu Ayyub al-Masri.

DOJ_NMG_0081460

Al-Masri — whose pseudonym means "the Egyptian" — took over the leadership after Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed by a U.S. airstrike in June. Other Sunni insurgents had criticized al-Zarqawi, a Jordanian, for turning Sunni Iraqis against the movement by killing civilians.

The Shura Council said the false video tape "shows the great dilemma that the Crusader's coalition is passing through in Iraq especially after the calls for withdrawal that were released by the British army."

The group was referring to Britain's top soldier, Gen. Richard Dannatt, who said Thursday that British troops should withdraw from Iraq. On Friday, he backpedaled from the comments, saying he meant troops should leave within years.

Attacks On Journalists Continue In Baghdad (LAT)

By Doug Smith And Saif Rasheed

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

A radio announcer was shot dead on his way to work, and a TV reporter was abducted. Some fear a militia campaign against the media.

BAGHDAD — Gunmen killed a radio journalist and kidnapped a television reporter, Iraqi police said Saturday, continuing a spate of attacks that has killed 14 media employees in recent weeks.

Hussam Ahmed, a correspondent for the independent TV station Nahrain, was forced from his car at gunpoint Saturday, police said. The gunmen took him away in another car. There has been no communication from the kidnappers.

Police also reported that another journalist, announcer Raid Qais of Voice of Iraq radio, was shot while driving to work in the Dora neighborhood of south Baghdad on Friday. Qais died instantly, police said.

Three other journalists recently have been kidnapped or killed in roadside attacks, and 11 employees of a television station were killed by gunmen Thursday. A convoy of armed men, some wearing police uniforms, invaded the Al Shaabiya satellite television station and opened fire at executives, technicians and guards. General manager Abdul Raheem Nasrallah was among those killed.

The attacks are raising concern that the groups responsible for Iraq's sectarian bloodletting are turning their attention to the news media.

"They're trying to hide the reality of the crimes they are committing in Iraq by killing the individuals who are transmitting that reality to the whole world," said Ziad Ajili, head of the Journalistic Freedoms Observatory, an Iraqi free-speech watchdog group.

The other journalists killed recently included reporter Azad Mohammed of the Dar al Salam radio station, whose body lay in the morgue Wednesday. Mohammed, 29, was kidnapped Oct. 3 as he left his house in the Shaab neighborhood of northeast Baghdad.

On Thursday, radio announcer Mohammed Abdul Rahman, 55, of Dijla Radio was found dead. He was kidnapped in mid-September in the western Baghdad neighborhood of Mansour, where he had moved after receiving threats.

Ali Kareem, editor of a weekly newspaper, was grabbed from his car Monday on the way to work in east Baghdad, the Voice of Iraq reported. Iraq's journalism syndicate received a $50,000 ransom demand for Kareem's release.

Although most of Iraq's media outlets have some political or tribal affiliation, most of the recent victims worked for organizations that are considered relatively independent.

Ajili said some attacks on journalists might involve political or tribal motives, but "the first thing is because they are journalists."

"I think there is a campaign against journalism," said Saif Qaissi, a reporter for a foreign news agency who was a friend of Qais, the slain announcer. "It has been escalating for four months."

Reporters covering public affairs in Iraq face a high-stakes dilemma, Qaissi said. If they praise the government, anti-government groups are likely to accuse them of being tied to a group in power. If they criticize, they can be accused of trying to destabilize the country.

"They don't realize that the journalist has to write both the failures and the successes," he said.

The Committee to Protect Journalists, based in New York, reported Friday that 85 journalists and 35 media support workers had been killed in Iraq since March 2003, making the war there the deadliest conflict for the media in the last 25 years.

DOJ_NMG_0081461

On Saturday, authorities reported finding 18 bodies in Baghdad and seven more in Duluiya, north of the capital, where 14 other bodies had been found Friday. Some of the victims showed signs of torture.

A bomb killed one person and injured two in east Baghdad.

An attack on an Iraqi army convoy outside the northern city of Kirkuk left one soldier dead and two wounded.

The Associated Press reported that gunmen killed six adults and two young girls in an attack Friday on a Shiite family picking vegetables in fields south of the capital. Interior Ministry officials could not immediately confirm the report.

U.S. officials reported the combat deaths of two American military personnel. A Marine died Saturday of injuries sustained in an enemy attack in Al Anbar province. A soldier died Friday of wounds received when his vehicle hit a roadside bomb in southwest Baghdad.

The Army also reported that a base in southwest Baghdad that was rocked by a spectacular series of explosions set off by a mortar round that hit an ammunition dump Wednesday had been restored to normal operations in 24 hours.

Helping One Girl Face The Future With Hope (LAT)

By Kurt Streeter

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Disfigured by war, a young Iraqi finds medical aid and caring strangers in L.A.

IT WAS shrapnel that brought her to Los Angeles. Hot and sharp, it pierced her legs, her stomach and her right hand. It mangled her face around her deep brown eyes, and it tore off her nose.

"I'm hurt," Marwa cried. "Mommy, I'm hurt in my face. I'm hurt, Mommy. My face."

A missile? Mortar? Whose? It was impossible to know. The Americans were invading Baghdad, and Marwa Naim blamed them. She would never forget the explosion. It had blown up her house, thrown her into the air and flung her on top of her mother. Marwa saw a hole the shrapnel carved into her mother's stomach.

Her mother lay still. Marwa saw blood. "Mommy, Mommy, get up…. "

Then Marwa's vision began to fade. She would recall thinking that she herself was dying. Or that maybe she was already dead. Before she lost consciousness, she heard her aunt screaming for her father.

"Mohammed!" her aunt cried. "Your wife is dead! Your wife is dead!"

Marwa was 9 years old.

She had been pretty, her skin soft and toffee-colored, her eyes, mouth and nose set together in perfect proportion, just like her mother's. It gave her the confidence to make herself known, even in a rough suburb like hers on the southern outskirts of Baghdad, a poor and religiously conservative neighborhood where girls settled into defined roles and rarely ventured out alone.

But now her face! Iraqi doctors removed the shrapnel from her stomach and hand and repaired the scars on her lip and around her eyes. But they could not replace her right thumb. And her nose? There was next to nothing. No nostrils, no tip. Just two holes and a small gutter covered by a zigzagging scar.

She saw her face in a mirror and cried. She was too embarrassed to go out. Everyone stared and gossiped. She stopped going to school. Other children called her "Mrs. No Nose." She hated those taunts, hated them more than anything. "Mrs. No Nose. Mrs. No Nose." She couldn't take it.

Her father got a small aid grant and opened a tiny store, where he sold chips and Pepsis to his battle-weary neighbors. That was how aid groups found out about Marwa. They offered to arrange for her to fly to Los Angeles. The Palestine Children's Relief Fund offered to buy her a ticket and find somewhere for her to stay.

The UCLA Medical Center and its chief of plastic surgery, Dr. Tim Miller, offered to restore her face — for free.

But if Americans had hurt her, could they be trusted to heal her?

She would have to go to the United States for months alone. How would she manage? She knew no English, and her perceptions came from bootlegged Jackie Chan movies and whispers on the street: America was an ugly, scary place, especially for Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0081462

When she returned, would she come back just to be killed in another explosion?

Go, her father said. If she didn't look normal, she would never finish school, and she might never marry. He blamed the Americans too. He would recall seeing their aircraft firing missiles just before the concussion. But her face meant so much.

"You're going to look better," he said. "Your nose will get better. Its beautiful shape will be back."

Fearful arrival

MARWA Naim arrived at Los Angeles International Airport one foggy evening in January. By then, she was 11 but still too young to be alone. She carried all of her belongings in a small bag. She wore a pair of thin brown sandals, cream-colored pants and an old light-blue hijab, the head covering common among Muslim women. It was frayed and had small holes at its edges.

"You must be Marwa," a man said in Arabic. He hugged her and gave her a clutch of red and pink flowers. "Assalamu alaikum, habibi," he said. "May peace be upon you, little girl." He was holding a small photograph of her, taken before her injury. "My name is Mr. Saad. Welcome." He introduced her to his wife, Yabitha, who stood quietly by his side. "We'll be sticking together for a while."

Marwa was afraid. They drove to Saad Alazzawi's home in an old Mercedes. Through the fog, she peered out at a freeway and its maze of speeding cars; at billboards with women in bikinis and men with bare chests; at glowing, red and blue neon signs and thousands of white lights from homes and businesses stretched as far as she could see.

She would remember thinking of home. She wanted to cry.

Saad had emigrated from Iraq in the 1970s. Wiry, with bushy salt-and-pepper brows and piercing eyes, he had spent years running a small Muslim school in South Los Angeles. Then things changed. Now, in the same building, he rented a banquet hall for weddings and quinceañera parties. Still, he was an eager helping hand in the Muslim community.

Though they shared a homeland, Saad and Marwa were different. He was Sunni and she was Shiite. He was strict and she was headstrong. Saad had a program for her: He would teach her to read and write better Arabic, educate her generally and train her in the ways of the Koran. He would try to keep her happy, in spite of all the medical tribulations she faced.

Grueling process begins

THEY began four days later. At UCLA, Dr. Miller smiled at her. She let herself smile back at him — briefly. Then she looked down at the beige carpet.

"Marwa, hi," he said. "How are you doing today?"

She was in an examination room. Miller would let me accompany him as he tried to undo the damage the shrapnel had done. It was devastating to see a child so badly disfigured, but I loved her spine-straight courage. So did Miller. A lean, energetic man in his mid-60s, he had been in South Vietnam. He had been shot at, heard missiles explode, seen children die.

"This is personal," he said. "I have to help."

He brought his face close to Marwa's and studied the jagged contours. Where her nose had been, it seemed as if a small volcano had blown its top. Only the base remained, a clump of flesh. She could breathe normally, but she had holes for nostrils. And there was the zigzag scar.

Still, he thought, she was strikingly pretty. Her eyes were big and expressive, and she had a slight overbite that pushed her lips into a curl when she grinned, making her seem sheepish and vulnerable.

Miller had helped to restore thousands of faces. He knew about the psychology of self-image — how hard it must be for a striking girl to suffer such a deformity.

"She's not in great shape for this," he told me on the phone late one night. "This is going to be extremely difficult. What happens in the first procedure, that's going to set the course for the next operation and how this all will go."

He figured it could take five, maybe six surgeries — half a year, at least. He was concerned that everyone around Marwa might think this would be easy, as if it were some sort of a slam dunk. He said he had called two other surgeons to help him figure out which technique to use.

How do you build a nose from nothing? He compared it to what paratroopers had done in South Vietnam. "Working on her, it's going to be like jumping out of an airplane," he said, "and just hoping the chute opens."

Marwa's first leap came Feb. 10, after a sleepless night.

DOJ_NMG_0081463

She had sat on her bed until dawn in a sparse room at Saad's duplex, looking at photos of her family, everyone except her mother. She had no pictures of her mother.

She would remember hearing wind rattle against the windows — and trembling.

At 6:30 a.m., she was at UCLA, surrounded by doctors and nurses. She eyed them warily, clutching a soft, brown teddy bear.

Miller walked in.

"Oh, my God," she said in English. She had heard people say that when they were frightened.

"I have something for you," Miller said. It was a flower: a tall, thin orchid with tender white petals. He asked an interpreter to translate.

"This is going to go well," he said. "There's nothing to worry about."

"Thank you," she said, again in English. And she smiled.

By 8 a.m. they were in surgery. She was anesthetized. Miller applied orange gel to her face. Then he marked off portions of skin with black ink.

At 8:05, he laid a scalpel into the flesh in the middle of her forehead. Delicately, he cut a U-shaped flap of skin. He left the bottom end of the flap attached between her thick eyebrows. He lifted the top end and examined both sides. It was brown on the outside, bloody and fatty on the inside.

A nurse suctioned the blood.

"Double hook, please," Miller said, calmly. "Moist cloths, please."

Gently, he draped the flap of skin against her cheek. He closed the opening it had left on her forehead.

Then he made a second incision, this time around the ugly black scar in the pit where her nose used to be. He cut out the scar and peeled back the skin on both sides. From my vantage point at Marwa's feet, even I could see that there simply was not enough cartilage left to use as the foundation for a new nose.

Miller directed his fellow doctors to her right ear. Deftly, they cut inside. They took out small, white chunks of cartilage. With this cartilage, Miller and another doctor began to build a new nose. For a moment, they looked like artists. Delicately, they molded the chunks and then sewed the structure together.

Miller stepped back. The cartilage looked like a miniature flagpole, a few centimeters tall. Then he took the flap of skin, its bottom still attached between her eyebrows, and twisted it to turn the brown side out and the bloody side in. Finally, he stretched it down, over the top of the cartilage flagpole.

It was a nose.

But not a very beautiful nose. It looked like a swollen, twisted, bloodied clump.

To keep everything in place, Miller inserted a thin, 3-inch metal rod through the clump. It stuck out on both sides. In Marwa's nostrils, he placed small yellow tubes to keep the passages open. The tubes jutted out from her face.

"This is a hard one," he said, stepping back again. He wasn't sure that her nose would ever look normal. And he worried about the forehead hair growing from it. He knew, though, that he would revisit this nose.

"Time will tell," Miller said. "Time will tell."

Now Marwa lay in recovery. Her eyes opened slightly. Saad stood above her. He held her right hand, stroked her forearm and prayed in Arabic. "In the name of the merciful and compassionate God, say, 'He is God alone, God the eternal…. ' I seek refuge in the Lord of daybreak, in the Lord of men, the king of men, the God of men…. "

She moaned. I wondered how she felt. In Arabic, Saad asked her what was wrong. "She says, 'The pain, it is bad. Very bad.' "

Marwa looked at Saad and muttered softly in Arabic. "What did they do to me? Why did they do this?"

Saad looked up to heaven, then at me. She was more than just a kid he was trying to help. She was a symbol. "We have hurt this little girl," he said. "She didn't deserve this. The children of Iraq, my people, they don't deserve the pain they are taking. Now I have this little one to take care of …. She represents the tragedy of Iraq."

He tightened his lips and shook his head.

Marwa clutched his hand.

He looked at me again. "What would you do?" he asked. He was thinking of her future.

DOJ_NMG_0081464

"Should I intervene, maybe even try to keep her here, so she wouldn't have to return? What should I do, as her guardian? Heal her and then let her go back to that war zone?"

There were no good answers. How moral would it be to heal a child and then send her directly back into the teeth of war? How moral would it be to keep her here, to separate her from her family?

Marwa tried to stifle her moans. Her eyebrows tensed.

She whimpered and opened her mouth slightly. A single tear formed at her right eye.

Slowly, it rolled down her cheek.

A land so new

MARWA turned 12. America was odd and amazing. Everywhere she went her eyes grew wide, sometimes with fear and disdain, sometimes with wonder. When she was not at UCLA, she flew kites, walked on the beach and ate Fosters Freeze treats. At an Islamic Chinese restaurant in Alhambra, Saad introduced her to egg rolls. She didn't like them.

From inside Saad's old Mercedes-Benz, she gaped at everything. "So many cars, so many cars," she would say in Arabic. Saad translated. "It's all so big, so rich, so clean." She said she wanted a sports car, a convertible.

She stared at tight, low-cut jeans, skin-hugging tops and shirts with sleeves above the elbows. She said she wanted some of those clothes too.

But somehow she understood the price, and not just in dollars. Things seemed lock-step in America, she said, even regimented. Saad translated her words. "It is true, they have more freedom here. But in other ways, the people here, all they do is work…. There is no fun, only work. People are like machines here. Is this freedom?"

Still, she envied how easily American children could make their feelings known and how girls could act like boys: be tough, independent, aggressive.

She ran through Saad's banquet hall, kicking a soccer ball. He taught her how to ride his son's rickety black 10-speed bike, and she fell in love with it. She pedaled furiously around his neighborhood, her hijab flapping, the yellow tubes in her nostrils straining with each breath, blood trickling out.

"Please, little girl, slow down!" Saad shouted. What if she fell and did more damage to her face? He took the bike away.

It was futile. The next day, she sneaked it out — and flew off again.

She grew tired of his program: the English, the Koran, the home schooling. She wanted to sleep in, skateboard, ride the bike.

Saad finally sent her to spend a weekend with Theresa Moussa, an Egyptian who had come to America as a girl. She worked for UCLA, helping the medical center with its Arabic-speaking patients. She had been interpreting for Marwa.

A divorcee with a son in college, Theresa was traditional enough to revere her parents and try to please them, but she was also strong and independent. She had flowing, black hair and long legs, and she didn't try to hide them. She wore makeup and high heels, form-fitting skirts and blouses that showed her arms.

At Theresa's house, Marwa walked with a bounce. They laughed and shared secrets. Marwa could watch all the TV she wanted and help herself to anything in the refrigerator. She and Theresa went to a beauty shop together and had their nails done in pink.

Marwa asked Theresa if she believed in God.

Yes, Theresa said.

Marwa noticed her crucifixes and her painting of the Virgin Mary. She must be from a different strain of Islam, Marwa thought. "So, you are Sunni, right?" she asked.

"No, I am Christian," Theresa said. "Coptic Christian."

One night, the two of them sat on Theresa's black leather coach and watched a movie. Marwa draped her arms around Theresa and buried her head in Theresa's chest. They both fell asleep.

Near midnight, Theresa woke. She gently awakened Marwa.

Groggily, Marwa looked into Theresa's eyes. "Mommy…. "

On March 6, Miller operated again.

DOJ_NMG_0081465

The flap of skin, twisting down between her eyes, seemed like a snout. In a restaurant one day, a boy had looked at her and fled back to his friends. "Elephant girl!"

Now Miller raised the flap. Underneath was the transplanted cartilage. With needles, scissors, forceps and thread, he chipped at the cartilage and molded it. Like a sculptor, he thinned it here, then thinned it there.

Slowly, he created a tip.

On April 10, he operated a third time. Using scissors and scalpels, he refashioned the flap of skin around the top of what was starting to look like a real nose.

There came a moment of truth.

He lifted the flap and snipped it from its moorings.

In a miraculous way, the flap would find new roots and new ways for blood to flow and keep it alive.

And there it was: Her face was beginning to look as it once had.

After each operation, Marwa moaned. "No, no," she cried. "Get away, get away."

"But little girl, you need water," Saad said.

"They did more than what you told me!" she cried out after one surgery. "There is a lot of pain! I want my father! I need to be with my father! Ohhhh! Why? Why? Why? Why is this happening to me, Allah? Where is my mother? Why did she have to die? Why?

Saad could do nothing. He stroked her arm. "It's OK, baby. It'll be all right, little girl."

"Mr. Saad, why is Allah punishing me? Why did Allah take my mother? I want to be with her. I don't want to live anymore. I wish I had died. I wish the Americans had just killed me."

The anesthetic worked like a truth serum, Saad thought, letting her spill out her true feelings. He stiffened when he heard them.

Marwa wanted to see her face.

A hand mirror lay on a table. Saad hesitated. Then he gave it to her.

Marwa stared. Despite improvements, her nose was still a puffy, reddened clump, oozing blood. Two yellow tubes still protruded from its nostrils.

"This is a nose?" she cried out. "Why didn't God let me die?"

Concerns and clashes

BETWEEN surgeries, Saad spoke to Marwa's father and learned that he was patrolling the roof of his flat every night in fear that someone would hurt his family.

How could Saad, in good conscience, send Marwa home?

On the other hand, so long as she was in America, how could he shield her from temptations? Especially the temptation of the bicycle?

"Baby, baby, please, no," he pleaded with her. "Please, off the bike before you fall and hurt yourself."

She rode it anyway, in circles, just out of reach. She mimicked him, speaking in English. "Baby, baby, please. Baby, baby…. " Then she would switch to Arabic. "I know what you can do and what you cannot do. You are not my father. And I am a child. Here I have rights."

One day, without warning, the front wheel of the bicycle twisted on a patch of oil. The bike slid out from under her, and she plunged to the ground. With her thumbless hand, she broke her fall, but the yellow tubes jarred loose and spilled to the pavement.

Saad ran to her.

She dusted herself off, picked up the tubes and looked at her hand. Blood trickled from a gash. The tubes would have to be cleaned and reinserted. Her face trembled, as if she wanted to cry, but she held it in. She couldn't afford to show her tears, not now.

"That's it," Saad said. "I take the air out of the tires. No more biking."

Marwa brushed past him and walked away muttering. Saad translated. She was saying: "I don't want to stay here anymore."

Saad was growing weary and frustrated. He needed a break. He began letting her spend more weekends with other families in the network of Iraqi Americans around Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0081466

Sometimes she stayed with the family of Karim and Lily Karam in Palos Verdes Estates. The Karams took her to ride horses and let her try on lipstick. She watched an old Egyptian movie about a belly dancer named ZuZu, who fell into the arms of a blond leading man. "Hi, handsome," Marwa said, in English. "So handsome."

She borrowed the movie and took it back to Saad's, but he wouldn't let her watch it.

"Movies like this, they are totally undermining me," Saad said, burying his head in his hands. "And undermining society. It's taking liberalism into the extreme. As far as the clothes, anything goes. Freedom, freedom. We are free to do whatever we want. I can't have her watching this trash. Not in my house."

One Saturday, Theresa and her fiance took Marwa to Universal Studios. I went along. At Waterworld, a lavish production based on the movie, men in green uniforms strutted in front of us with rifles and grenades. They fired at each other. Water splashed. Explosions thundered. The men screamed.

Marwa held desperately to Theresa's arm. "Theresa, Theresa, is it real? What is happening?"

It was fake, Theresa said.

Marwa didn't believe it. She ducked and tucked her head against Theresa's shoulder. She opened her mouth and closed her eyes.

Pop-pop-pop…. Boom!

Men fell into the water.

One blast shook the ground. It must have sounded like the explosion in Iraq that changed her life. Could she take it?

Finally, she looked up. She saw that Theresa was smiling and laughing. Everyone was applauding.

By the end of the show, Marwa was applauding too.

The day was darkened by thoughts of my father. He had fallen gravely ill with heart disease, and I was worried. Marwa could tell. "He could die," I told her — really die, not like the men in Waterworld.

She said she would pray for him.

On another Saturday, she practiced putting makeup on Theresa, who woke to find her eyes caked with black liner and thick blue shadow, her lips painted bright red, her cheeks plastered with rouge. When Theresa drove her home to Saad's house, Marwa said: "I don't know why I love you, but I do."

Marwa looked at her nose in the rearview mirror. It did, indeed, seem like a nose. "I like the way I look now," she said. "You are so good to me, so nice. Do you love me too?"

"Yes, of course I do," Theresa would remember saying. "You are special to me. You are like the daughter I never had."

"I like that," Marwa said. She clutched Theresa's arm. "That makes me happy."

On May 10, Marwa had her fourth operation. By now, doctors were making progress with the hair that had been growing in little clumps on her nose. They used a laser to kill the follicles. Still, there was more to be done.

Before her anesthetic, Miller walked into her room, smiling. Her nose had a few lumps. A thin scar stretched from her eyebrow to her hairline. But he thought he could diminish those things. And he had a surprise.

"This," he said, "is probably going to be our last time."

"OK," she shot back in English. "Be careful."

He laughed. She knew so much English now. Gone was the shy, scared girl he had met back in February. Earlier in the week, she had come to his office. She wore a new ensemble: a fashionable pair of white jeans, a pink top and a pink hijab.

She clasped his hand and held it tight for a full minute.

He teased her.

She giggled, then looked him in the eye and winked.

During the surgery, Miller opened her nose with a scalpel. He trimmed and shaped the cartilage at its tip, then cut bits of bone that had formed a little hump at the ridge and flattened it slightly.

He narrowed the scar on her forehead. It took two hours. Then Miller lifted the skin around her nose and examined it. He announced that he was going to sew the skin together. When he finished, he stepped back to see how she looked.

He turned to me and clenched his fist. "You know what?" he said. "We're done. It's just going to be a few more stitches, and then we're done. This is all I can do for her."

DOJ_NMG_0081467

When Marwa healed, she would have a fine nose.

He would check her in a year, if he could, and make any necessary adjustments. Otherwise, her surgeries were over.

Time for farewells

AFTER the operation, Marwa spoke to Saad so rudely that he sent her to her room — more than once. She hugged her teddy bear, clutched a photograph of her father and wept.

Finally, Saad asked Salam and Sahar Ali, an Iraqi American couple in Mission Viejo, to keep her while she healed and until she could go home.

"I should not have brought her to stay with me," Saad told me one afternoon. "I would not do this again. She has brought it all to my face: the war, the suffering. I was trying to deal with the guilt I have for not being in Iraq, for not helping enough. But with her behavior and her pain, I have seen in front of me the tragedy of Iraq."

Tears pooled in his eyes.

The Alis took Marwa to a mosque, where she heard an imam speak about honoring mothers. She knelt and cried. "In heaven," she asked, "will I see my mother?"

Worried about her sadness, the Alis let her watch satellite TV. They took her to Disneyland, to Chuck E. Cheese's, to Starbucks and to an outdoor mall in Irvine, where she rode a carousel for the first time and spent an hour at a computer store.

She went to Al Ridah, an Islamic school, where Marwa helped students with their Arabic.

Now it was only a matter of weeks. On the phone, I spoke with her father in Iraq. Gunfire and explosions were a constant part of life. He had seen a man being kidnapped. An American tank patrolling his street had rolled over his car and destroyed it.

"I am very scared of what it is going to be like when she comes back," he said. He knew that Marwa had grown accustomed to America and liked it. He wondered if she could handle the hardship in Iraq, even if she had a nose. "I am afraid."

But he needed her. She had to help take care of the house and her older brother and two younger sisters — even if it meant that she could not go back to school. He needed her to wake the other children, make them breakfast, clean the house….

Marwa went to a department store one evening with Sahar. She jumped on the back of a shopping cart and pushed off, racing down the aisles. Sahar chased her. "Don't do that! Marwa, please."

"But Auntie," Marwa shouted. "Here I am free! Free, Auntie, free!"

Finally, the day came.

Marwa's nose was healing. It looked much like a normal nose, slightly upturned and gracefully proportioned. It had a small lump at the bridge, and its skin was a touch darker than her cheeks. A thin scar traced a straight line from between her eyebrows up to her scalp.

She had spent the night at the Karams' in Palos Verdes Estates so she could be nearer LAX. Now it was morning, and she was watching a video of Cinderella, who was defying all expectations and transforming into a princess.

"Time is up, Cinderella," Lily Karam said. "We are going to miss the plane if you keep watching."

Marwa wouldn't budge. "No, no, I don't want to go. I'll go tomorrow, OK?"

I had planned to fly with her as far as Amman, Jordan, where her father was to pick her up and take her home. But now I could not go. My father's heart had grown weaker, and he had died just days before.

In Lily's car, rushing to make up time, I told Marwa how her courage with far greater hardships had helped me while I sat at my father's side.

On several occasions before, she had let me know exactly how tired she had grown of my notebook and questions. But now she paused.

"Thank you, Kurt," she said in English as she sat in a car that drove through thick traffic on Pacific Coast Highway. "This nice. Thank you."

She grew quiet. She rolled down the window and stared out. Her lips quivered. She turned to Lily and said that she knew she had to go home but that she wasn't sure if going home would be good for her.

It helped that at LAX she was surrounded by many of the people who had helped her. Saad was there, along with officials from the relief fund that had paid for her trip. One of them wondered aloud: "How does a 12-year-old girl injured in the war adapt to a foreign country like this one — and then go back to war?"

DOJ_NMG_0081468

Marwa stood tall. She wore a chiffon top, high-heeled shoes and wraparound sunglasses. She carried a fancy handbag. Covering her hair was a new, cream-colored hijab, embroidered with tiny sparkles.

Her luggage was filled with new clothes, stuffed animals, jewelry, wristwatches, purses, a SpongeBob, Play-Doh, journals, a picture frame trimmed in pink fuzz — and photos of Saad, Miller, Theresa.

She reached up and hugged Theresa.

"I don't want…. "

Theresa cut her off. "Listen, you have to go. I want you to look back and remember your time here — and remember me. But you have to go. You go — and make something of yourself."

"But …. "

"Don't worry, no matter how far we are, we will always be friends."

Gently, Theresa placed into Marwa's small hand a letter.

"But I will miss you…."

"I will miss you too…."

A bittersweet journey

MY COLLEAGUES, photographer Anne Cusack and reporter Ashraf Khalil, accompanied Marwa on the plane. Marwa took out a photo of Theresa and kissed it, again and again. She read Theresa's letter. It said Theresa would never forget her.

Anne could see Marwa was sobbing.

At the baggage claim area in Amman, she spotted a man who looked like her. His back was turned, but she knew instantly that it was her father. She wrapped her arms around his legs, and he swept her up into his arms.

During two days in Amman, Marwa got a glimpse of her future. Mohammed Naim expected his daughter to address people formally, with honorifics: uncle, auntie or mister. But she called Ashraf by his first name. Her father upbraided her.

She pouted.

"She's getting stubborn," he said.

"No, I'm not," she said. "I'm not stubborn!"

"That's something that has to change," he said. Such disrespect could lead to danger at home. "We have to bring her back to our way."

He tried to prepare her for her neighborhood: His shop was faring poorly. Few people had enough money for Pepsis and chips. "Our neighbors? They were kidnapped, last month."

Everyone knew she had been in America, and people who had gotten help from Americans were not well thought of. "We come home every night and lock ourselves in."

She looked at him wearily. "Let's change the subject."

At 7 a.m. July 3, Marwa Naim and her father climbed aboard a propeller-driven, 13-seat Fokker to fly back to Baghdad. She wore designer jeans, high heels, a white blouse and a denim jacket, cut short above her waist.

She walked up a staircase to the door of the plane. She turned, gave a tiny wave and was gone.

A changed life

WHEN they reached Iraq, Marwa told me by phone, she learned that her father had remarried. His new wife was Faiza — one of her distant cousins. Faiza, her father said, was pregnant.

Her neighbors could not believe how her face had changed. No one called her "Mrs. No Nose" anymore. She said that she was happy to be home but that she was rarely allowed to go outside, because of the violence.

In America, she could ride a bike, swim, see Theresa. "I want to go back," she said. "I want so go back as soon as I can."

About this story

Writer Kurt Streeter and photographer Anne Cusack spent four months with Marwa Naim, her doctors and those who welcomed Marwa into their homes. Streeter interviewed them extensively. He and Cusack were present during each of her surgeries and many of her experiences of daily life in America. Conversations in Arabic were translated by her caretakers.

DOJ_NMG_0081469

Cusack and writer Ashraf Khalil accompanied Marwa back to the Middle East. The account of the bombing that injured her is drawn from interviews with Marwa, her father and Marine Col. Christopher Conlin, who led American troops through her neighborhood on their way into Baghdad.

Billboards, Posters Offer Baghdad Hope (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi

AP, October 15, 2006

Thousands of posters and billboards dot Baghdad with messages of hope for a city of gloom, where residents largely stay home, afraid of the streets, their pain and grief deepening every day amid unending violence.

"No matter how strong the storm, it will go away in the end," declares the message on one poster, with a picture of a worried young woman clasping a boy to her body, her hand protectively placed over his head, her hair fluttering in the wind.

Hundreds of copies of the poster — and at least one giant one on a billboard — can be seen throughout the city, pasted on concrete blast walls and outside buildings.

Even with the attempt to instill hope, the messages, sponsored by the government, are an unusually blunt acknowledgment of just how grave conditions have become.

"You have the power to pull Iraq out of this darkness," declares another billboard overlooking a square. The words are inscribed next to a burning map of Iraq painted in the red, black and white colors of the country's national flag.

The images are in stark contrast to the blitz of upbeat street ads that filled the Iraqi capital in the two years after Saddam Hussein's ouster in 2003. Those showed optimistic Iraqis casting ballots or engaged in rebuilding. They prescribed democracy as the key to a better life and free elections and a new constitution as the tonic for the ills of society.

During two general elections last year, there was hardly a wall in Baghdad not plastered with candidates' campaign posters.

U.S. and Iraqi authorities have long used billboards and posters to get their message out to a public confused by the rapid change that followed Saddam's overthrow. As far back as early 2004, authorities used posters and billboards to rally support for the country's nascent security forces in the midst of a growing Sunni insurgency. The U.S. military at times put up posters with congratulatory messages to Iraqis on religious occasions, trying to counter its image as a foreign occupier.

The use of images is a particularly important part of Iraq's public life.

Portraits of key religious figures, including some who died centuries ago, hang in homes and streets by Iraq's Shiite majority to display their religious identity and their post-Saddam political empowerment.

But the new crop of billboards and posters in Baghdad reflect the dark mood resulting from a marked worsening of conditions in the Tigris River metropolis, where contemporary reality has made a cruel joke of its former boast of being "the city of peace."

Iraqis had adjusted to suicide bombings and other attacks by Sunni insurgents. But for the past six months they've faced a new brand of violence, sectarian killings blamed on Shiite death squads and reprisal slayings by Sunni militants. The violence, in which neighbor is turned against neighbor, is deadly and deeply demoralizing.

"Two years ago, I thought it could not get any worse than this," said barber Qais al-Sharaa. "But it has every day since." In view of his shop was a giant billboard reading "Terrorism has no religion," with the word "terrorism" in red and dripping what looks like blood drops.

The sectarian violence has centered on Baghdad, and security operations by U.S. and Iraqi forces have brought little relief.

The city witnessed an average of 36 attacks a day in the past three weeks, an increase of nearly 30 percent over the preceding seven weeks and 60 percent higher than from mid-March to mid-June, according to U.S. military figures.

DOJ_NMG_0081470

The sight of what in any other world capital would pass for a nightmare has become the daytime reality of Baghdadis. On any given day, citizens step from their homes to see police trucks loaded with dead, blood-drenched corpses, the beheaded bodies of men snatched from their homes or workplace by gunmen in police uniforms, body parts strewn across a street or dangling from a roof in the wake of a bombing.

Many residents, therefore, are holed up, going out only when necessary. Traffic has thinned, and the once congested streets and sidewalks are nearly vacant by late afternoon, hours before a sunset curfew that has been in place for months.

Baghdad has an unemployment rate of a staggering 30 percent. Power outages are routine and last up to three days at a time. The price of gasoline has risen by as much as 12-fold since Saddam's ouster and fuel is often scarce.

A sign on Mansour street in central Baghdad — once a thriving commercial district that now is frequently hit by bomb blasts — speaks to two of the city's worst problems, security and uncollected garbage.

"Uncollected garbage attracts explosive devices as well as rats," the sign warns. Insurgents often conceal roadside bombs in garbage. Like much of the capital, Mansour street is now defined by ubiquitous concrete blast barriers, security checkpoints and barbed wire that has snagged windblown plastic bags.

The owners of one of Baghdad's best known pastry shops, also on Mansour street, have given up on replacing the glass on the store's front windows after several blasts shattered it. Al-Khaski's now has concrete wall instead.

"The sight of Baghdad streets remind me of the tragedy in which we live," said Ibrahim Haidar, a 41-year-old father of two who lives in the volatile New Baghdad district. "It makes me feel I could die any second."

Yet, against all odds, the street ads try to offer some hope to a city teetering above an abyss of failed statehood and civil war.

The billboard shows the dark silhouettes of arms stretched skyward as if from a grave in front of a melancholy, dusky sky. The message: "The will of honorable people will enable Iraq to rise."

Tense Baghdad Residents Find Oasis In 'Dr. Phil' (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Seeing bedroom and workplace foibles solved on TV offers comfort to people confronted daily by mortar rounds and death squads.

BAGHDAD — The young men at the checkpoint couldn't have been older than his own lanky teenagers. Wielding Kalashnikovs, they brusquely ordered the gentlemanly, 50-year-old Shamil Hashem Suhaili and his 16-year-old son, Ahmad, out of their car. They demanded identification. They questioned him harshly.

Where are you going? Where are you coming from?

It was degrading, to be sure, for a man of his age and accomplishments. But the hydro-engineer could do little but submit.

"I answered them politely," he says. "If you make a mistake they could do anything to you. If they want, maybe they will get your mobile phone, your money, maybe they take my son. They are the judge. They do whatever they want."

Frightened and angry, Suhaili headed home with his son for lunch with their family. Afterward, Suhaili powered up his generator and wound down his nerves with one of the few things that give him comfort: "Dr. Phil."

In a world of armed gangs, random shootings, blackouts and trash heaps, salves are where you find them.

For Suhaili, they're a family lunch, a bit of gardening, and the balding American talk-show host from Texas, whose weekday television program airs with Arabic subtitles on a popular Lebanese-based satellite channel.

Syndicated and subtitled versions of "Dr. Phil" and "The Oprah Winfrey Show" are growing popular throughout the Middle East. For Iraqis, they offer a window to a world in which people are more concerned with bedroom and workplace foibles than mortar rounds and death squads.

From the moment Suhaili clambers out of bed, his travails are beyond the scope of a "Dr. Phil" episode. He struggles through the dark and muggy heat, hoping there's enough water for a shower, enough light to button his shirt by. "You can't even comb your hair," he says. "You can't select the proper clothes and shirt for your pants."

His work at Iraq's Ministry of Water Resources sometimes seems the perfect metaphor for his life: spending the day plugging the cracks in Iraq's dams.

DOJ_NMG_0081471

After climbing into his beat-up Volkswagen, Suhaili girds himself for the hourlong ride past multiple checkpoints. If he's short on gas it means a dangerous wait at the fuel station, or paying steep black-market prices for fuel from a jerrycan.

"Sometimes these people are cheating," he says. "They mix it with water or diesel. It ruins your car."

Suhaili, a Sunni Arab, is a stocky man whose reddish brown hair and mustache show wisps of white. His smoky-brown eyes glisten as he recounts his family's near-brushes with disaster: A car bomb explosion near his home shattered every window and door frame. A mortar round struck his son Abdullah's school. Uniformed gunmen abducted a dozen young Sunni Arab men from his neighborhood — people who had played with his sons — before torturing and killing them.

But much of the frustration is more mundane: Hours of work are lost on his computer because the power goes out at the ministry. A checkpoint delay holds him up for an hour. Teachers demand bribes in excess of $100 to help his two sons, Abdullah, 19, and Ahmad, advance in school. Fear of suicide bombings at a crowded no-frills market forces him to shop at a pricier one.

There are the half-melted spent bullets he finds on his roof, a warning that even minding your own business and staying at home may not protect you from the random gunfire that rains down on Baghdad.

And all day long he worries about the unspeakable. His daughter, Yasmine, a quiet but alert 22-year-old, travels along dangerous roads to medical school. His sons navigate the halls of a school riven by sectarian tensions. His wife, Hadel Hazem, insists on driving herself — sometimes alone — around the city. He thinks of them with every television and radio report of corpses, kidnappings and bombings.

"When my child is late coming home from school for just five minutes, 100 thoughts go through my mind," says Hazem, a retired electrical engineer who runs a small nonprofit organization for widows.

After work, school and errands, when all five family members gather for a midafternoon lunch, they share stories of terrible fates that have befallen others.

Abdullah and Ahmad discuss a new project they're working on: setting up a computer network among the neighborhood boys so they can compete at video games without leaving their homes.

But sometimes the anxiety explodes. An argument breaks out.

"We can't storm out of the house," Abdullah says. "We can only raise our voices." There are tears. But there are also hugs and apologies, quiet moments of reflection.

And Saturday to Wednesday, from 7 p.m. to 8 p.m., there is Dr. Phil C. McGraw, the author who exhorts viewers to "stop talking and do something."

One episode the family remembers fondly: A naughty daughter constantly fights with her mother, who tends to be harsh. The mother has no idea how to calm her daughter down, so she just keeps yelling at her.

Dr. Phil demonstrates to the mother that her daughter is merely emulating her own bad behavior. Both mother and daughter come to a realization. They calm down, and they begin to be nicer to each other.

"I feel that he has really great power to understand people's problems and how to solve them," Suhaili says.

He hopes "Dr. Phil" can serve as a substitute social world for his children, who aren't able to spend time with friends, date, or even leave their home after dusk. "I want to show them these are the ordinary problems people deal with," he says.

During rare idle moments, Suhaili composes imaginary letters to his favorite television host.

"Dear Dr. Phil," he begins. "How can I live this difficult life? I forgot what normal life is like. Sometimes I work in the garden to keep my mind off my troubles. I feel more comfortable working in a green place. But some days even the garden doesn't help when you hear that old friends have been murdered and people have fled the country."

Suhaili doubts Dr. Phil can help him or Iraq. Maybe he'd suggest a vacation or a hobby. "If you compare our problems now with the problems he is talking about, it is very big difference," he says, with a chuckle.

"He's addressing psychological problems, how to deal with people," he says. "Here you are dealing with big problems. You are dealing with insurgents and terrorists.

"How would Dr. Phil disarm a militia?"

Lawyers Seek To Free U.S. Citizen Held In Iraq (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 14 — An American citizen who was tried in an Iraqi court on charges that he had assisted in the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists last year has been sentenced to death, along with five Iraqi co-defendants, a spokesman for the United States Embassy in Baghdad said Saturday.

The spokesman, Lou Fintor, did not identify the American by name, but according to officials in Baghdad and his own legal team, he is Mohammed Munaf, 53.

Lawyers for Mr. Munaf filed papers in federal court in Washington on Friday to try to prevent his transfer to the Iraqi government, arguing that his death sentence undermined one of the United States government's principal arguments for transferring him, namely that he would be in no danger of physical abuse in Iraqi custody.

Mr. Munaf, an Iraqi native who became a citizen of the United States in 2000, traveled to Iraq in March 2005 to act as translator and guide for three Romanian journalists. The journalists were kidnapped by Iraqis and held for 55 days, as was Mr. Munaf.

The Romanians were freed by American forces on May 23, 2005, but Mr. Munaf was held on suspicion of having been an accomplice in the kidnapping.

According to the government, Mr. Munaf confessed to concocting the plot with friends and relatives and only acted as if he were a victim.

But Jonathan Hafetz, a lawyer with the Brennan Center for Justice at the New York University School of Law, said Mr. Munaf's confession was made under torture.

Mr. Munaf is being held by the American military at Camp Cropper near the Baghdad International Airport.

Because Mr. Munaf is a United States citizen, Mr. Hafetz and his other lawyers have asked Judge Royce C. Lamberth of the United States District Court here to order the military to maintain custody and not give him to the Iraqi criminal court.

In papers filed with the court, Mr. Hafetz said that United States military officials had intervened with the Iraqi judge and insisted that Mr. Munaf be convicted and sentenced to death. Earlier, the Justice Department said that Judge Lamberth should not intervene in the case for several reasons. The department said that Mr. Munaf's claims that he could face torture and physical harm if transferred to Iraqi custody were only speculative and based on news reports of abuse in the government's prison system.

The Justice Department also argued that Mr. Munaf was not actually in United States custody but was being held by a multinational force that was helping the Iraqi government in detention operations.

A judge in another case rejected an argument by the department that an American was being held by a multinational force.

In a similar case involving another American citizen held by the multinational force, a different federal judge rejected the department's argument that the prisoner was not being held by the United States military as a legalistic fiction.

In that case, involving a native of Jordan, the judge issued a restraining order to stop the United States military from transferring the man to Iraqi custody. That case is on appeal, and Mr. Munaf's lawyers have asked Judge Lamberth to await a ruling from the appeals court.

Peacekeeper Commander Mired In Afghan Combat (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 14 — Leaning against the red webbing that passes for upholstery in a military aircraft, Lt. Gen. David Richards, the British commander of NATO troops in Afghanistan, scanned a press clip as he flew back to the capital from Kandahar, the center of combat operations in the south.

The article was by a well-known British columnist who had written in The Guardian that he was "baffled by Richards's naïveté about the Taliban." The author, Simon Jenkins, contended that NATO could not possibly win against an enemy that could "count on the tacit support of tens of thousands of fighters from tribal militias."

DOJ_NMG_0081473

"I am not naïve; he's naïve," General Richards shouted over the roar of the plane engines. He dismissed as "nonsense" the idea that the surge by the Taliban across southern Afghanistan this year was driven by ideology or Pashtun tribal grievances.

"This is not a huge popular uprising," he added, bristling. "And to distort the truth is so unjust for the people here who want us. And it is unhelpful since it undermines the fabric of what we are doing."

"People do not want a return to the Taliban," he said, "but we need time to allow that aspiration to win."

Already half through his one-year command in Afghanistan, General Richards, 54, does not have much time.

He now commands the 31,000 troops of the International Security Assistance Force, including 12,000 American troops, spread across the whole country.

The British general, who has led NATO's most elite fighting force, the Allied Rapid Reaction Corps, since 2001, served three tours in Northern Ireland, and was commander of British peacekeeping forces three times — in East Timor in 1999 and twice in Sierra Leone in 2000.

When he arrived in Afghanistan in February, he talked like a peacekeeper, too, emphasizing the need to improve security so reconstruction and development projects could take root, to extend the government's reach, and to win hearts and minds.

He vowed to do things differently than the Americans. He said that NATO soldiers would treat detainees in a transparent way, respect Islam and Afghan culture, and raid houses only if necessary.

But the general was quickly forced to put many of those plans aside and engage in hard fighting, not least to show the insurgents, and the wavering local population, that his troops were a force to be reckoned with.

Even before he took command of the turbulent south, Taliban insurgents were swarming in numbers not seen since 2001. General Richards estimates that his troops now face 4,000 to 5,000 Taliban fighters.

The summer months were consumed by heavy fighting. The general's forces came under repeated attacks, both on patrol and at their bases, forcing NATO to call in air and artillery strikes that inevitably killed scores of the very civilians he was trying to win over. It was not exactly the hearts-and-minds strategy he had planned. Still, the general insists his forces were fully ready: they had spent nine months preparing for the mission, because the NATO deployment was delayed by several months.

"We knew there was a lot of opposition," he said, this time in an interview in his headquarters in Kabul, set between the United States Embassy and the presidential palace. "We had been watching it, and the Americans were very forthcoming with their intelligence."

"There were doubts about NATO and our ability to conduct demanding security operations," he said. "There are no questions about our ability now."

The fighting was regrettable, but necessary, he added. "We've killed, sadly — because in many respects some of them are just unemployed young Afghan men who need employment and are paid cynically by the Taliban to do their dirty stuff for them.

"But we have killed many hundreds of Taliban in the last month, chiefly in Kandahar and Helmand, and it has put paid to any doubt in anyone's mind that NATO can do what we were sent here to do."

Recently, there have, indeed, been some successes. Not least, his forces regained control of Panjwai, a district just 15 miles west of Kandahar, the main southern city, where the Taliban had gathered in large numbers. The victory was vital for its strategic and psychological impact, the general said.

"The Taliban were very cocky about Panjwai," he said on his visit to Kandahar during the operation. "They think they can face us down. We will prove to them that they are defeatable. It's very important for people to see that happening, and the rather worried atmospherics will change overnight."

The general says that about 10 percent of the population in the south may support the Taliban, that 20 percent are opposed to them, and that the rest are stuck in the middle.

"They are straightforward, simple folk who above all want security for their family, and they will go with whichever side can convince them they are going to win," he said. "And that 70 percent must not be allowed to slip into the hands of the Taliban this autumn."

That will mean rolling out tangible benefits — in the form of assistance — as soon as security allows, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0081474

"It's a very important psychological, physical, military and wider campaign that we are conducting, and I think this autumn is a critical period," he said. "And that's my main focus at the moment, getting those visible improvements, in security, governance and reconstruction and development to start happening in the south so that we can persuade that 70 percent that we will win."

Yet in his time in Afghanistan, General Richards has seen up close just how weak and ill equipped the Afghan government is to handle a crisis, like the riots that broke out in Kabul after an American military truck plowed into civilian cars, killing at least four people, in May.

He also found a startling lack of coordination among the government, the military and foreign donors, which he described as "anarchy" in his first weeks on the job.

He set to work to help President Hamid Karzai form a kind of privy council to convene crucial ministers and security officials, as well as United States and NATO commanders and ambassadors of leading donor countries, the United Nations and European Union. Called the Policy Action Group, it meets weekly and is designed to bring badly needed coordination to security and aid efforts.

"It's a pretty powerful structure," said one NATO official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity and who credited General Richards with the idea. "This is his war cabinet; this is the bit he never had."

There is still a long way to go. He talks of the need to combat corruption, replace bad government officials and persuade international donors to drop their lengthy procedures and tendering rules to help reconstruction aid flow.

"I am not giving the rosy picture," he said on the military flight. "I'll be honest. There's a lot to do."

2 NATO Soldiers Are Killed In Afghanistan (NYT)

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 14 — NATO reported that two of its soldiers died in combat in Kandahar Province on Saturday, and a bomb struck a provincial governor's convoy east of Kabul, the capital, narrowly missing him, Afghan officials said.

One provincial official was killed in the ensuing gun battle with militants.

A news agency reported that Taliban rebels had claimed responsibility for the attack, aimed at Gov. Gulab Mangal of Laghman Province. It was the latest of a string of such attacks against the country's civilian administrators in recent weeks.

Separately, six men working for American forces on Afghanistan's eastern border were killed Friday by a roadside bomb on their return from delivering aid to a village.

On Saturday, NATO forces and the Afghan police killed one man and arrested nine others suspected of involvement in recent bomb attacks southeast of Kabul, a NATO press release said.

Friendly Fire And Fraud (BOS)

The Boston Globe, October 15, 2006

OF THE thousands of deaths, military and civilian, in the Afghanistan and Iraq wars, none so captures the mix of patriotism, impulsiveness, and dishonesty in the US mission as the shooting death of Pat Tillman by members of his own platoon.

Tillman was the Arizona Cardinals' safety who gave up his football career to join the Army and died in a firefight in Afghanistan in 2004. Although the Army knew the facts of his death almost immediately, it did not reveal them to his parents or the public until almost a month after a televised memorial service for the soldier. His superiors at first exaggerated his role in the clash and never mentioned friendly fire. Since then, contradictory investigations have left his parents still uncertain about what happened.

Recently, California congressman Mike Honda asked the Defense Department's inspector general to speed up his criminal investigation into the killing and a possible cover up by the military. If the inspector general does not release his report or if it still leaves open questions, Congress should conduct its own inquiry into the events of April 22, 2004 -- and into the failure of military personnel of all ranks to insist on facts and accountability in a timely way.

Tillman's life and death have come undera new spotlight as a result of a revealing 12,749-word article by Gary Smith in Sports Illustrated. Accounts by Smith of Tillman's self-testing, daredevil adventures beforethe military help to explain why, after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, he gave up his $3.6 million football contract to enlist as a raw recruit.

But another side of Tillman also emerges: that of a voracious reader with a questioning and independent spirit. In 2003 in Iraq, Tillman's first overseas assignment, he told a fellow soldier that he thought the war was ``[expletive] illegal." According to Smith, Tillman was looking forward after his discharge to having a friend arrange a meeting with Noam Chomsky, the MIT professor and critic of US foreign policy. His father and mother have demonstrated the same searching intelligence as their son in seeking information from the military.

Friendly fire happens all too often, sadly, in the fog and noise of war. But the military will not draw lessons from deaths like that of Tillman and an allied Afghan soldier who was also killed by his platoon that April day if it does not demand unflinching accuracy in reports from those involved. The botched investigations of this high-profile incident also hurt the credibility of the military's inquiries into the killings of civilians in Iraq and Afghanistan. If the inspector general does not provide a persuasive and public accounting of what occurred, Congress should do the job itself.

A Conversation With John Kerry (WP)

Interview By Bob Woodward

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

In the months before the 2004 presidential election, The Washington Post's Bob Woodward sought to interview Sen. John F. Kerry, the Democratic nominee, about how he might have conducted foreign policy in the 18 months between Sept. 11, 2001, and the invasion of Iraq in March 2003. For his book "Plan of Attack," Woodward had interviewed President Bush on how and why he made decisions during that same period. Woodward gave the Kerry campaign a list of 22 questions based on Bush's actions, asking how Kerry would have responded at each key decision point if he had been president. Kerry declined the interview at the time. More than a year later, on March 7, Kerry agreed to be interviewed by Woodward and answer the 22 questions. Below is an edited version of their two-hour conversation .

ON PLANNING FOR WAR

John Kerry: Let me start at the beginning, because if I were president and we had been attacked as we were attacked on 9/11, I would have, first of all, created a kind of war cabinet similar to what other presidents have done historically, going back to Roosevelt and others. . . .

Now, you may have an executive committee within that . . . like President Kennedy did. But your war cabinet itself needs to be especially plugged in . . . so the right questions are on the table and the right questions are asked and the right discussion takes place. I mean, if you go back and look at Eisenhower, Eisenhower is smart in that he played less than fully briefed, so to speak, and he would let the staff fight it out in front of him and not let on what he believed or where he wanted to go. I think it's particularly important presidentially not to indicate your policy right up front unless there's such a clarity to it. For instance, in response to 9/11, there's clarity. We've got to go kill al-Qaeda. . . . In fact, I would have thought about starting that war differently.

Bob Woodward: In what way?

I believe that during that particular period of time you knew that they [the Taliban and al-Qaeda] had bad habits. They didn't believe that we would necessarily invade. . . . That is an enormous advantage with which to begin any planning. So they are running around in caravans, which we can see from technical means. They're talking on cellphones, which we can follow with technical means. It gave us time to put assets on the ground.

There are all kinds of things that we could have done with respect to pinpointing their whereabouts.

This is after 9/11?

Absolutely. And my instincts would have been much more inclined to have used feint as subterfuge to indicate you might be doing one thing when you're really doing another. . . . I would have been inclined to have used a greater covert effort to put the pressure on Osama bin Laden, at which point I would have been prepared to move major track divisions into position, whether it's the 101st, the 10th Mountain Division, 82nd Airborne, etc.

. . . Now, I know we had SEALs at Tora Bora. And they wanted to go. I mean, who wouldn't have wanted to go get Osama bin Laden?

[T]he bottom line is there wasn't even a sufficient strategy to do that. I would have guaranteed there was. Period.

What would you have said to your central commander, who's the guy on the ground, about planning for an Iraq war?

DOJ_NMG_0081476

First of all, I would have had enough people around who understand and define to me adequately the nature of the threat that we now face. . . . And that requires a pretty extensive outreach effort which includes, in my judgment, not just the Joint Chiefs of Staff and your national security adviser and your intelligence director, but it really includes. . . . President George Herbert Walker Bush, President Jimmy Carter, President Bill Clinton, you know, President Ford, Brent Scowcroft, Zbig Brzezinski, Jim Baker, George Shultz. I mean, you start running the list. I would have had all of those people to some evening sessions, sat up there in the Yellow Room and sat around and said, "What are we facing here? What are the challenges? What's the most important thing we do? How do we win?" Once you define the war on terror, then you can really understand what you've got to do. I think these guys rushed to a definition of the war, saw it the way they wanted to see it, clouded by ideology, and then went out and made people do things accordingly. . . .

It's incomprehensible to me. I mean look -- go back to that period. On that November 21st date [Nov. 21, 2001, when Bush first asked Rumsfeld to look at the war plan for an attack on Iraq], we had not yet fought Tora Bora. . . . We were deep in Afghanistan with an enormous priority to kill al-Qaeda. And we also had a very tentative Pakistan that was fragile, which was a country with nuclear weapons, which we were just moving to the place of sort of participation with America. . . . So my instinct, absent evidence of intelligence, would not have been to ask the secretary of defense for war plans on Iraq. I would have said, "Do we have sufficient troops on the ground to trap Osama bin Laden?" . . . It would not have moved me to take the eye off of Osama bin Laden and the fundamental goal, which was destroying al-Qaeda. . . .

You would have gone to Bush's father, even?

Oh, absolutely. You kidding? I would have said, "Come down here and spend the evening at the White House. Let's talk. I want to talk to you. Tell me about your decision. Tell me all the things that went through your head when you were thinking about going into Iraq and you made the decision finally not to go."

In August '02, Powell asked for a two-hour dinner alone with Bush. Condi Rice is there and he says, "The consequences have not been fully examined and if you invade . . . 'you break it, you own it.'" What would you have done at that moment, if you were president?

If I were president and my secretary of state came to me and said, "Mr. President, you're on a bad track," I would slow the baby down and find out if I was on a bad track. Or I'd fire my secretary of state. . . . I mean, if a guy with Colin Powell's credentials who's been chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who'd risen up through service to other presidents, who's been to war, and who is your chosen secretary of state, came to me and said that, I'd say, "Okay. What do we need to do? Where are we? What are the downsides? What haven't we done?"

ON THE "AXIS OF EVIL"

Do you think that the idea of lumping North Korea, Iran and Iraq together is, from a policy point of view, possible or wise, as Bush did in his 2002 State of the Union?

No, it's neither wise nor possible because they are different challenges, different cultures, different historical backgrounds to those challenges. And in the case of the Middle East, we really had an opportunity post-9/11. This is what I think was so important. This is what I saw staring us in the face as I went through 2004 . . . a remarkable opportunity to reconnect to the post-9/11 goodwill of the world, which in my judgment this administration squandered. And that goodwill was perhaps one of our greatest assets. Had we taken that goodwill and built it into a larger strategic concept -- I mean, you can go back to Woodrow Wilson. . . . And then you go to Roosevelt. You go to Kennedy . . . and Eisenhower. They all had a larger strategic concept, which -- this is important -- had the ability to bring the world to our side.

Bush thought this was a strategic concept.

This was an ideological concept, not a strategic concept. . . .

I mean, this is what I would have wanted in first discussions. What are we up against? What is this all about? Did these guys just attack us because this is part of Osama bin Laden's strategy for a greater caliphate in the Middle East, or are they attacking us for other reasons? . . . And it seems to me that the transformational aspects of it require a much more massive kind of public diplomacy, global cooperation on religious issues as well as on economic issues and human rights and other issues, as it did the barrel of a gun. These guys could only see it in the context of the military piece.

ON POSTWAR PLANNING

[I]t wasn't really until three months before the war starts that Bush got involved in aftermath planning. And the question is, when do you start, even if you're contemplating war, which clearly they are, when do you start the ball rolling on aftermath?

Day One. And that is not a Monday morning quarterback comment. That is such a fundamental prerequisite to the concept of contemplating going to war, particularly where you are going to occupy another country. One of the first questions, I'd sit there with a bunch of people at the table, I'd say, "Okay, assuming we go into Iraq, what happens after?" Nobody ever doubted this was going to be short and we were going to win. So we knew we were going to win, so once we're in Baghdad, what happens? Who's going to run the country? Will there be electricity? What are the war plans? Can we protect the pipelines on the oil? What's the ability to make sure people have food? Are you going to guard the ammo dump so you make sure there isn't looting?

Remember when Rumsfeld said, "Oh, looting happens."

"Stuff happens."

I was stunned by that. And I said they're going to rue the day that they allowed this stuff to get out of control because they sent a message, "No control." And our kids were being blown up by the very weapons that they didn't even think about securing on the way in. There should have been an elaborate -- in fact it was an elaborate plan and they chose to ignore it. Colin Powell and the State Department had a fairly elaborate plan and I've talked to people who are involved in the making of it.

ON DONALD RUMSFELD

In November-December '02, Rumsfeld's making major force deployments to the area but he says we can't do a big one because it will tell the world diplomacy is over. And he said, "We're sending these forces and they're going to be in top fighting shape for about two or three months but then it will start to degrade." Your reaction?

One of incredulity that a president would even allow that argument to be persuasive and that a secretary of defense would make it in the first place. And shame on all of them for that. That is insulting to Americans and to all of us, the notion that you have to send people to war simply because you put them there. This is just, you know, it was their rush to war.

And then when Rumsfeld in January started telling the president, "You're losing your options." And you know, you get to a point where we're asking our allies, particularly the Saudis, to make commitments and it's not feasible to back off.

Well, you could always back off it if you haven't committed the troops and there's a reason to back off. I mean, if you don't have intelligence to go to war and you go to war for weapons of mass destruction, you damn well can say, "I'm not giving the order to fire." What is the shame in going back and saying, "We have new intelligence that indicates something different and I intend as president to exercise my responsibility to the world and to our troops to make sure we've exhausted that."

Do you get in a bind, though, where to credibly threaten force you have to deploy all kinds of troops and then once you've deployed them you get into --

The purpose of the deployment of the troops is to get the weapons of mass destruction under control. If at the last moment something indicates to you either there aren't weapons of mass destruction or you have a way to get them under control, you don't use the troops and you don't have to. I mean, those are the tough judgments. Look, what are you going to do? "Oh, gee. We're locked in. We don't have sufficient evidence but I'm going to send this kid from Illinois to die anyway?"

ON DOUBTS

Can a president afford to have doubt in a time of war?

Well, you better have your doubts before the war. And you better explore every doubt before the war. But once you've committed, you better not have a doubt. You better know what you're doing and you better be committed to winning and do everything in your power to do that.

Do you think they had a process of doubt?

No. Clearly they didn't, and that's a reflection of the president.

But Bush says, when I asked him earlier, I said, "You never get everyone to agree on the use of force."

I'm not looking for everybody's agreement. You're never going to get everybody to agree.

What are you looking for?

What I'm looking for is the broadest possible vetting and examination. And let the debate take place in front of me and I'll make my judgment. But nobody will have any doubt that every question was asked. Nobody will have any doubt that the alternative theories were examined, that history was examined, that culture was examined, religion was understood, that the dynamics of the region were explored, that people who've lived there have been inquired of. When I get to that decision I can explain it and there's only one rationale, not a whole bunch of shifting rationales. That's the way you take a nation to war.

ON HISTORY'S VERDICT

I asked Bush in December '03, "How do you think history's going to judge your war?" And that's when he said, "We don't know. We won't know. We'll all be dead."

I think history nowadays judges things much more rapidly, number one. And number two, certain things lend themselves to pretty rapid judgment. Vietnam is an example of that. . . . And history is going to judge this very, very, very rapidly, I think.

And severely?

I think history is going to be very, very tough on not just the way the war has been managed, but on the way in which the decision to go to war was carried out. It's going to be a low moment . . . in the presidency in history.

A Plan For Iraq (WP)

By Dennis Ross

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

As a longtime negotiator in the Middle East, I learned that the most demanding requirement of peacemaking was just getting each side to adjust to reality. In Iraq today, 3 1/2 years after the United States went to war there, no one seems to be doing that.

The Shiites, who dominate the government, may have reason to distrust the Sunnis, but they also remain unready to recognize the Sunnis' need for formal assurance that they will have a piece of the pie. The Sunnis may understand, intellectually, that they will no longer hold all the positions of power and privilege, but emotionally they have yet to accept the idea of the Shiites -- an underclass in their eyes -- as the dominant political force. The Kurds, regardless of what they say, expect to be independent and simply want a political framework that legitimizes that status without exposing them to threats from Turkey or Iran.

And what about the Bush administration -- has it adjusted to reality? It claims progress, even while we sink into civil war. New security plans are tried and fail. Expectations that we will be able to draw down our forces rise and then fall as sectarian violence increases and becomes self-perpetuating.

Staying the course is a prescription for avoiding reality. But simply setting a deadline and withdrawing might also constitute a form of denial -- denial of what will happen in the region after a precipitous pullout. So what can be done?

The starting point is to recognize that Iraq is not going to be a democratic, unified country that serves as a model for the region. The violence and the Sunni-Shiite division have already ruled that out. Instead, Iraq could, in the best case, evolve into a country that has the following: a central government with limited powers; provincial governments with extensive autonomy; sharing of oil revenue; and, at the local level, some rough form of representation and tolerance for minorities. In those circumstances Iraq might eventually achieve stability.

Such an outcome won't materialize on its own. To be sure, it could emerge after a prolonged civil war, which is the path we are heading down. Three interconnected initiatives might create a more acceptable path for managing either this outcome or at least our own disengagement from Iraq.

First, it's time for the Bush administration to insist that a national reconciliation conference be held and not be disbanded until agreement is reached on amendments to the constitution. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has presented his plan for national reconciliation, but it fails to address the constitution and the legal assurances Sunnis want.

The Sunnis supported the constitution and participated in the elections last December with the understanding that there would be amendments on sharing oil revenue, on a prohibition against provinces' seceding and on the role of Islam in the state. Those amendments were never adopted, and now, when a committee has finally been formed to discuss them, it appears to the Sunnis that they will have to negotiate with a gun at their heads: namely, with parallel discussions on developing plans for provinces to secede also taking place.

Above all, what the Sunnis don't want is a rump state without resources. If they think that's all they will be left with, they will continue to at least acquiesce in the insurgency. And for the Shiites, that will be justification for preserving their militias. No national compact, no formal structure giving the Sunnis a legal foothold, no end to their support for the insurgency and no readiness by the Shiites to disband their militias.

Second, a long-discussed regional conference with all of Iraq's neighbors should be held. None of them -- Iran, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Syria, Turkey -- wants the Bush administration to succeed in Iraq (at least in the way the president defines success). And yet every one of them fears the consequences of an Iraq convulsed in the aftermath of a precipitous U.S. withdrawal. A full-scale civil war, with refugees streaming out of the country, with instability bound to leak across borders, and with other nations intervening to protect their own interests and their Iraqi allies is just as much a nightmare for Iran as it is for Saudi Arabia. While Iraq's neighbors may agree on little else, the common interest of wanting to avoid an all-out civil war in Iraq could create a basis for a general set of understandings on what they will and will not do to help foster stability there. The administration ought to work for such a conference now.

Third, President Bush should inform Maliki that we will not impose a deadline for withdrawal but we are going to negotiate with his government a timetable for our departure. The difference between a deadline and an agreed timetable is the difference between leaving the Iraqis in the lurch and informing them they have to assume responsibilities. The former guarantees preservation of the militias as they anticipate a deepening civil war; the latter puts all sectarian groups on notice that they can shape the future but the clock is ticking and if they don't begin to get serious about reconciliation and about fulfilling their own responsibilities they face the abyss.

No one in Iraq seems to want us there, but everyone is afraid to have us leave. In the meantime, everyone seems willing to sit back, to avoid tackling the tough problems and to let us carry the brunt of the fighting. That has to stop.

Clearly there should be a relationship between the effort to finally produce national reconciliation and our approach to working out an agreement on the timing of withdrawal. If the Iraqis create a real national compact, the United States can be more flexible on its timetable for withdrawal. If they fail to do so, the United States must be more demanding in negotiations on the timetable. Ultimately, if Iraqis are ready to resolve their internal political differences, to adjust to reality and to make the hard choices they face, our presence can help in the transition. But if they continue to avoid reality, our presence will simply prolong both their state of denial and ours. It is time for a change in course.

Waging War, One Police Precinct At A Time (NYT)

By Phillip Carter

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Los Angeles

THE military's new counterinsurgency manual offers a great deal of wisdom for those who will wage the small wars of the future. Its prescriptions and paradoxes — like the maxim that the more force used, the less effective it is — make sense. However, having spent the last year advising a provincial police headquarters in Iraq, I know it's far easier to write about such wars than to fight them.

The war I knew was infinitely more complex, contradictory and elusive than the one described in the network news broadcasts or envisioned in the new field manual. When I finally left Baquba, the violent capital of Iraq's Diyala Province, I found myself questioning many aspects of our mission and our accomplishments, both in a personal search for meaning and a quest to gather lessons that might help those soldiers who will follow me.

The first question was how Iraq in September 2006 differed from that of October 2005. Our Iraqi interpreters told us things were better than last year, which in turn had been better than 2004, when American forces frequently fought pitched battles in Baquba. Yet, sometimes in the same breath, they would long for the days of stability and order under Saddam Hussein.

During my time there, the hundreds of thousands of residents of Baquba went to work or school, shopped in markets, spent time with their families and lived their lives. The vibrancy and vitality of Iraqi society was the norm, not the anarchic violence we see in the news.

And yet, the violence did exist; it was not a figment of reporters' imaginations. Gunfire frequently echoed through the streets of central Baquba, and homemade bombs often interrupted the bustling marketplace just north of our compound. This violence worsened during my time in Iraq: the Army's PowerPoint presentations depicting attack and death statistics from across the country showed the same, steadily increasing trend lines.

Despite the trend towards consolidation of American units onto huge bases in the desert, my team remained in downtown Baquba. We shared our compound with the provincial government; it adjoined the provincial courthouse and was just 800 yards down the street from the police headquarters. This proximity made us more effective, both because it made it easier for us to talk to the Iraqi leaders with whom we worked, and because it enhanced our credibility with our Iraqi counterparts, who saw us living and working by their side.

When the power grid failed or water supply stopped working — a daily experience during the summer — we knew and felt it firsthand. Likewise, when explosions or firefights erupted in the city, we could judge their severity with our own senses. We learned that counterinsurgency cannot be conducted from afar.

But did we make a difference? Diyala Province has 1.4 million citizens and stretches from the northern edge of Baghdad east to the Iranian border, north to Kurdistan, and west to the Sunni heartland. My brigade commander, a sage infantryman from Colorado, called Diyala "little Iraq," because its mix of people, geography and conditions represented a microcosm of the torn country. As goes Diyala, so goes Iraq, he and others said.

Our mission was deceptively simple: to build the provincial police so they could provide security and the rule of law. In these areas, we observed tangible progress. My team delivered hundreds of recruits to American-financed police academies, and oversaw a local academy that retrained hundreds of officers who had served under the old regime. Our civilian advisers, American police officers who came to Iraq as State Department contractors, trained hundreds of Iraqi patrolmen in street survival and investigative skills.

We gave trucks, rifles, body armor, radios and countless other items to the police, and oversaw the construction or renovation of police stations throughout the province. With our help, the police chief, a corpulent former army officer, and his staff became better managers, and replaced many ineffective and corrupt officers. We also brought our expertise to the Iraqi jails, judges and lawyers, resulting in hundreds of innocent Iraqi detainees being released after languishing for months or years in jail.

Despite these successes, I still left Iraq feeling uncertain about what we had accomplished. In theory, security should have improved with the development of capable Iraqi Army and police units. That did not happen. This is the central paradox of the Iraq war in fall 2006: we are making progress in developing the Iraqi Army and police, yet the violence gripping the country continues to worsen.

This paradox raises fundamental questions about the wisdom and efficacy of our strategy, which is to "stand up" Iraqi security forces so we can "stand down" American forces. Put simply, this plan is a blueprint for withdrawal, not for victory. Improving the Iraqi Army and police is necessary to prevail in Iraq; it is not sufficient.

Counterinsurgency is more like an election than a military operation; the Iraqi government must convince the Iraqi people to choose it over the alternatives offered by Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish militants. To do so, the Iraqi government and the coalition must deliver public goods — security, public works, commerce, education and the rule of law, to name a few. The campaign must convince not just a majority or super-majority but virtually everyone, for as the noted insurgents T. E. Lawrence and Mao Zedong have noted, it takes the support of just 2 in 100 citizens to sustain an insurgency.

At this point, and with this strategy, it may not be possible to win in Iraq. America gained a spectacular victory in 2003, toppling the brutal Saddam Hussein regime. But there are limits to what military force can accomplish. You cannot plant democracy with a bayonet, nor can you force Iraqis to choose a particular path if their democracy is to mean anything at all.

Moreover, our choices in 2006 are not as good as our choices were in 2003; we cannot simply stay the course now and hope for victory. Given Iraq's historic antipathy to invaders and the strength of today's insurgency, I believe only a wholly unconventional approach will work. This means many more embedded advisers like myself, working in tandem with teams from the State Department and other agencies, supported by combat forces only when force is necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0081481

We should strive in 2006 to build on our successes and to find a smarter way to shift the counterinsurgency effort to the Iraqis in order to secure an imperfect victory. For, as Lawrence wrote eight decades ago about helping the Arabs fight the Turks: "Better the Arabs do it tolerably than that you do it perfectly. It is their war, and you are to help them, not to win it for them."

Burden Of Proof (WP)

HUBRIS

The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal,

and the Selling of the Iraq War

By Michael Isikoff and David Corn

Crown. 463 pp. $25.95

In October 2002, a file of documents from the U.S. embassy in Rome arrived on the desk of one of the State Department's senior nuclear proliferation analysts. The papers had been handed over by an Italian journalist, who had been given them by an informer who had, in turn, obtained them from a mysterious source in the embassy of Niger. The documents purported to show that Niger had signed a July 2000 deal to supply Iraq with 500 tons of yellowcake uranium -- about one-sixth of the African country's annual production and a key ingredient in a uranium-enrichment process that could provide Saddam Hussein's regime with a nuclear bomb.

As Simon Dodge of the State Department's intelligence bureau began to review the documents in Washington, he soon concluded that they were fakes. One of the papers described a secret meeting in Rome at which representatives of Iraq, Iran, Sudan, Libya and Pakistan formed a joint "plan of action" to defend themselves against the West in alliance with "Islamic patriots accused of belonging to criminal organizations." Dodge later told Senate investigators that he considered the claim "completely implausible," or, as Michael Isikoff and David Corn put it, "something out of James Bond -- or maybe Austin Powers." Niger embassy stamps, palpably fake, linked the "plan of action" document to those depicting the Iraq deal. The papers are a hoax, Dodge e-mailed colleagues.

This was not what most in the White House wanted to hear. By October 2002, when Dodge began examining the Niger documents, the Bush administration was already accelerating its drive for war against Iraq. An authoritative demolition of one of the most dramatic parts of that case -- that Baghdad was building a nuclear weapon -- was deeply unwelcome and, coming from the diplomats at the State Department, viewed with particular suspicion by Vice President Cheney's office. Partly by accident (the CIA merely put its copy of the "obviously forged" Rome papers in a vault and left them there) and partly because it simply did not want to know, the White House remained in denial about the unreliability of the whole Niger uranium story. Fatefully, the president would use the claim in his State of the Union address in January 2003. It was the principal basis for the administration's repeated rhetorical flourish that the Iraqi smoking gun might "come in the form of a mushroom cloud." And it was a phony.

The Niger claim provides the central thread in Hubris , Isikoff and Corn's exhaustive reconstruction of the formulation and selling of the Iraq War. For those who wish to understand how one of the most powerful officials in the land -- Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby -- came to be under indictment for obstruction of justice, perjury and making false statements arising out of the Niger story, this book is indispensable.

But Niger was not the only proffered justification for the attack on Iraq that eventually crumbled to dust in the light of day. So did the false claims of Iraqi defectors, such as the shadowy informant known as "Curveball," that Iraq possessed mobile biological laboratories, a claim that was a centerpiece of then-secretary of state Colin Powell's U.N. presentation in February 2003. So did the misguided conviction that Iraq's purchase of aluminum tubes was proof of a nuclear-arms program. So did the long-disproved claim that 9/11 hijacker Mohamed Atta met with Iraqi intelligence agents in Prague in April 2001, which became almost an article of faith for the administration's hawks.

There have been many books about the Iraq war, and there will be many others before we are through. This one, however, pulls together with unusually shocking clarity the multiple failures of process and statecraft that led so many people to persuade themselves that the evidence pointed to an active Iraqi program to develop weapons of mass destruction and that it was in the interests of the United States to overthrow Saddam Hussein.

This is seemingly an eternal theme. The deeper we are drawn into Isikoff and Corn's account, the more we enter March of Folly territory. When the late Barbara W. Tuchman published her masterly 1984 account of the ruinous policies that governments have pursued through the ages, she ranged across a canvas stretching from the Trojan war to Vietnam.

To qualify as folly, Tuchman wrote, a policy must meet three criteria: It must have been seen at the time as counterproductive; a feasible alternative course of action must have been available; and the policy must have been that of a group of people, not merely a single tyrant or ruler. If ever a policy qualifies on all counts, it was the U.S.-imposed regime change in Iraq. Isikoff and Corn are reporters (for Newsweek and the Nation, respectively), not historians, but they still compel the reader to confront a further, essential dimension of folly's march. In each case -- the Niger uranium papers, the mobile labs, the aluminum tubes, the Atta-Iraq link -- there were people up and down the policy chain, including some at the very top, who either knew at the time or should have known that the claims were false or unreliable.

Many critics of the Iraq War have highlighted the ideological drive behind the invasion. Fewer have grappled with the more complex question of why it was impossible for skeptics, doubters and more scrupulous analysts to stop it. Isikoff and Corn enable us to understand better how this devastating policy tragedy played out. But as Coleridge once observed, the light of experience is but a lantern on the stern, illuminating only the waters through which we have passed. Sadly, Isikoff and Corn can't tell the next generation how to avoid such tragedies. Â·

Did a charismatic secretary of state serve the country and the president well on Iraq?

SOLDIER

The Life of Colin Powell

By Karen DeYoung

Knopf. 610 pp. $28.95

The subject of Karen DeYoung's new biography doesn't quite attain the stature that his many admirers might wish for him: that of a tragic hero. The Colin Powell portrayed in Soldier comes across as a disciplined and talented beneficiary of genuine equal opportunity, an inspiring leader of bureaucracies, "the world's best staff officer," a cool operator in Washington's political wars, an uncommonly decent man, a stellar product of great American institutions. But when those institutions failed -- when the Bush administration took the country to war in Iraq, rashly and under false pretexts -- Powell did not have the imagination to challenge or, finally, defy the system that had made him.

DeYoung, an associate editor at The Washington Post, had Powell's cooperation in the form of six extended interviews, but as she notes at the end of the book, they covered only the most recent ground -- the years since Powell told his own story in his 1995 memoir, My American Journey. For this reason, and because a man of Powell's supreme self-control is even more opaque than most public figures, her march through his early years and his rise through the ranks of the Army has a dutiful feel -- a blur of promotions and Powell family relocations without any strong sense of his inner life. In spite of DeYoung's reportorial talents and sympathetic understanding of her subject, the first half of Soldier should have been greatly compressed; Powell's career is simply not important or interesting enough for a full-dress biographical monument. (Would anyone want to read 500 pages about Brent Scowcroft?)

DeYoung might have done better to limit herself to Powell's years as secretary of state. She imbues this story with narrative tension and a steady accumulation of detail that shows exactly how he allowed himself to be used, mastered and then cast aside by his antagonists in the administration, above all by his longtime colleague Dick Cheney, now the vice president. It illustrates what critics, including Powell's former chief of staff Lawrence B. Wilkerson, have described as broken policymaking, with disagreements turning poisonously personal and key decisions, such as the jettisoning of the Kyoto accords or even the historic decision to invade Iraq, made without the knowledge of leading officials, usually Powell himself.

Powell had the devotion of those below him, and his instinct for the right word and gesture was never surer than on Sept. 11, 2001, when, marooned in Lima, Peru, at a meeting of the Organization of American States, he insisted on staying long enough to cast the American vote in favor of a document called the Democratic Charter. "He knew from the start that what we needed were friends," his spokesman Richard Boucher told DeYoung. "We didn't know who did it, we didn't know why. But we needed democratic friends -- that was the only way, whatever this was, that we were going to beat it."

It was the thinking of a moderate Republican member of the internationalist foreign policy establishment -- one of the last. It was not the thinking of the president and his most influential advisers, especially the vice president and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, who were more intellectually aggressive than Powell and far more ruthless in undermining their chief antagonist. In DeYoung's account, Powell believed for a long time that he was winning more than his share of interagency battles, partly because his meteoric rise through a system that operated in an essentially rational way had been almost untroubled. "But past experience was turning out to be a poor guide to the new reality," DeYoung writes, "and Powell was slow to grasp the extent of his -- and the State Department's -- isolation within Bush's national security team."

As the administration moved with blind self-confidence toward war in Iraq, Powell slowly became part of the machinery that he thought he was helping to brake. The process by which he began to accept the White House's terms of the argument makes for the best pages of Soldier , a fascinating study in bureaucratic maneuvering, groupthink and subtle self-deception. Powell's tactical successes obscured his larger strategic defeat: Once he persuaded the president to take his case against Iraq to the United Nations in September 2002, DeYoung writes, "Powell quickly moved to protect his right flank by establishing his bona fides inside the administration as a believer in the Iraqi threat and a firm supporter -- should diplomacy and international pressure fail -- of the use of force. Almost overnight, his carefully couched assessments of the state of Saddam's weapons programs were transformed into certainty." This change led directly to the moment for which Powell himself has said he will always be remembered: his dramatic speech to the U.N. Security Council on Feb. 5, 2003, vouching for the existence of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, later shown to be almost completely wrong. After that, the war was inevitable, as was the historical verdict on Powell's tenure in office.

His entire career had prepared him to be a first-rate secretary of state in a functional administration, and if he had had the good luck to serve under a better president, he might be remembered in the company of one of his heroes, George C. Marshall, another former general who became secretary of state, for Harry S. Truman. But as George W. Bush's principal cabinet officer, Powell was condemned by his own limitations. He took comfort in Marshall's reply to critics who thought that he should have resigned over his disagreement with President Truman's decision to recognize the newly created state of Israel in 1948. "No, gentlemen," Marshall is said to have replied, "you don't take a post of this sort and then resign when the man who has the constitutional responsibility to make decisions makes one you don't like." To Powell, Marshall had "done his job. He had given the President his best advice. He had presented it strongly . . . [and] used every, every opportunity to press his case."

It is easy to understand why this story inspired Powell. But there is a crucial difference. Powell never told Bush not to invade Iraq; out of a lifelong sense of propriety and restraint, he kept his best advice to himself. In 2003, the country needed someone more than the world's best staff officer. Â·

October 15, 2006 -- WE WERE ONE: SHOULDER TO SHOULDER WITH THE MARINES WHO TOOK FALLUJAH

BY PATRICK K. O'DONNELL

DE CAPO PRESS, 288 PAGES, $25

WITH unprecedented initiative Patrick K. O'Donnell volunteered to live and fight alongside American soldiers and Marines in Iraq in order to construct a real-time, eyewitness history of the fighting. He spent months in battle with the troops, mostly with a platoon from the 3/1 Marines. After every combat action, he spent countless hours debriefing them.

DOJ_NMG_0081484

O'Donnell's book focuses on the Second Battle of Fallujah. In part as commemoration, "We Were One" is scheduled to be released in the days preceding the two-year anniversary of that battle (Nov. 9), the Marine Corps birthday and Veterans Day. But the author's most important accomplishment among many is to put a human face on the troops who are fighting against some of the fiercest enemies America has ever encountered.

We meet the Marines who will make this attack. They are all volunteers, of course, several coming back for multiple combat deployments. These are no "dumb grunts," though they bear the title with pride. Prior to deployment, they train constantly, study "a three-foot high" stack of books and manuals and even learn Arabic. Their loyalty is primarily to each other; to the friends they have come to rely on for their lives. The bonding experience of combat can be a tired cliché for readers, but O'Donnell captures it without cheapening it.

O'Donnell shows the strength of these personal relationships as men lie wounded and dead in filthy Grenade Alley, where the mujahedeen tossed so many hand grenades that most of a 12-man squad was wounded. In Fallujah, the platoon learned that survival depended entirely on the mutual loyalty and support they gave one another - and the whimsy of the gods of war.

Kicking in the doors of as many as 100 stone houses, the men found enemy fighters wired to the gills with a narcotic cocktail of adrenaline, cocaine and amphetamines and learned too well the lesson of the randomness of combat. A Marine moves slightly and the wall where he stood is raked with machine gun fire, while others are killed or wounded by similar twists of fate.

O'Donnell paints a picture of intense bravery. The dehydrated, exhausted platoon maintains focus on their objective of keeping each other alive and killing or capturing the enemy.

These Marines knowingly walked in the shoes of their grandfathers in the Pacific war, and their fathers in Vietnam. They proudly referred to the Battle of Hue City and the conquest of Iwo Jima as part of the long heritage that they would join when they won the Battle of Fallujah. And they won resoundingly, despite ferocious odds.

Most of those who survived and remained in the Marine Corps were "serving on the Iraqi-Syrian border" as the book was completed. By now they may have rotated home and then back yet again into the fray.

Read O'Donnell's excellent book and you will know that they are indeed, as were each preceding generation, "The Greatest."

WAR MACHINES (NYPOST)

By Ralph Peters

The New York Post, October 15, 2006

October 15, 2006 -- WAR MADE NEW: TECHNOLOGY, WARFARE AND THE COURSE OF HISTORY, 1500 TO TODAY

BY MAX BOOT

GOTHAM BOOKS, 624 PAGES, $35

A BOOK'S got to be pretty damned good to be worth $35. And "War Made New" is worth every penny. It's not only a terrific read; it's a cheap education on how, for half a millennium, machines made war and war made machines. The research is impressive, the judgments are sound - and Max Boot's a strong, clear writer.

Taking the "Blitzkrieg of 1494" as his line of departure, he explains why a nearly forgotten French invasion of the Italian peninsula arguably created modern war. He then takes the reader through a vivid account of the Spanish Armada's decomposition, the innovative tactics of Gustavus Adolphus - and one paradigm-shattering campaign after another, right down to Operation Iraqi Freedom. Boot concludes with an eye-opening discussion of future military technologies.

The author sets up great battles as suspense stories, and you'll want to know what happens next. This is grand history, moving from the collapse of the Marathas in India to Pearl Harbor and the Battle of Midway. I knew the outcomes, but I still read anxiously. Boot's purpose is serious - to educate readers about the fateful relationship between technological change and warfare - but he makes the lessons enjoyable.

DOJ_NMG_0081485

It's not enough to possess the best gear. In 1940, the French had more and better equipment than the German army. But the Germans saw how to marry massed tanks and tactical radios to stun a slow-thinking opponent. In the War on Terror, our enemies brilliantly used our own technologies against us - cellphones, the Internet, airliners. It's not just what you've got, but how innovatively you use it.

You've still got to back the right weapons, though: Boot argues that the British lost their eastern empire because they failed to see that aircraft carriers had superceded battleships. You've got to choose the right stuff and use it more effectively than your enemy.

For all the discussion of technology - ever clear, always sensible - Boot never loses sight of the supremacy of the human being. After a riveting discussion of robotics, nanotechnology and what the Soviets used to call "weapons based on new physical principles," he concludes that nothing will match the flesh-and-blood soldier's situational awareness for many years to come.

My quibbles are minor: An active journalist, Boot is reluctant to burn bridges to establishment figures. Despite his fateful errors in Iraq, Donald Rumsfeld slips from the author's hands like a cobra covered in K-Y Jelly, eluding criticism. And Boot falls for the armchair general's "tooth-to-tail ratio" complaint that our military includes too many support troops. Well, there are a lot more "support troops" in a civilian hospital today than 50 years ago. As organizational complexity increases, staff requirements grow. And you'd better have somebody trained and ready when the precision weapon needs to be programmed.

But these criticisms are trivial compared to the ambitious scope - and success - of "War Made New." This is a book for both the general reader and reading generals.

Ralph Peters' latest book is "Never Quit the Fight."

Interim U.S. Attorney Settles In To The Job (NCP)

By Jared Allen

Nashville City Paper, October 15, 2006

Just before he left office, Jim Vines, who recently stepped down as Nashville's U.S. Attorney, said one of his greatest accomplishments was building up the Nashville office to a point where it could handle another Tennessee Waltz-type investigation.

"Even though it centered around the legislature, it had to be handled out of the Memphis office," Vines said last month in an interview with The City Paper, explaining that when the investigation into corruption at the Capitol began, the Nashville office was simply not up to the task of leading it.

"But if we were to have another ethics scandal, we could do it here now," Vines said.

So it seems fitting that after Vines' exit, the man selected to replace him – at least in the interim – is credited with cleaning up what was formerly the single most corrupt city is the United States: Youngstown, Ohio.

Youngstown is the hometown of former U.S. Rep James Traficant, who was indicted on federal corruption charges in 2002 and sentenced to eight years in prison.

For decades, most of Youngstown's local leaders were controlled by mafia bosses, who routinely blew up one another with car bombs.

That was until a U.S. attorney named Craig S. Morford arrived in Cleveland.

Over a period of five years, Morford investigated, prosecuted and convicted 70 individuals, including mob bosses, the county sheriff, county prosecutor, a nearby police chief, four judges and 10 attorneys.

Two weeks ago, the U.S. Department of Justice named Morford to head up the Nashville U.S. Attorney's Office.

The appointment is temporary for now – Morford's family is staying in Cleveland for the time being – but the career prosecutor, armed with decades of experience in high-profile cases, is already diving into his job in Nashville.

And he is prepared to lead the office in whatever direction it needs to go.

DOJ_NMG_0081486

"I've dedicated much of my career to fighting corruption," Morford said. "My belief is that the system is only as good as the people who run it, and when we give people a public servant position, we put our trust to those people. And they need to step up and live up to that trust. And if they don't, it's our job to come in and do something about it."

But Morford, who is also best known for investigating a Detroit U.S. attorney's terrorism investigation gone awry, and one that ultimately led to an admission by the Justice Department that it withheld sharing evidence with defense attorneys, does not see himself as a reformer.

"I don't come in here as a fixer," Morford said. "I'm here because I got a call. I was asked to serve in this way and I've always been one that's tried to answer the call. That's why I went to Detroit."

Morford also believes his main job is to hold down the well-built fort left by Vines.

"I've quickly assessed that there's a tremendous foundation that's been built by Jim, the people he brought in and the people who were already here," Morford said. "I view my job is maintaining that foundation, preserving that foundation and building upon that foundation."

In terms of building, Morford said his priorities include investigating and prosecuting cases of terrorism, health care fraud and violent crime.

He also stressed his work in Cleveland breaking up a entrenched but non-traditional culture of gangs and gang violence.

"Cleveland is much like Nashville. We don't have the large presence of national gangs – the Bloods, Crips and those types of things – but we have street corner gangs, that are extremely violent and involved in heavy crack dealing, Morford said.

"And for the family who lost their 8-year-old son on the way to the neighborhood recreation center, they don't much care that the guy who shot him calls himself a 'Dirty 30' because he lives on 30th Street, as opposed to a Blood or a Crip."

Morford will likely receive a warm welcome from the Metro Police Department, which in May launched a major initiative to combat Nashville gangs, which are likewise largely unorganized but still violent.

"We are looking forward to a continuation of the strong working relationship with the U.S. Attorney's Office on gang, gun and other issues," said Don Aaron, Police Department spokesman.

Morford is scheduled to meet with Metro Police Chief Serpas this week, and assessing the current gang problem and the police response to it will be on the top of the agenda, the U.S. Attorney said.

"The biggest problem you have in solving gang crime is getting good, solid intelligence so you can really get your hands around what the problem is," Morford said, discussing his work in Cleveland. "And there is a significant role for our office to play."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Finance Jobs Tarnished By Options Cases Legacy Of Scandals Could Linger, Threatening Guilt By Association (SFC)

By Carolyn Said, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, October 15, 2006

Headhunter Larry Ormsby was seeking a new chief financial officer for a Silicon Valley company recently. Then news cropped up that one of his candidates had big black mark on his resume: The company where he had previously been CFO was implicated in the stock options backdating scandal now grabbing headlines.

"That was enough for us to say, 'Let's not pursue this person,' " said Ormsby, senior client partner at Korn/Ferry International in San Francisco specializing in CFO and other senior finance positions. "Clients aren't comfortable making a hire when there is some gray area of uncertainty about what happened" at a candidate's previous jobs.

People caught up in probes over improper backdating of stock options may have bigger worries than their next job. But recruitment experts and others say the scandal may tarnish the careers of those in decision-making positions at the companies being investigated, regardless of whether they are ever charged with a crime.

"Of course it will be an issue" for job seekers, said John Challenger, chief executive officer of Challenger Grey & Christmas, a global outplacing firm in Chicago. "At an executive level, the company or the search firm will look through each of the jobs a candidate has had to understand if there was something that happened that might be problematic for the new company."

DOJ_NMG_0081487

About 125 companies, nearly a quarter of them in Silicon Valley, are facing probes over whether they improperly granted stock options that were retroactively linked to dates when their stock price was low, thus giving recipients a leg up on potential profits. Such backdating is illegal unless it is disclosed and accounted for properly -- something that many companies evidently failed to do.

Investigators from the Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and the companies themselves are sifting through documents to try to figure out who did what when.

About 30 executives and board members have gotten the ax over their involvement in backdating, but experts expect the toll to rise as companies finalize investigations of themselves. Only two cases so far have resulted in criminal charges being filed.

"If companies want to get credit (with the SEC and Justice Department) for their cooperation by showing they found a problem and have done everything possible to eliminate it going forward, one thing they will want to say is that people associated with the problem are no longer here," said Jim Sanders, a Los Angeles attorney specializing in white-collar defense and a former SEC regional administrator and federal prosecutor. "I've been in situations where (SEC officials) say, 'How can you say you fully cooperated and cleaned house when Joe Blow is still working there?' "

But even people who don't get the heave-ho could be tarred by their association with the scandal -- assuming they were somewhere in the chain of command that oversaw finances.

"I think it will impact the candidacy of people looking for jobs if they themselves were part of the cabal of inner circle people who were likely to have been the manipulators," said Mark Jaffe, president of executive-search firm Wyatt and Jaffe in Minneapolis. "If you were the chief corporate counsel, the CFO, the treasurer, the chief operating officer or the CEO, you're likely to get some splatter on you, and with good reason. If you were the chief marketing officer or the (chief technology officer), it could be you were in the Bahamas that week."

Rick Beal, managing consultant for the San Francisco office of search firm Watson Wyatt Worldwide, said he thinks people from affected companies could rise above their involvement if they can make a good case for themselves.

"If they came away with a lot of real positive learning experiences out of it, they understand and can articulate how things went wrong and why, and they hold themselves personally accountable for it, that speaks volumes about them," Beal said. "If someone says, 'I stepped down because I had to and it wasn't really my fault' and points the finger elsewhere, that tells you something, too."

In any case, he said, search firms themselves may help candidates clean up their reputations.

"Headhunters shopping these folks are going to spin it as strongly as they possibly can," Beal said. "They'll say, 'I've got a great candidate who got caught up in this stuff, but he's a really good guy.' "

Ormsby of Korn/Ferry said he feels obligated to do much more thorough background checks on job candidates in the post-Enron world.

"We used to check education, criminal, employment -- more basic checks," he said. "For the past five years, we've been much more aggressive on every CFO assignment to make sure we look for SEC investigations that have happened, look for civil as well as criminal background checks." In addition, he makes many more reference calls, Ormsby said.

Sanders, the former SEC administrator, said there is an added complication for people who left companies under investigation.

"The real issue for them is if the facts were significant enough that a corporation felt a resignation was appropriate, that is clearly in my view going to draw the attention of the SEC," he said. "The SEC has the power to bar someone from being an officer or director of a publicly held corporation. From the prospective new employer's standpoint, I can only guess that ... a candidate who might be the subject of an SEC enforcement action" would be undesirable.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Displease A Lobbyist, Get Fired (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0081488

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

E-mails show Jack Abramoff's ability to influence White House staffing decisions through his highly placed friends.

WASHINGTON — For five years, Allen Stayman wondered who ordered his removal from a State Department job negotiating agreements with tiny Pacific island nations — even when his own bosses wanted him to stay.

Now he knows.

Newly disclosed e-mails suggest that the ax fell after intervention by one of the highest officials at the White House: Ken Mehlman, on behalf of one of the most influential lobbyists in town, Jack Abramoff.

The e-mails show that Abramoff, whose client list included the Northern Mariana Islands, had long opposed Stayman's work advocating labor changes in that U.S. commonwealth, and considered what his lobbying team called the "Stayman project" a high priority.

"Mehlman said he would get him fired," an Abramoff associate wrote after meeting with Mehlman, who was then White House political director.

The exchange illustrates how, more than two years after the corruption scandal surrounding the now-disgraced Abramoff came to light, people are still learning the extent of the lobbyist's ability to pull the levers of power in Washington. The latest revelations provide more detail than the Bush administration has acknowledged about how Abramoff and his team reached into high levels of the White House, not just Capitol Hill, which has been the main focus of the influence-peddling investigation.

The e-mails, disclosed as part of a report by the House Government Reform Committee, show how Abramoff manipulated the system through officials such as Mehlman, now the chairman of the Republican National Committee. Doing so, Abramoff directed government appointments, influenced policy decisions and won White House endorsements for political candidates — all in the service of his clients.

The report found more than 400 lobbying contacts between Abramoff's team and the White House.

Besides the Stayman matter, the e-mails reveal Mehlman's role in helping an Abramoff client, the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, secure $16.3 million for a new jail that government analysts concluded was not necessary. Mehlman also helped Abramoff obtain a White House endorsement in 2002 of the Republican gubernatorial ticket in the U.S. territory of Guam .

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to federal charges in a congressional bribery investigation that continues to loom over Capitol Hill and the GOP. A Senate subcommittee concluded that Abramoff fleeced Indian tribes out of millions of dollars in fees that he split with one of his associates.

The scandal has touched just one West Wing staffer, Susan Ralston, a onetime Abramoff aide who resigned this month as executive assistant to strategist Karl Rove after congressional investigators documented frequent contact with the lobbyist's team.

Mehlman said he did not recall the details of his contacts with the Abramoff team, including discussions about Stayman, the former State Department official. But he said such interactions were part of his job as White House political director.

"I was a gateway," Mehlman said in an interview. "It was my job to talk to political supporters, to hear their requests, and hand them on to policymakers."

Mehlman said he had known Abramoff since the mid-1990s and would listen to his requests along with those of other influential Republicans.

"I know Jack," Mehlman said. "I certainly recall that if he and others wanted to meet I would have met with them, as I would have met with lots of people."

Mehlman, a Baltimore native and graduate of Harvard Law School, has remained a GOP power player since stepping down as political director in 2003. He built the party's grass-roots get-out-the-vote strategy, managing President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign before taking over the RNC last year.

Democrats charge that Mehlman may have acted unethically during his time at the White House, lobbying for government actions at Abramoff's behest, even when policy experts disagreed with the decision.

The senior Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, Rep. Henry A. Waxman of Los Angeles, points to e-mails suggesting that in June 2001, amid negotiations over whether to fire Stayman, Mehlman requested and might have been given two U2 concert tickets in Abramoff's suite at what was then the MCI Center (now the Verizon Center).

Ethics rules prohibit officials from accepting gifts worth more than $20 from a person doing business with the government, although there are exceptions. Ethics officials typically consider such suite tickets to be worth the same as the event's most expensive tickets, which in this case was $133 apiece, according to Waxman's office.

"Please tell me we can fit two more in for Friday," lobbyist and Kevin Ring wrote to Abramoff, his partner. "Ken Mehlman of the White House apparently wants to go." On the day before the concert, Ring wrote to Abramoff that a resume for a Stayman replacement had been "sent to our conduit."

Referring in the same e-mail to an unrelated Labor Department appointment, Ring said he "will talk to Mehlman at the concert tomorrow night."

A former Abramoff associate remembers Mehlman attending the concert. Mehlman said he did not recall it. "I've been to several U2 concerts, but I don't know whether I went to that one," he said. "But I can tell you that as political director I was always very careful to make sure everything I did was above board and consistent with the rules."

Waxman said the e-mails suggested Mehlman may have "violated fundamental ethics regulations and the law."

"There are serious questions that Mr. Mehlman needs to address with candor and that Congress should investigate thoroughly," Waxman said.

The e-mails disclosed in the House report showed that Mehlman was involved in a variety of matters of interest to Abramoff, one of which bore fruit for the lobbyist after he discussed delivering campaign contributions to GOP causes.

Tony Rudy, a onetime aide to former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), referred to Mehlman on Nov. 9, 2001, as a "rock star" after Mehlman agreed to "take care of" the Choctaws' jail, despite a Justice Department finding that the tribe's existing jail was adequate.

Several days after that meeting, on Nov. 13, Rudy recommended a $15,000 contribution to the Republican National Committee. "Let's give the check to Ken Mehlman at the White House," wrote Rudy, who later pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges in the broader investigation.

On Nov. 15, campaign finance records show, the tribe gave $10,000 to the RNC. Overall, the tribe gave $120,000 in the 2002 election cycle to Republican committees and $95,000 to Democratic committees, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Two weeks after the RNC received its check, Susan Butler, chief of staff to U.S. Rep. Charles W. "Chip" Pickering, a Mississippi Republican whose district includes the Choctaws, e-mailed Rudy to say that she had discussed the issue with Mehlman and others and that "they were very positive and promised to work with us on it."

When Justice Department officials relented and released the money for the jail, giddy Abramoff associates planned to host agency officials in a suite at a Dave Matthews concert.

"I have the suite filling up with DOJ staffers who just got our client $16 million," one wrote. Another replied that the agency officials deserve any reward they want, "opening day tickets, Skins v. Giants, oriental massages, hookers, whatever."

Mehlman, meanwhile, also helped Abramoff with another client, Guam, the e-mails show.

On Oct. 9, 2002, Abramoff asked Mehlman to secure a White House endorsement for the island's GOP gubernatorial ticket.

Three weeks later, Abramoff received a note from Ralston, then Rove's assistant, saying that Mehlman had gotten a quote from the White House for "your Guam candidates." She also asked Abramoff to send his requests in the future to "Ken only."

For Stayman, learning more about how Abramoff used White House connections helped him understand why, five years ago, he found himself looking at a career change.

His job was up for renewal, but his State Department supervisors wanted to keep him on to finish a project that was expected to take more time.

"With only about a year left on my appointment, I didn't think it would trigger any interest from the White House," Stayman said. "I assumed that Abramoff was behind it, but I didn't know the details, who called whom and how much effort it took."

Unbeknownst to Stayman, though, within weeks of Bush taking office, the "Stayman project" was in full swing.

State Department officials resisted the dismissal, and negotiations dragged on for months. In May 2001, one of Mehlman's deputies assured Abramoff's team that, "Obviously, this guy cannot stay."

DOJ_NMG_0081490

That July 9, Ralston e-mailed Abramoff with news of a deal on Stayman: "He'll be out in four months."

And he was.

Weldon Faces Probe On Daughter's Deals (AP-Y)

By Kimberly Hefling And Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

The FBI is investigating whether Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., used his influence to secure lobbying and consulting contracts for his daughter, two people familiar with the inquiry said Saturday.

The inquiry focuses on lobbying contracts worth $1 million that Weldon's daughter, Karen Weldon, obtained from foreign clients and whether they were assisted by the congressman, they said. They spoke on condition of anonymity because of the confidentiality of the criminal investigation.

Weldon, a 10-term Republican from the Philadelphia suburbs, long has denied any wrongdoing, and his top aide said Saturday no one had notified him of an investigation.

"I think if there was an investigation, somebody would have contacted us," said Russ Caso, Weldon's chief of staff.

Caso said Weldon and his staff were "100 percent caught off guard" when they learned of the investigation, first reported late Friday by McClatchy Newspapers. This account cited two individuals with specific knowledge of the existence of the investigation; they declined to be identified because of the confidentiality of criminal investigations.

Caso, whose boss is in a tight race for re-election on Nov. 7 against Democrat Joe Sestak, tried to cast doubt on reports of the investigation. "Unidentified sources mean nothing," Caso said. "There's no substance in that story. It's a flimsy story."

Two people familiar with the investigation told the AP on Saturday that the inquiry was being handled by agents from the FBI's field offices in Washington and Philadelphia and was being coordinated by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section. Spokesmen for the Justice Department and the FBI declined comment Saturday.

Those two people familiar with the investigation confirmed that federal agents were examining Weldon's work between 2002 and 2004 to help two Russian companies and two Serbian brothers connected to former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic. They had hired Solutions North America Inc., a company operated by Karen Weldon and Charles Sexton, a Republican ally of the congressman.

Weldon, vice chairman of the House Armed Services committee, is a Russian speaker regarded by some as a foreign policy expert who has clashed at times with the Bush administration.

Over the last few days, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has mailed fliers to voters in Weldon's district accusing Karen Weldon of getting help from her father on lobbying projects.

Michael Puppio, Weldon's campaign manager, questioned the timing of the mailing and published reports about the investigation. He accused Democrats of "attempting to smear the congressman and his entire family" in the final weeks of the campaign.

Jen Psaki, a spokeswoman for the DCCC, said it's "bizarre, paranoid and absurd" for the Weldon campaign to imply there's a link in the timing of the mailing and the published reports.

The Weldon investigation comes at a critical time for Republicans who are fighting to maintain a majority in the House of Representatives in a midst of scandals.

On Friday, Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, pleaded guilty in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, which has touched on federal lawmakers, former aides and members of the Bush administration.

At the same time, an inquiry is under way on Capitol Hill into whether Republican House leaders or their top aides covered up questionable behavior of former Rep. Mark Foley toward teenage males who worked as House pages.
